TO HIS

ROYAL HIGHNESS

FREDERIC

PRINCE of WALES.

SIR,

MY presuming to offer to YOUR ROYAL HIGHNESS this Translation, is in some measure justified by the Nature of the Subject, and Reason of the Thing. For History, however useful to others, is infinitely more so to a Prince, and particularly the History of that Crown He is born to wear. How instructive, as well as agreeable, must a fair and impartial Narration of the Lives and Actions of a long Series of Predecessors be to Him? And that Such is the following History, originally penned by a Foreigner, who had no Party to serve, or Interest to promote, may be undoubtedly concluded from the universal Approbation it every where meets with.

HERE then, as from a faithful Monitor, uninfluenced by Hopes or Fears, YOUR ROYAL HIGHNESS will learn, in general, That to a Prince nothing is so pernicious as Flattery; nothing so valuable as Truth: That proportionable to his People's Liberty and Happiness will be his Glory and Strength: That true Valour conſiſts not in deſtroying, but protecting Mankind; not in conquering Kingdoms, but defending them from Violence: That a Prince's moſt ſecret Counſels, Motives and Purſuits, will probably one day be publiſhed and rigorouſly judged; and, however flattered whilſt living, yet when dead, he will be treated as his Actions have deſerved, with Honour or Reproach, with Veneration or Contempt.

More particularly, Your Royal Highness will Here perceive, that foreign Acquiſitions and Conqueſts were generally fatal to England; all Increaſe of Empire burdenſom to her, except That of the Ocean, which can never be too extenſive, as it enlarges and protects her Trade, the principal Fountain of her Riches and Grandeur.

But above all, you will Here ſee the Origin and Nature of our Excellent Conſtitution, where the Prerogatives of the Crown, and Privileges of the Subject are ſo happily proportioned, that the King and the People are inſeparably united in the ſame Intereſts and Views. You will obſerve that this Union, though talked of by even the moſt Arbitrary Princes with reſpect to their Subjects, is peculiar to the Engliſh Monarchy, and the moſt ſolid Foundation of the Sovereign's Glory, and the People's Happineſs.

Accordingly, you will Here conſtantly find, that in the Reigns where this Union was cultivated, the Kingdom flouriſhed, and the Prince was glorious, powerful, truſted, beloved. On the contrary, when, by an Arbitrary Diſpoſition, or evil Counſels, it was interrupted, the Conſtitution languiſhed, mutual Confidence vaniſhed, Diſtruſt, Jealouſy, Diſcord aroſe; and when entirely broken, as was unfortunately ſometimes the Caſe, Confuſion and Civil Wars enſued.

As this Union, ſo eſſential to our Government, was by Your Royal Grandfather, and is by His Preſent Majeſty, Your Royal Father, ſteddily adhered to, ſo it is with extreme Satisfaction preſumed, that the ſame Adherence will diſtinguiſh Your Royal Highness's future Reign, a Preſumption grounded upon Your many noble Endowments, but chiefly on that Foundation of all other, as well as Royal, Virtues, a generous Mind, which naturally abhors Oppreſſion and Tyranny.

Presuming on this known Generoſity, I moſt humbly intreat Your Royal Highness's gracious Acceptance of this Addreſs and Tranſlation, and beg leave to have the Honour of ſubſcribing my ſelf, with profound Reſpect and Submiſſion,

SIR,

Your Royal Highness's

Moſt humble, moſt dutiful,

And moſt obedient Servant,

N. TINDAL.

PREFACE.

WHEN Mr. Rapin firſt begun this Work, he little thought of writing a compleat Hiſtory of England. His long ſtay in our Iſland giving him an opportunity of learning our Language; and his Poſt in the Army, during the War in Ireland, even obliging him to it, he diligently applied himſelf to the reading of Engliſh Books, and particularly of ſuch as treated of the Government and Hiſtory of England, after the Norman Conqueſt. As the deſire of knowledge continually increaſes, and being maſter of his time, he was not ſatisfied with underſtanding the Nature, but wiſhed alſo to know the Original, of the Engliſh Conſtitution. To this end, he thought it neceſſary to peruſe carefully the Hiſtory of the Anglo-Saxons, who introduced this form of Government into Great-Britain. He found this Study to be very diſcouraging, the Hiſtory of the Anglo-Saxons being like a vaſt Foreſt, where the Traveller, with great difficulty, finds a few narrow paths to guide his wandering ſteps. It was this however that inſpired him with the deſign of clearing this part of the Engliſh Hiſtory, by removing the rubbiſh, and carrying on the Thread ſo, as to give at leaſt a general Knowledge. For this purpoſe, he was indiſpenſably obliged to ſhow, how the Saxons came to ſend Troops into Great-Britain, and why a Conqueſt, which had coſt them ſo much, was abandoned by the Romans. In a word, he fixed the beginning of his Hiſtory to the time of Julius Cæſar, who firſt attempted to conquer our Iſland, intending to conclude with the Norman Conqueſt. But not knowing how to employ his time better, and beſides finding, that after the Conqueſt, the Scene was changed, and from a wild Foreſt he was entered into a cultivated Country, where the way was eaſy, he reſolved to proceed. However, when he came to the Reign of Henry II, he was upon the point of relinquiſhing his Work, of which the beginning gave him no incouragement, when an unexpected aſſiſtance, not only induced him to continue it, but alſo to form the project of a much larger Hiſtory than what he at firſt intended. This aſſiſtance was RYMER's FOEDERA, communicated to our Author by the famous le Clerc, to whom, being then publiſhing at the Government's charge, the Volumes were ſent by the Lord Haliſax, a great Promoter of that noble Work.

This Collection, conſiſting then of ſeventeen Folios, which are lately reprinted with two additional Volumes, was of infinite ſervice to our Author in compiling his Hiſtory, and enabling him to clear numberleſs things which remained in obſcurity. It afforded him means, 1. To rectify the Dates in many places. 2. To diſcover a great number of errors in the beſt Engliſh, Scotch, French, Italian, and Spaniſh Hiſtorians. 3. To decide, on many occaſions, concerning the contrarieties between the Hiſtorians. 4. To inſert in his Hiſtory many Events, wholly omitted, or but ſlightly mentioned by others. In a word, it is This that chiefly diſtinguiſhes his Hiſtory from all that have appeared before this Collection was publiſhed. For it is eaſy to ſee what an advantage it was to him, ſince it contains Treaties of Peace, Truce, League, Marriages, Commerce, made by the Kings of England with other Princes; Ambaſſadors Inſtructions; their Letters and Informations, as well concerning their own Negotiations, as the affairs of the Courts to which they were ſent; very inſtructive Memoirs upon affairs confuſedly ſpoken of by the Hiſtorians; Letters Patents; Orders; Safe-Conducts; with numberleſs other Papers, which cannot be ranged under general Heads, and which are of great uſe to a Hiſtorian. All theſe Mr. Rapin was ſo well acquainted with, that he has publiſhed Abſtracts of ſeventeen Volumes, to ſhow the relation of theſe Acts to the Hiſtory of England. This Work to a Man leſs verſed in the Engliſh Hiſtory than Mr. Rapin, would require his whole life; but to him, who knew the intent and motive of every Act, it was only a diverſion. By the way, it may be added, that Mr. Rapin had a thorough knowledge of our Parties and Factions, as appears in his Diſſertation on the Whigs and Tories, publiſhed in 1717, and tranſlated into Engliſh, Dutch, Daniſh, and twice into High-Dutch.

The advantage which the uſe of RYMER's Collection, gave Mr. Rapin over all our Hiſtorians, ſerves, in great meaſure, to remove the objection of his being a Foreigner, which naturally ariſes in the mind of an Engliſhman. But if it is farther conſidered, that beſides this advantage, he not only carefully peruſed all the Engliſh Hiſtorians, but alſo confronted them with thoſe of the neighbouring States, whether they wrote in Latin, French, Italian, or Spaniſh, it muſt be owned this objection entirely vaniſhes, and that ſuppoſing his judgment and capacity equal to the Work, (which the Publick by an uncommon approbation ſeems to allow) he was in all other reſpects as well qualified as any Engliſhman can be.

As his aſſiſtances were extraordinary, ſo there's reaſon to believe his impartiality uncommon. For beſides his privilege, as a Foreigner, of freely ſpeaking the truth, without fear of offending any Party, he had no motive or intereſt to induce him to be partial to England, or any of the neighbouring States. His Life was equally ſpent in France, England, Holland, and Germany. During the ſeventeen years he was employed in this Work, he had no Poſt or Penſion, nor exerciſed any Profeſſion, which might bias him to one Nation more than another, and as he had no particular obligations to any of the forementioned States, ſo he had no reaſon to complain of ever receiving the leaſt injuſtice.

But notwithſtanding his endeavours to be entirely impartial, he plainly foreſaw, People's prejudices in favour of their own Nation, would prevent them from doing him juſtice upon ſeveral occaſions. But this was a Rock he could not avoid. How is it poſſible, for inſtance, to relate the Conteſts between the Engliſh and Scots, to the ſatisfaction of both? The War between them in the XIVth Century, concerning the Sovereignty of the Kings of England over Scotland, cannot be deſcribed with its Cauſes and Circumſtances, without exaſperating the one or the other. The Scots are perſuaded, Edward I. acted very unjuſtly with their Anceſtors, and that his Grandſon Edward III was not more ſcrupulous. The Engliſh, on the contrary, believe, their Kings had Then and long Before an unconteſtable right of Sovereignty over all Scotland, and that Edward the Firſt's War upon that account was very lawful. Our Author has declared for the Scots, as believing the Truth on their ſide. For which reaſon he has endeavoured to ſet this whole affair in the cleareſt light poſſible, thinking it the duty of a Hiſtorian, to correct ſuch errors as have gathered ſtrength from Time, or from the negligence and prejudices of former Writers.

The quarrel between Edward III and Philip de Valois, in which ſo much blood was ſpilt, is another inſtance wherein it is almoſt impoſſible to pleaſe both the Engliſh and French. Among the French, the Salic Law is a Noli me tangere. To ſatisfy them, not only the Antiquity of that Law muſt be acknowledged, but the Senſe and Extent muſt alſo be left unexamined. The Engliſh, on their ſide, are no leſs prejudiced. Without conſidering that Edward could have no right to the Crown of France, but on ſuppoſition of the authority of the Salic Law, they alledge againſt it ſuch reaſons, as are not only unſerviceable, but even prejudicial, to that Prince's Rights. Our Author however, without being reſtrained by the Fear of diſpleaſing either, has explained, in a Diſſertation at the end of Edward the Third's Reign, what is meant by the Salic Law, wherein conſiſted the Difference between the two Kings, and ſhown, that their Rights were ſo litigious, as to be very difficultly decided by that Law.

If it is hard to ſatisfy two different Nations in the recital of their Conteſts and Quarrels, it is no leſs ſo to content the Engliſh themſelves, in things wherein their opinions are divided; as for inſtance, the Prerogatives of the King, the Privileges of Parliament, the Succeſſion of the Crown, and the like. Mr. Rapin obſerves, that diſputes on theſe points were firſt ſet on foot among us in the laſt Century, by two oppoſite Parties, one whereof was for an abſolute and arbitrary Power in the King, whilſt the other endeavoured not only to diveſt him of his juſt Prerogatives, but even to render him dependent on the Parliament. Theſe two extremes he equally condemned, and as he had no motive or intereſt to incline him to either Party, he has done his utmoſt to diſcover the Truth, through the Paſſions and Prejudices of the Writers on both ſides. He has fairly confronted the Facts laid down by the ſeveral Hiſtorians, received for true, ſuch as they all agree in, and of ſuch as are variouſly related, he has admitted only thoſe that are ſupported by ſtrong evidence. The Barons Wars are alſo a Subject that can hardly be treated to the ſatisfaction of all Readers; ſome conſidering as Rebellion, what others deem a juſt defence of Liberty and Property. Mr. Rapin has declared for neither of theſe Opinions, farther than induced by ſolid reaſons, and, by means of the Fœdera, has clearly accounted for the Riſe and Progreſs of theſe Wars, which, for want of that aſſiſtance, are very confuſedly explained by others.

What moſt embaraſſed our Author, is the national Partiality of the Hiſtorians, chiefly upon two Articles, The Violation of the Treaties, and, the Succeſs of the Battles. For the firſt, where the Truth was no other way to be diſcovered, he has frequently made uſe of a very natural maxim; namely, that it is not likely the Party, to whom a Treaty is advantagious, ſhould be the firſt to break it. As for the ſecond Article, nothing is more common than to ſee Hiſtorians ſtick to own their Nation vanquiſhed, and think it incumbent on them to diminiſh its loſſes, or magnify its victories. On theſe occaſions, when our Author could not fix the ſucceſs of a Battle by the Conſequences, he has taken care to inform the Reader of the diſagreement between the Hiſtorians.

Mr. Rapin, profeſſing to write for the information of Foreigners, was obliged to give a particular account of the Engliſh Conſtitution. The following Diſcourſe therefore was ſolely deſigned for the inſtruction of ſuch as are ſtrangers to our Government, which, being different, as he obſerved, from all others, the Reader, as well as Hiſtorian, muſt always have it in ſight, leaſt wrong Ideas lead them into great Errors.

Origin and Nature of the Engliſh Conſtitution.

The Government of England is a mixt and limited Monarchy, as it is certain, all the Governments in Europe eſtabliſhed by the northern Nations formerly were. They were Monarchies, inveſted, not with abſolute and arbitrary, but with a power bounded by the national Laws. Such is ſtill the Engliſh Conſtitution, whatever changes have happened in the other European Kingdoms. The King and People make but one Body, of which the King is Head. He directs and gives motion to all the other Members, takes care of their Welfare, and ought always to have an eye to the Publick, to procure their good, and guard them againſt all impending evils By watching thus for the publick, he conſults his own intereſt, ſince, being ſtrictly united with his Subjects, he is ſure to be gainer by all the advantages he procures them.

But to enable the King to labour effectually for the good of the Kingdom, it was neceſſary to cloath him with a great Power, and aſſign him a Revenue ſufficient to live in ſplendor, in order to attract the veneration of the People. It was neceſſary to grant him Privileges approaching abſolute Power; as the command of the Armies and fortified Places; the execution of the Laws, and the adminiſtration of Juſtice in his own Name; the pardoning of condemned Criminals; the diſpoſal of all the high Offices; the calling and diſſolving of the Parliament; the rejecting of Bills he thinks contrary to the publick Good; the proclaiming Peace and War: Theſe are called the Prerogatives of the King, or of the Crown. I do not pretend to give an exact Liſt of them. I am ſenſible ſome extend them much farther: but all I mean here is, that the King has great Prerogatives, which were the effect or conſequence of the mutual agreement of the firſt Anglo-Saxon Kings with their People. The King wants nothing to render him happy and powerful. His Revenues are more than ſufficient for his ordinary expences, and to reward thoſe who diſtinguiſh themſelves by their merit, beſides the preferments in the Church, State, and Army, which he may beſtow as he pleaſes. Has he a juſt War to maintain? He is not obliged to burden his People with Taxes and Impoſitions. It is the People themſelves that voluntarily furniſh him with every thing neceſſary. Thus, without ever being under a neceſſity of heaping up riches for the future, he is ſure of finding in the purſes of his Subjects wherewithal to ſupply his preſent occaſions.

There are but two things, the Saxons did not think proper to truſt their Kings with, by reaſon of the ill conſequences, for being of like paſſions with other Men, they might very poſſibly abuſe them; namely, The Power of changing the Laws enacted by conſent of King and People; and the Power of raiſing Taxes at their pleaſure. From theſe two Articles ſpring numberleſs branches concerning the Liberty and Property of the Subject, which the King cannot touch, without breaking the Conſtitution, and they are the diſtinguiſhing character of the Engliſh Monarchy. The Prerogatives of the Crown, and the Rights and Privileges of the People, flowing from the two fore-mentioned Articles, are the Ground of all the Laws that from time to time have been made by the unanimous conſent of King and People. The Engliſh Government conſiſts in the correſpondence and ſtrict union of the King's Prerogatives with the People's Liberties. So far are theſe from deſtroying one another, that they are rather the ſtrongeſt cement of that ſtrict union, ſo neceſſary between the Prince and People. The King, by means of his Prerogatives, is able to protect his Subjects; to ſee the Laws duly executed, and Juſtice impartially adminiſtred; to defend the Weak againſt their powerful oppreſſors; to aſſiſt the Unfortunate, and puniſh the Diſturbers of the Society. On the other hand, the People, whilſt in poſſeſſion of their Liberties, confiding in the Laws and the King's care to execute them, live ſecurely without any fears for their Lives or Properties. They enjoy the fruits of their induſtry, which turns to the King's advantage, ſince from the People it is, that the King's occaſions are ſupplied. If they make their court to the Nobles, it is only when their intereſt or aſſiſtance may be neceſſary, and not out of fear of being oppreſſed, ſince the Greateſt are equally ſubject to the Laws, with the Meaneſt.

It cannot be denied, ſuch a Government is extremely proper to render both Prince and People happy. But when Kings aroſe, as ſome there were, that aimed at abſolute Power; by changing the old, and making new, Laws, at pleaſure; by impoſing illegal and arbitrary Taxes on the People; this excellent Government being, in ſome meaſure, diſſolved, by theſe deſtructive maxims, confuſion and civil Wars enſued, which ſome very wrongfully aſcribe to the fickle and reſtleſs temper of the Engliſh. On the other hand, the People have not always been contented with maintaining their Privileges, when once infringed by the King, but, for fear of the like attempts for the future, have proceeded to meaſures very deſtructive of the juſt Rights of the Crown. And this is the reaſon why the Prerogative, abuſed by ſome former Kings, runs not at preſent ſo high as formerly.

Since then the Engliſh Conſtitution conſiſts in an intimate union between the Prince and People, as between the Head and Body, it is conſequently in its utmoſt perfection and ſtrength whilſt this union ſubſiſts, and both, without mutual ſuſpicions, jealouſies, and fears, ſecurely enjoy their reſpective Rights. On the contrary, it decays and degenerates, when one endeavours to invade the Privileges of the other.

To preſerve a perfect union between the King and the People, it was neceſſary to eſtabliſh a way of communication between them. This was done by means of a Wittena-Gemot, or Aſſembly of Wiſe Men, who repreſented the whole Nation. This method the Saxons brought with them from Germany, where all publick affairs were decided in ſuch an Aſſembly, of which their Generals, choſen in time of war, were Preſidents. However, they were obliged to make ſome alterations, becauſe in Germany they had no Kings, the ſupreme Power being lodged in the Wittena-Gemot; whereas in England, their Chiefs or Leaders aſſumed the Title of Kings. Hengiſt, who firſt led led Saxon Troops into Britain as Auxiliaries, was the firſt that aſſumed this Title, probably with the approbation of the Saxons under his command. For ſince he was not naturally their King, how could he become ſo without their conſent? But it muſt be obſerved, Hengiſt may be conſidered in a double capacity. At his arrival in Great-Britain he was certainly only General of the Saxons. But after receiving the Grant of Kent from Vortigern King of the Britons, he became as much Sovereign of that Country as Vortigern was before him, and accordingly aſſumed the Title of King of Kent, but this new Title did not make him King of the Saxons, of whom he was only intruſted with the command. So, it is likely, the Saxons, in conſenting, their General ſhould become their Sovereign, did not give him an abſolute power over their Lives and Properties, ſuppoſing, what would be extremely difficult to prove, he was inveſted with ſuch a power over his Britiſh Subjects. There is a remarkable paſſage in the Hiſtory of France to this purpoſe. Clovis was King of the Francs, before he led his Army into Gaul, and his large Conqueſts there gave him no more power over his own Countrymen than he enjoyed before. This is evident from his being prevented by a common Soldier, from preſenting the Archbiſhop of Rheims, with a piece of Plate taken among the Plunder. The Soldier could not bear, the King ſhould appropriate to himſelf what belonged to all in common, ſo hewed it in pieces with his Battle-Ax [and took his ſhare.] The King, who knew he exceeded his Power, did not dare to puniſh him upon the ſpot, and though he afterwards took an occaſion to put him to death, it was upon ſome other account, wherein he might lawfully do it. It may then with good reaſon be affirmed, that the Saxon Generals, in aſſuming the Title of King, acquired not a deſpotick Power over their own Followers, by whoſe aſſiſtance they conquered Britain. Since therefore the firſt Kings had not ſuch a Power, it was neceſſary to eſtabliſh ſome way to prevent their uſurping it; and that could not be done better, than by general Aſſemblies, which conſiſting of the King, and the chiefs of the People, kept the balance even betwixt both. It muſt be further obſerved, there is one material difference between the ſettlement of the Francs in Gaul, and of the Saxons in Britain. In Gaul, the number of the Conquered was always ſuperior to that of the Conquerors. Whereas in Britain, if any Britons remained in the conquered Provinces, they were but few, and in a ſtate of Slavery. So, the Country was properly inhabited only with Saxons, Jutes, and Angles, over whom the Conqueſts made by their own Arms, gave to their firſt Kings no power but what they conſented to. We are ignorant indeed of the particulars of the agreement between the Kings and their reſpective People, but the proofs that afterwards appear, of the People's Liberty, leave no room to doubt, there was at firſt ſome regulation thereon.

It is not eaſy to know diſtinctly, who the Witan or Wiſemen were that compoſed their Wittena-Gemots. At firſt, theſe Aſſemblies might only conſiſt of the Saxon Officers, among whom the conquered Lands were divided, and who from thence became the Princes or Chiefs in the ſeveral States. In proceſs of time, the Britons having entirely abandoned their Country, the Conquerors, finding themſelves too few to cultivate the whole, ſent for a great number of Families from Germany, to whom the reſt of the Lands were given. Theſe diſtributions were thus made. The new King gave to thoſe of his Followers, who were diſtinguiſhed by their Birth, Services, or perſonal Merit, ſuch a portion of Land, on condition they ſerved the Crown on certain occaſions; which theſe parcelled out again to others, with a reſervation of ſuch and ſuch Services to themſelves. Theſe two ſorts of Poſſeſſors were called Thanes, that is, Servants: but the firſt were diſtinguiſhed by the Title of King's Thanes, which anſwers to that of the immediate Vaſſals of the Crown. Theſe, after the Norman Conqueſt, were called Barons, and afterwards Peers of the Realm. For Earl and Duke were only honorary Titles or names of Offices. It is not denied, the King's Thanes were Members of the Wittena-Gemots: but that the other Thanes were ſo, is greatly diſputed, as will be ſeen in the Diſſertation on the Government, Laws, and Cuſtoms of the Saxons. It ſuffices at preſent, that there was in each Kingdom an Aſſembly of Witan or Wiſemen, who, jointly with the King, regulated all important Affairs, made Laws and Ordinances, and impoſed Taxes. As nothing was decided but by the mutual conſent of the King and the Aſſembly, their intereſts not being ſeparate, and their aims the ſame, namely, the good of the publick, this is a clear evidence, that the eſſence of the Government conſiſted in the ſtrict union between King and People. If we look into the Hiſtories of the other European Kingdoms founded by the northern Nations, we ſhall find the like Aſſemblies under different names, as Diets in Germany and Poland, and Cortez, in Spain. It is not therefore ſtrange, the Saxons ſhould eſtabliſh in England the only form of Government known to them.

After the Norman Conqueſt theſe Aſſemblies were called Parliaments. If William the Conqueror continued them, which perhaps is not very eaſy to prove, it was not with the ſame Rights and Privileges they enjoyed under the Saxon Kings. It is true, in the following Reigns, ſome traces of them appear, which make it thought, they were not entirely aboliſhed. However, Parliaments were not frequent till King John, and Henry III, in whoſe Reign, ſeveral affirm, and perhaps not without reaſon, that the Commons, for the firſt time, ſent Repreſentatives to Parliament. Probably, the Lords and Commons, after their ſeparation, the time whereof is unknown, met in two different Houſes, ſince the Engliſh ſtill call Houſes the two Rooms, where they aſſemble, though under the ſame Roof. They ſay, the Upper Houſe, or Houſe of Lords, and the Lower Houſe, or Houſe of Commons, to denote what is expreſſed in French by the word Chamber. It is but ſince the Reign of Edward I, ſucceſſor to Henry III, that there has been an uninterrupted ſeries of Parliaments.

After the Commons became a diſtinct Houſe from the Lords, they pretended to be the ſole Repreſentatives of the People, by whom they were choſen. The Lords could pretend only to act for themſelves, or for the Body of the Nobility, as making a conſiderable part of the Nation. However this be, the Barons, of whom very likely the Parliament at firſt conſiſted, loſt by degrees many of their antient Rights, and the Houſe of Commons came to be conſidered as the Guardians of the People's intereſts. However, the Lords ſtill retain very great privileges; they are, for inſtance, the higheſt Court of Juſtice in the Kingdom; they have a power to bring in, approve, and throw out Bills; in a word, they always make an eſſential part of the Parliament. The Biſhops and Abbots, who had all along a Right to ſit in Parliament, had it continued to them after the Conqueſt. It cannot well be doubted that they ſate in the Wittena-Gemots, as King's Thanes, or Barons, ſince they were the immediate Tenants of the Crown: but it is not ſo certain, that they enjoyed this Right, as Repreſentatives of the Clergy.

The Commons, as a conſequence of their being the Repreſentatives of the People, claim an undiſputed Right of laying Taxes, and granting Money to the King. So that the Houſe of Lords in this caſe have no other power than to paſs, or throw out, the Bill, without offering to make any alterations or amendments.

Thus, the two Houſes of Parliament compoſe the Body of the Nation, jointly with the King, who is the Head. The cloſe and abſolutely neceſſary union between the King and the Parliament, appears in nothing ſo much as in the manner of making an Act of Parliament, or Law. When either of the two Houſes deſigns to bring in a Bill (for ſo is an Act called before it is paſſed) after examining and debating every Clauſe, it is ſent to the other Houſe for their approbation. If it paſſes there, it is brought to the King for the Royal Aſſent, after which, and not before, it has the form and force of a Law. But if either of the Houſes throw it out, or the King refuſes his aſſent, it comes to nothing, as if it had never been mentioned. Nothing more plainly demonſtrates, that the eſſence of the Engliſh Government conſiſts in the union between the King and his People. Take away this Union, and it becomes Confuſion and Anarchy.

Whether the Commons originally ſate in Parliament, or only ſince the Reign of Henry III, it is certain, their power by degrees is very much encreaſed, to which the maxim, that their Houſe ſolely repreſents the People, has greatly contributed. This maxim was not yet eſtabliſhed in the Reign of Henry VIII, ſince we find he applied to the Barons for a ſupply of Money. But this is not the only new Privilege they have acquired. Upon their ſeparation from the Lords, the intereſts of the two Houſes were not the ſame upon all occaſions. They have had frequent conteſts concerning their reſpective Rights. But generally the Commons had the advantage of the Lords; and no wonder, ſince they alone diſpoſe of the Nation's Money.

On the other hand, as great alterations have happened with regard to the Lords or Peers. Formerly all the immediate Vaſſals of the Crown were Barons, and, as ſuch, had a ſeat in Parliament. But now, as there are none of thoſe Lands that were called Fees of the Crown, the right of ſitting in the Houſe of Lords is annexed to the bare honorary Titles of Duke, Marquiſs, Earl, Viſcount and Baron, which give thoſe that are inveſted therewith, no power over the Shires, Cities, or Lands, whoſe names they bear, and which the King may beſtow on whom he pleaſes. However, when once theſe Titles are conferred on a Family, the Head cannot be deprived of his right to ſit in Parliament, unleſs he has been judicially condemned by his Peers, for ſome crime that renders him unworthy. But it muſt be obſerved, it is in the King's power to extend or limit, many ways, the right of ſucceeding to theſe Honours; ſo that ſometimes, though rarely, he extends it to the female, in default of the male, Line. Though a Peer only has a right to ſit in the Houſe of Lords, the King may, if he pleaſes, call the Son of a Nobleman to the Houſe of Peers in his Father's life-time. The inferior Titles are always included in the ſuperior, ſo that every Duke is at the ſame time Marquiſs, Earl, Viſcount and Baron (1). Thus all the Lords are Barons, and properly as ſuch, are Members of the Parliament, according to antient uſage. For before and long after the Conqueſt, the Lords of Parliament were conſidered only as the King's Thanes or Barons. For this reaſon, the civil Wars in the Reigns of King John and Henry III, are called, the Barons Wars. The Title of Duke was firſt conferred in England, after the Conqueſt, by Edward III, on his eldeſt Son, whom he made Duke of Cornwal. The Title of Marquiſs is much later. In the time of the Saxons, Earls or Counts were properly Governors or Chiefs of Shires or Counties, ſo called from them. William the Conqueror having diſtributed the Lands of the Engliſh among his Followers, they on whom he conferred the Title of Earl or Count, became really and truly Lords of thoſe Lands whoſe Titles they bore, ſo that they were hereditary in their Families. Afterwards, but at what time is not known, they loſt this privilege, and the Title of Earl, as was before obſerved, is become only honorary. The Viſcounts, under the Saxon Kings, were Lieutenants to the Earls in their Counties. They diſcharged the Office of High-Sheriff, which is now left to inferior Officers, whilſt the Viſcounts are ranked among the Peers, and have even the precedence of the Barons. This laſt Title was formerly general, and included the whole Body of the Nobility or Peers of the Realm, of whom the Upper Houſe of Parliament conſiſts. Next to theſe are what they call in England, the Gentry, who, though diſtinguiſhed by ſeveral Titles, as Knight, Eſquire, &c. are all included in the Body of the Commons, who in France are called, the Third Eſtate. From among theſe are choſen the Knights of the Shires, Citizens and Burgeſſes, who compoſe the Lower Houſe, to the number of five hundred and thirteen: but it ſeldom happens that all are preſent, and forty are ſufficient to make a Houſe.

What has been ſaid ſhows, how the two Houſes of Parliament are part of the Legiſlature, ſince by them the Laws are made with the Royal Aſſent. Accordingly, the Parliament has ever been very careful to preſerve its Privileges, and hinder the leaſt breach, for fear of loſing them inſenſibly, as it has happened in other Kingdoms. On the other hand, moſt of the Laws tend to maintain the Liberty and Property of the Subjects, ſo that they can be deprived of them only by Law. There are abſolutely but two ways to deprive the Engliſh of their Liberties. Either by laying aſide Parliaments entirely, or by bribing the Members to ſacrifice their Country to their ambition or avarice. Both theſe methods have been tried more than once, and for ſome time with ſeeming ſucceſs, but in the end have turned to the Confuſion and Ruin of the Projectors. The Engliſh have ever been extremely jealous of their Liberties, and this jealouſy has frequently cauſed violent motions in the Kingdom, when they have ſeen or ſuſpected a tendency to undermine their Privileges, and they have thereby preſerved the Conſtitution of their Government in much the ſame ſtate as in the beginning of the Monarchy.

In this Second Edition, the Tranſlation, which in the firſt was not ſo correct, is thoroughly reviſed and compared with the Original; but if the Stile be not yet ſo lively and agreeable as ſome could wiſh, it muſt be remembered that a fine Stile cannot be expected from one who is ſuppoſed to tranſlate Mr. Rapin. For though he was a very judicious, he was certainly no elegant, Writer. And perhaps it would be difficult to find a greater inſtance of the power of Truth on the minds of Men, than the univerſal approbation given to a Hiſtory penned in ſo naked and unadorned a manner. Indeed, Hiſtory does not require that nicety of Expreſſion, which is neceſſary in other Works; but may be read with benefit, though it wants that Perfection. However this be, care has been taken in the Tranſlation to avoid all low expreſſions, and to preſerve an even and unaffected Stile.

As it is almoſt impoſſible for a Foreigner not to fall into ſome little miſtake, particularly as to our Cuſtoms, Laws, Names, Families, and the like, theſe are all carefully noted and rectified.

Though Mr. Rapin depended not on any modern Hiſtorian in what paſſed before Henry VIII, but conſulted the antient and cotemporary Writers, and accordingly placed their Names in the Margin of his Manuſcript, yet many of theſe references are wanting, which happened, as he ſays himſelf, by the following accident. Having employed a young Man to tranſcribe his Hiſtory for the Preſs, and ordering him to leave a Blank for ſuch proper Names as he could not readily read, the Blanks in the Body of the Hiſtory were filled up by the Author, whilſt Thoſe in the Margin were forgot. This omiſſion is with great labour and pains ſupplied in the Tranſlation, and the Names of the Authors every where quoted in the Margin.

As Mr. Rapin wrote his Hiſtory for the inſtruction of Foreigners, he has paſſed over in ſilence numberleſs Facts, Particulars, and Circumſtances, which, though of little moment or uſe to a Stranger, may be agreeable, and even neceſſary to an Engliſhman. This want is in ſome meaſure ſupplied, at leaſt as far as the intended compaſs of the Work would allow, by many additional Notes.

In a word, the Tranſlator, in his eight years application to this Work, has endeavoured to render it as uſeful as he could to his Countrymen, and thinks himſelf obliged publickly to acknowledge the aſſiſtance he has received, in this ſecond Edition, from the Reverend Mr. PHILIP MORANT, Miniſter of the Engliſh Church at Amſterdam, who, beſides reviſing the Sheets as they came from Preſs, has been at the pains to compare every Paragraph with the antient Hiſtorians, and examine all the Quotations from the Fœdera, and thereby been enabled to correct ſome miſtakes, and add ſeveral Notes.

(1) This is not ſo, unleſs they have had each Title diſtinctly conferred on them. There are few Dukes that are Marquiſſes, and many Earls not Viſcounts.

SOME

Some PARTICULARS of the LIFE of Mr. DE RAPIN THOYRAS.

In a Letter to-----

SIR,

I Imagined you would be ſurprized at my backwardneſs to ſecond your deſign of writing the Life of Mr. DE RAPIN. This has given me ſome concern, for I wiſh to be of your mind, but muſt confeſs, I have hitherto been unreſolved. I know not how the publick ſtands affected; and though I ſuppoſed, with you, that the World would be glad to be acquainted with Mr. DE RAPIN, I ſhould think nothing can better ſatisfy their Curioſity, than his new Hiſtory of England; it not being poſſible, in my opinion, but in ſo voluminous a Work, an Author (undeſignedly) draws his own Picture himſelf, more to the Life than any other can do. If you ſay, this is not ſufficient, becauſe his Family and Actions are not ſeen there; I anſwer, the two Panegyricks on Mr. DE RAPIN, (in the xth Volume of the Bibliotheque Germanique, and in the Hiſtoire Literaire of February 1726) ſeem to contain all that is proper to be ſaid on theſe two heads. By this, you ſee I have not the ſame ſcruple concerning your preſent propoſal, that theſe Panegyricks may at leaſt be re-publiſhed and prefixed to his Hiſtory of England. Indeed I think it very requiſite, and, what is more, am reſolved to publiſh them my ſelf, with ſome alterations, that is, of the two I deſign to make one Diſcourſe, borrowing from each what ſhall occur to my mind, without affecting either to ſwerve from, or copy them, that there may be room to inſert ſome particulars that are paſſed over in ſilence. It may be, I ſhall go too far, contrary to my firſt intention, but however, you may be aſſured, I ſhall ſay nothing but what I have been fully informed of, and what Mr. DE RAPIN's Family are ready to juſtify. Nevertheleſs, as in all this my ſole aim is to oblige you, uſe this Letter as you pleaſe; ſuppreſs what you do not like; nay, if you think fit, be ſatisfied with the Panegyricks alone as firſt publiſhed, which perhaps would be beſt. But to begin.

Mr. DE RAPIN, counted among his Anceſtors and Relations many eminent Perſons as well of the Sword as the Gown. His Family is originally from Savoy, where it flouriſhed time out of mind (1), and enjoyed ſeveral honorable Poſts (2). As I am ignorant of their perſonal qualities, I cannot ſay whether it was through a wiſe precaution, or to perpetuate an ill-grounded enmity, that a Biſhop of Maurienne cauſed to be ingraved, in the Epiſcopal Palace, the following Inſcription ſtill to be ſeen, Caveant Succeſſores noſtri a familiâ Rapinorum, i. e. Let our Succeſſors beware of the RAPINS. On the other hand, this Family pretends, that their external Luſtre was impaired ſolely by their ſteady adherence to the Laws of Honour and Juſtice. This is inſinuated by the Author of the following Verſes, which are not quoted for their Elegance.

Pour n' avoir ſans beſoin ſu prendre,
On voit tomber cette maiſon:
Si l' Effet eut ſuivi ſon nom,
Elle auroit de quoi ſe defendre.

i. e. This Family, for being too honeſt to invade the Property of others, is gone to decay. Had they been given to what their Name implies, they would have wherewithal to ſupport themſelves.

But to draw nearer to Mr. DE RAPIN, I ſhall proceed to four Brothers of that name, who ſettled in France in the Reign of Francis I. (3)

One, a Clergyman, was Almoner to Queen Catharine de Medici, who deſired him of the Duke of Savoy. Beſides the Preferments he enjoyed in his own Country, he was called the King's Orator, but what that means I cannot tell.

His Brothers (of whom but one has left Iſſue) were all three Soldiers, and embraced the Reformed Religion; for the ſake of which, very probably, they abandoned their Country.

The eldeſt was a Colonel of Foot, and Governor of Montauban, with authority over the neighbouring Governors. His Name is among thoſe of the Viſcounts, who commanded the Troops of the Reformed in the Southern Provinces of France. Letters, ſtill extant, ſhow how well known he was to King Henry IV, to Lewis and Henry Princes of Condé, to Admiral Chaſtillon, and many other Perſons of the firſt Quality.

All we know of one of his Brothers, called Peter, is, that a Commiſſion of Captain of Horſe muſt, by all circumſtances, belong to him; but of this we cannot be ſure, becauſe the Name is not expreſſed.

Philibert, another Brother, was Gentleman to the Prince of Condé, and afterwards his Steward (4). He had no leſs reputation in military (5), than capacity in civil, affairs (6): but both proved fatal to him, as they drew upon him the enmity of the Catholicks, and particularly of the Parliament of Toulouſe (7), who cauſed his head to be ſtruck off at the very time he was come, by the King's Order, to regiſter the Edict of Peace of 1568.

The French Hiſtorians frequently ſpeak of theſe two Brothers. Father Daniel alone does not mention them, and paſſes over in ſilence, this cruel execution (8). The reaſon does not appear at firſt, for he cannot ſay, this Sen-

(1) By the Titles of this Family it appears that the Rapins were Noble in the year 1250. The Branches that are in Savoy pretend to a greater Antiquity: But of that I can ſay nothing.

(2) It is known in general, that ſome of the Rapins at ſeveral times were Syndics of the Nobles of their Country; others were deputed by the Nobility to go in their Name and do Homage to the Duke of Savoy their Sovereign.

(3) Between the Years 1525 and 1547.

(4) Maitre d' Hôtel de ſa Maiſon, that is, he had the management of the Prince's Houſe in the higheſt Senſe of the Word, and not as we underſtand the Term Steward at preſent.

(5) Bello ſtrenuus, ſays Thuanus, lib. 32.

(6) In fine, Rapin was in great Repute amongſt his own Party. The Conſpirators of Toulouſe made choice of him to treat in their Name with Fourquevaux, which is a clear Evidence that he had a Head to manage, as well as a Hand to act. Annals of Toulouſe, Ann. 1568. The Conference ſpoken of in this Paſſage, was held to ſee whether there was any way of Accommodation between the two Parties; but it proved fruitleſs, and only ſerved to exaſperate them more than ever. Shortly after a Battle was fought in the City, which laſted ſome Days, wherein the Proteſtants, who were numerous there, but however inferiour to the Catholicks, loſt three thouſand Men, and were in the end chaſed out of the City. A ſolemn Proceſſion was inſtituted in Commemoration of this Event. When Peace was reſtored, the Reformed complained of this Proceſſion, as a thing which revived the Memory of the Troubles, whereupon it was prohibited for the future; nevertheleſs it has been all along continued; only it was removed from the 12th of May, to the 17th, on ſome pretence or other.

(7) Homo bellis ſuperioribus----clarus ob idque Toloſanis inviſus. Thuan. lib. 32.

(8) It might be alledged there are no proofs of it. But ſince Thuanus and Mezerai, with whom few Writers can be compared for Faithfulneſs, ſpeak of it, it muſt be interred either there were proofs in their Days, or they were warranted by the Notoriouſneſs of the Fact. And what puts it out of all queſtion is, that M. de la Faſile, who writ laſt at Toulouſe, the Annals of that City, of which he was Syndic, though he takes notice that the Arret againſt Rapin is not to be found (having been doubtleſs razed out of the Regiſters for the Parliament's Honour) yet ſays more of the Matter than all thoſe that went before him.

tence, how unjuſt ſoever it may be ſuppoſed, is only a private affair, which therefore he might omit if he pleaſed; ſince it is viſible, on the contrary, that ſuch an Event, rendered memorable (1) by its circumſtances and conſequences, ought neceſſarily to have place in Hiſtory. But when we conſider, we find this able Hiſtorian has very artfully managed this omiſſion for two uſes; firſt, to extinguiſh, as far as in him lay, all remembrance of a rage which caſts a blemiſh on the Papiſts; ſecondly, to render the Reformed odious, when he comes to ſpeak of the ravages committed by the Admiral's Army, ſome time after, about Toulouſe Mean while, with regard to theſe ravages, he was not ſo free as he deſired, but was obliged to ſpeak of them in general terms, for he could not deſcend to particulars, without diſcovering the connexion between theſe ravages and RAPIN's death, by which they were both occaſioned and juſtified. But what he ſlightly mentions, Thuanus (2) and Mezerai relate more at large, and ſet in a true light. Mezerai, who is more circumſtantial, and informs us, there were then in Toulouſe eight thouſand regular Troops, which added to the great number of Inhabitants, deprived the Reformed of all hopes of becoming maſters of the City, ſays expreſsly, that the Hugonots---- ſet fire to all the Lands and Houſes of the Counſellors, on the Ruins whereof the Soldiers writ with ſmoaking Coals, RAPIN'S REVENGE.

Peter de Rapin, Baron of Mauvers, Son of Philibert, was Governor of Mas-Granier, one of the Cautionary-Towns granted to the Reformed in Guienne. He was a Soldier from his youth, and attended King Henry IV in all his expeditions. Moſt part of that time, he received not a Farthing from his Eſtate, which threw him into great ſtraits, as well as many others for the ſame reaſon. The King himſelf was in no better circumſtances, as may be inferred from his anſwer to Mr. DE RAPIN, who having loſt his Horſe, beſought his Majeſty to give him wherewithal to buy another: I would, ſays he, with all my heart, but ſee, I have ſcarce a Shirt to my back. But Mr. DE RAPIN's ſufferings in the religious Wars were not confined to what paſſed in the Army. He thrice ſaw his Houſe burnt and battered down in his life, and every thing plundered. It is true, he had amends made him the laſt time, as far as was poſſible, and in a manner which muſt have been very agreeable to him: for the Catholick Gentlemen of the Neighbourhood, by whom he was eſteemed and beloved, meeting together, reſolved to ſupply him with neceſſaries to plough and ſow his Lands; and as thoſe troubles laſted but eight months, when they were appeaſed, he found a Crop ready, and all his Eſtate, except his Houſe, in as good condition as the moſt diligent Owner could have kept it. On another occaſion, he had a pleaſure without any allay: upon a rumour of his death, he read himſelf a Letter from Queen Mary de Medici, expreſſing her great ſorrow to his Family. He married a Daughter of Mr. de Lupé, Lord of Maravat, Captain of fifty Men at Arms, Governor of Mauvezin a Cautionary-Town, and a Major-General.

He left a numerous Iſſue, of whom his ſecond Son James, Sieur de Thoyras (3), was the darling of his Parents. His Father left him more than any of the other younger Children, and his Mother gave him moreover that portion of the Eſtate of John de la Ferriere, Vidame (4) of Chartres, and one of the Heads of the French Proteſtants, which fell to her in right of her Mother. He was deſigned for a Soldier, like his Brothers; but his Mother willing to have him near her, was for breeding him a Scholar, to which the Father conſented. After he had finiſhed his Studies, he was admitted Advocate in the Court of the Edict (5) of Caſtres, and, contrary to the cuſtom of the Country, where Perſons nobly deſcended are never of that Profeſſion, he practiſed it both at Caſtres and at Caſtelnaudary, and Toulouſe, above fifty years, to the day of his death. It is true, I include the four years he ſpent at Paris, where he went, upon news of Mr. Pelliſſon his Brother-in-law, being arreſted with Mr. Fouquet. Nothing paſſed in that famous affair, but what he was privy to, and he was very ſerviceable in many reſpects. He was one of the three concerned in the Factum, and ſupplied all we find there relating to the Roman Law. I ſaw in France a Letter ſent to him by Mr. Fouquet from the Baſtile, thanking him for it in the moſt affectionate manner. All that knew him, of whom ſeveral are now living, have always deſcribed him as one of the prime Advocates of his time, and very eminent for his impartiality and integrity. His Wife, who died at Geneva, where ſhe was ſent by the King's order, for refuſing to turn Papiſt, was Siſter of George and Paul Pelliſſon, whoſe Memory is ſtill recent. Her Father and Grandfather were Judges in the Parliament of Toulouſe, and in the Court of the Edict of Caſtres. Raymond Pelliſſon her Great Grandfather, after having been Maſter of the Requeſts, and Ambaſſador to Portugal, was at laſt firſt Preſident of the Senate of Chamberi, and Commandant in Savoy, whilſt in poſſeſſion of the French. I ſay nothing of a very extraordinary affair that befell him, and on which ſeveral Authors (6) have enlarged, nor of his Deſcendents above-named, becauſe I ſhould only copy what is to be found in the Supplement to Moreri's Dictionary printed at Amſterdam in 1716. This Family, from whence have ſprung ſeveral illuſtrious Perſons (7), is originally Engliſh (8), and comes from an Attorney-General to the Prince of Wales when in Guienne.

I proceed now to Mr. DE RAPIN, who is properly the ſubject of my Letter. PAUL DE RAPIN, Sieur de Thoyras, younger Son of James, was born at Caſtres, March 25. 1661. He began to ſtudy Latin under a Tutor, his Father kept in the Houſe, after which he was ſent to Puylaurens, and from thence to Saumur. At this laſt place, when about ſeventeen, he had a quarrel with a Friend, upon a ſlight occaſion, and they immediately challenged each other. But whether they loſt time in fetching their Swords, for being Students they ſeldom wore any, or the Duel held long, Night came whilſt they were engaged, and then, Mr. DE RAPIN's Sword broke near the hilt without his perceiving it. His Adverſary immediately ſeeing it, generouſly told him. Whereupon the Combat ceaſed, and embracing each other, they returned together to Town. Some time after he had another quarrel with a perſon much older than himſelf, who rudely joſtled him as he was walking through a narrow and difficult paſſage. Mr. DE RAPIN fell upon him, but they were quickly parted by the People there preſent. He ran for his Sword, and ſpeedily returning, found the Perſon gone, neither could he meet with him, though he carefully ſought him ſeveral days. Some time after, he heard the Man was gone to Paris, where Mr. DE RAPIN followed him. He was no ſooner arrived, but he was ſeized by a Guard of the Marſhals of France. This accident, which he did not expect, believing his deſign very ſecret, becauſe he had not imparted it, was occaſioned by the advice his Uncle Pelliſſon received from Saumur, from whence he was informed of the ſuppoſed cauſe of his Nephew's journey, which might be of ill conſequence, and withal, of the place where his antagoniſt might be heard of. Mr. Pelliſſon fearing a Duel would enſue, which, however it ended, would ruin his Nephew, acquainted the Marſhals of France with the matter, Mr. DE RAPIN, who was yet very young, affording them opportunity to ſecure him, by going directly to his Uncle's. The Marſhals having heard both Parties, condemned the aggreſſor to lie in Priſon at Fort-l'Eveque, till Mr. DE RAPIN ſhould conſent to his diſcharge, which he did about a month after, at the deſire of the Prince of Furſtemberg Biſhop of Strasburg, who was then at Paris. Mean while, the next day after the ſentence, the Priſoner's Brother, who was reckoned a good Sword's-man, meeting Mr. DE RAPIN in the Street, accoſted him, and, talking to him ſo as to renew the quarrel, Mr. DE RAPIN anſwered him by drawing his Sword, and wounded him before they were parted. But this rencounter was kept ſecret by the advice of the Friends of both Parties, for fear of incenſing the Marſhals.

The beginning of the year 1679, Mr. DE RAPIN returned to his Father's, in order to apply himſelf cloſely to the ſtudy of the Law. But before he had made any progreſs, he was obliged, with many other young Gentlemen, to commence Advocate, upon notice of an Edict which was publiſhed ſoon after, that a Doctor's Degree ſhould not be given to any perſon, who had not ſtudied five years in ſome Univerſity.

This ſame year, the Courts of the Edict were ſuppreſſed, by which Mr. DE RAPIN's Family were forced to remove to Toulouſe. Not long after, Mr. DE RAPIN perceiving the ill ſtate of the Reformed, and that, probably, it would daily grow worſe, deſired his Father's conſent to quit the Profeſſion of Advocate for That of Arms. His Father, without abſolutely denying his requeſt, returned ſuch an anſwer, as only tended to gain time. Not that the Requeſt ſeemed to him unreaſonable and ill-grounded: but he was apprehenſive this new way of life, where ambition is more fired than in any other, would expoſe his Son to great temptation, when he ſhould find by daily experience, that it would not be poſſible to riſe to any tolerable Poſt, ſo long as he adhered to his Religion; whereas that obſtacle being removed, he might hope to be advanced like the reſt. This ſtate of Uncertainty made him very remiſs in the ſtudy of the Law. He pleaded however one cauſe as Advocate, but ſtopped there, and applied himſelf more cloſely than ever, to the reading of good Authors, to the Mathematicks and Muſick, in which he acquired great skill.

In the year 1685 his Father died, and two months after, the Edict of Nantz was revoked. Whereupon Mr. DE RAPIN retired into the Country with his Mother and Brothers. But as the perſecution, ſhortly after, was at the higheſt, he departed with his youngeſt Brother and arrived in England, in March 1686.

Not long after, there came to London a French Abbé of Quality, and Friend of Mr. Pelliſſon, who made Mr. DE RAPIN frequent viſits, and introduced him to Mr. de Barillon the French Ambaſſador, from whom Mr. DE RAPIN received great civilities. Theſe Gentlemen would have perſwaded him to wait upon the King, aſſuring him of a gracious reception. Mr. DE RAPIN, who could not ſee what pretenſions he had to ſuch an honour, and beſides, was apprehenſive that a Propoſal ſeemingly ſo advantagious might tend to his prejudice, excuſed himſelf in the handſomeſt manner he could. This affair put him upon ſeriouſly reflecting on his preſent ſituation, continually teazed about his Religion, by the Marquiſs of Seiſſac and other French Catholicks then at London, but eſpecially by the Abbé, who, though extremely courteous and civil, always turned their Converſation to Controverſy. Perceiving therefore it was not poſſible for him to defend himſelf unprepared, againſt a Man who was maſter of theſe Subjects, and managed them with great art, he returned into the Country, from whence he was come to viſit the Abbé, without taking leave. He knew himſelf guilty of ill manners, but choſe to be ſo, rather than remain any longer expoſed.

As he had then no expectations in England, he made but a ſhort ſtay, and going over to Holland, where he had relations, he liſted himſelf in a Company of French Voluntiers at Utrecht, commanded by Mr. de Rapin his Couſin German.

The ſame year, Mr. Pelliſſon publiſhed his Reflections on Religious Differences, and ſent them to Mr. DE RAPIN, charging him to tell him his opinion, which he did very largely, as he ſaid himſelf, retorting, in ſeveral places, Mr. Pelliſſon's expreſſions. But nothing of this appears among his Papers. Not that I think it either loſt or miſlaid, but rather believe that out of modeſty he never took a Copy, imagining that what he could ſay on ſuch a Subject was not worth preſerving.

He was ſtill in the Company of Voluntiers when they went into England with the Prince of Orange. But in 1689, the Lord Kingſton made him Enſign in his own Regiment, with which he paſſed into Ireland. At the Siege of Carrickfergus, juſt after his arrival, he had the good fortune to gain the eſteem of the Officers of the Regiment, and eſpecially of Lieutenant Colonel Fielding, who, in leſs than a year, procured him a Lieutenancy.

In the beginning of 1690, the Regiment to which Mr. DE RAPIN belonged, was given to Lieutenant General Douglas, who, upon the recommendation of three French Colonels of the Army, took more notice of him than of the reſt of the Subalterns, and afterwards put a very great confidence in him.

After the battle of the Boyne, in which Mr. DE RAPIN was preſent, General Douglas was detached with his own, and twelve other Regiments of Horſe and Foot, to make a diverſion about Athlone, and, if poſſible, ſurprize the Town. He appointed Mr. DE RAPIN and Mr. Carles, now Lieutenant General in Portugal, to act as Quarter-Maſter General of his little Army. This Siege not proving ſucceſsful, the Town being ſtrongly garriſoned, General Douglas was recalled. Mr. DE RAPIN, who was ſent before to receive orders, found the King at the head of a Line, who ſtopping him, asked ſeveral Queſtions, to which Mr. DE RAPIN made ſuch anſwers, as ſerved to remove ſome ill impreſſions infuſed into his Majeſty concerning Douglas's Conduct.

At the aſſault of Limeric, he was ſhot in the Shoulder, and next day the Siege being raiſed, was forced to ride four miles on Horſeback in great anguiſh. He was left with the reſt of the wounded, (among whom was his Brother, who was ſhot through the Body) and ſo loſt his Regiment, which was ordered to the North. But ſhortly after, he heard General Douglas had procured him a Company, and cauſed him to be admitted, though abſent. It was the ſame Company where he had been Enſign, and where was ſtill the ſame Lieutenant which made Mr. DE RAPIN extremely uneaſy.

The next year, General Douglas had orders to go to Flanders. Mr. DE RAPIN, whom he deſigned for his Aid de Camp, not being in a condition to attend him, by reaſon of his wound, adviſed him to take another, to whom the General ſoon gave a Company in the Scotch Guards, of which he was now Colonel. The Campain opened in Ireland with the taking of Baltimore, where Mr. DE RAPIN had the ſatisfaction to be ſerviceable to a poor diſtreſſed captive Family, with whom he was acquainted the foregoing year. He was afterwards at the Siege of Athlone; and in the aſſault, made through the River that runs under the ſtrongeſt Rampart of the Town, a bold and brave action, and which ſucceeded, as it is thought, contrary to the expectation of the Generals. In this Town were left two Regiments of different Nations, commanded by the Lieutenant Colonels, who underſtood not each other's Language, and were both very jealous of their Power, which might have occaſioned diſputes. Happily, Mr. DE RAPIN belonged to one, and his intimate Friend, a Captain of good ſenſe, to the other, who were both equally eſteemed by their reſpective Commanders; ſo whenever any accident happened that was like to breed a quarrel, theſe two Officers, who were unprejudiced, agreed between them upon what was to be done, and adviſed it each with conſtant ſucceſs.

After that, Mr. DE RAPIN was ſent ſucceſſively to ſeveral Garriſons, and among the reſt to Kilkenny, where he frequently waited on the Biſhop, who ſeemed pleaſed with his Converſation. This commerce would have been very agreeable, could he have peaceably enjoyed it, but the warm and daily conteſts between the Mayor and the Officers, ſcarce allowed him a moment's repoſe. He often uſed his endeavours to ſtifle them, and prevented their proceeding to extremities. Mean while, his fear that things would be brought to a deſperate paſs, made him gladly embrace the opportunity of commanding two Companies in another place. Some time after, he rejoined his Regiment at Kingſale, where he contracted an intimate Friendſhip with Sir James Waller who commanded there.

About the end of the year 1693, he received an order to repair to England, without any reaſon aſſigned; but at the ſame time, a Letter from Mr. Belcaſtel informed him, he was to be Governor to the Earl of Portland's Son. He could not conceive whence this proceeeded, having never had any ſuch thoughts; and it was ſome time before he knew, he was recommended by the Lord Galloway. He came therefore to London and entered upon his Office. Here was an end of all his hopes of riſing in the Army, to ſuch Poſts as ſeveral younger Officers of his acquaintance have obtained. All the amends he received, was leave to reſign his Company to his Brother, who died in 1719, Lieutenant-Colonel in a Regiment of Engliſh Dragoons. It is true, ſome time after, the King granted him a Penſion of a hundred Pounds a year, till he ſhould better provide for him, which never happened. So he enjoyed his Penſion ſeveral years, but upon that Prince's death, it ceaſed, and a Place was given him, which brought him in but a moderate income.

His new Employment obliged him to be ſometimes in Holland, often in England, and alſo in France, whilſt the Earl of Portland was Ambaſſador, till the young Lord was fixed at the Hague, where he learned his Exerciſes. Whilſt he was there, in the year 1699, Mr. DE RAPIN married Mariamne Toſtart, an advantagious match, of whom I ſhall ſay nothing, as ſhe is living. This did not hinder him however from minding his Pupil, and attending him in his Travels. He began then with Germany, where they made ſome ſtay at ſeveral Courts, and particularly at Vienna. From thence they paſſed into Italy, by way of Tyrol, where they ſaw Marſhal Villeroy a Priſoner, who gave Mr. DE RAPIN a Letter for Cardinal d' Etrées then at Venice.

At his return, his employment ceaſing, he repaired to his Family, who in his abſence lived at the Hague, where he ſpent ſome years. During that time, he improved his leiſure Hours, as far as the common duties of Life would allow, in reſuming the ſtudy of Fortification, and eſpecially of Hiſtory, which led him to draw many general and particular Genealogical and Chronological Tables. But what was moſt agreeable to him, and, as he thought, moſt inſtructive, was his being Member of a Society or Club ſtill in being, to the erecting of which he was proud of contributing, where ſeveral Perſons of Learning and Merit reaſoned upon ſuch Subjects as occurred, and ſpoke their opinion on ſuch queſtions as were uſually propoſed. Mean while, as he found his Family increaſe, he reſolved to ſacrifice to the good of his Children the pleaſures of the Hague, by retiring to a cheaper Country. Accordingly, he removed in 1707 to Wezel in the Duchy of Cleves. He found there a good number of French Refugees, among whom were ſeveral Officers, Men of Quality, with whom he lived very friendly; and he was alſo received as kindly as could be expected, by Perſons of the higheſt rank, who were chiefly concerned in the Government of the Country, and who, on all occaſions, gave him marks of their favour.

The way of living at Wezel, different in many reſpects from that of the Hague, rendered him more than ever maſter of his time, and allowed him almoſt as much leiſure as he could deſire, to ſtudy the Hiſtory of England, and the nature of the Government. This was a more extenſive deſign than perhaps it ſeems at firſt, for it obliged him, not only to peruſe all the Engliſh Hiſtorians, but alſo thoſe of other Nations, who had any affairs with the Engliſh, in order to procure light, and be aſſured of the truth of the facts, by confronting the ſeveral Authors. He would have found it very difficult to ſucceed, or rather would, probably, have miſcarried, had he not before qualified himſelf for reading, in their original Tongue, all the Books he was obliged to conſult. Beſides Greek and Latin, which he learnt at the College, and had ſince improved, he underſtood Italian and Spaniſh, not to mention High and Low-Dutch, of which indeed he was not ſo much maſter. As for Engliſh, which was the moſt neceſſary of all, he had made that his particular Study.

Though he was of a very ſtrong conſtitution, yet a ſeventeen years conſtant application to compoſe his Hiſtory, entirely ruined his health. About three years before his death, he found himſelf quite ſpent, and frequently ſeized with violent pains in his Stomach. He might have recovered if he would have relinquiſhed his Work, and unbent his mind for a time. Of this he was ſenſible, but could not reſolve it, as he ought. All he indulged himſelf in, was, not to riſe before ſix a-Clock, after which it was impoſſible for him to ſleep or lie in his bed. As to his diverſions, of which walking was the moſt uſual, he was quickly tired of them, and, if his indiſpoſition permitted, returned to his Work, which was the cauſe of his illneſs, and properly his ſole delight. At laſt, a violent Fever, attended with an oppreſſion upon his Lungs, carried him off the ſeventh day, being the 16th of May 1725.

He has left one Son and ſix Daughters.

From what has been ſaid, it appears that Mr. DE RAPIN was naturally grave. This led him, whilſt he was in the ſervice, to ſeek the converſation of the Serious, which prejudiced not only ſeveral of his Comrades, but even ſome of his Superiors, againſt him, who would have had him partake of all their diverſions. But, on the other hand, it gained him the Eſteem and Friendſhip of many Perſons of Merit, who were in conſiderable Poſts. We are not however to imagine, he was an enemy to Mirth: he could be merry on occaſion, though not ſo frequently, nor ſo immoderately as many are. Nay, he writ ſeveral little things in Proſe and Verſe, with humour and gaiety: but as they were on light or ludicrous Subjects, and deſigned only for a preſent amuſement with his Friends, he never thought them worth reviſing, and I queſtion whether there is one to be found among his Papers. What has been ſaid of his application to his Study, and Works, is alſo to be underſtood with this limitation, that it never hindered him from embracing all opportunities to ſerve his Friends, and reconcile their differences.

Thus have I done what lies in my power, to make known Mr. DE RAPIN's Character. I am ſenſible, that to have a compleat Idea of him, we muſt, beſides what I have ſaid, conſider him in his Writings, but this is what I ſhall not undertake. It belongs to the Publick to declare what opinion he there gives of himſelf, and to determine whether he ſhows good Senſe and Judgment in his manner of diſcovering the motives of Actions; and above all, whether he has juſtly obſerved an entire Impartiality, ſo eſſential to a good Hiſtory.

This is all I have to ſay to you concerning Mr. DE RAPIN. I wiſh it may be ſatisfactory, and am,

SIR,

Yours, &c.

INTRODUCTION

TO THE

HISTORY of ENGLAND.

CONTAINING

The Extent of Great-Britain or Albion. Whence ſo called. The Firſt Inhabitants, Cuſtoms, and Manners of the Britons. Their Way of Fighting, and Commerce. Their Religion. The Druids. Their Government. Original of the Iriſh, Scots, and Picts.

GREAT-BRITAIN is, without contradiction, the largeſt, fineſt, and moſt conſiderable Iſland in Europe: Nay, one might venture to affirm, ſhe holds the firſt Rank among all the Iſles of the known World; and it would be, perhaps, no difficult taſk to prove, ſhe juſtly deſerves this Preference. But not to enter into ſo needleſs a Diſcuſſion, it ſuffices to ſay, very few can be compared to her for Temperateneſs of Air, Number of Inhabitants, and all the Neceſſaries as well as Comforts of Life. If ſhe wants any thing of foreign growth, her Wants are eaſily and plentifully ſupplied by her Commerce, which brings home to her whatever is rare and excellent in all Parts of the World.

I ſhall not undertake to diſplay here all that may be ſaid to the Advantage of this Iſland, or repeat all the Encomiums beſtowed on her, as well by the Ancients as Moderns. The preſent flouriſhing State of Great-Britain ſufficiently ſpeaks for her. Her Fleets, by which ſhe reigns Sovereign of the Britiſh Seas (1); her Troops, whoſe Valour makes them every where dreaded; her illuſtrious Generals, who have carried the Terror of her Arms to the utmoſt Bounds of Europe, exalt her much Higher than all I can ſay in her Praiſe. Beſides, every one knows, this truly fortunate Iſle, by her Riches and the excellent Conſtitution of her Government long ſince eſtabliſhed, enjoys a Happineſs unknown to the reſt of the World.

I don't queſtion but the Figure England has made for ſome time, inſpires many Perſons with a Curioſity to learn by what Steps ſhe is arrived to that Height of Grandeur and Power, which renders her ſo formidable to her Neighbours. It was this Imagination that led me to publiſh the preſent Hiſtory in French, for the Benefit of thoſe who not underſtanding the Engliſh Tongue, cannot ſatisfy their Curioſity by reading the Hiſtories writ in the Language of the Country. I am apt to believe this Work muſt needs meet with a favourable Reception, if the Hiſtory itſelf does not ſuffer by the Hiſtorian's Defects. But

As Great-Britain has all along been divided into two Parts, namely, England and Scotland, I muſt warn the Reader, that my Deſign is only to write the Hiſtory of England in particular. Though the Neighbourhood of theſe two States has been productive of ſeveral Events common to Both, their Hiſtories are nevertheleſs diſtinct from each other. And therefore, I ſee no ſufficient Reaſon to induce me to imitate ſundry Hiſtorians who have joined them together, on pretence that the two Kingdoms in the laſt Century were united under one and the ſame Sovereign. As for the particular Hiſtory of England, to which I intend to confine myſelf, I will venture to ſay, it contains as great Variety, with as many entertaining and remarkable Events, as moſt Hiſtories hitherto extant. It is true indeed, it has its dry and barren Places, eſpecially in the Beginning; but this is an Imperfection common to it with the Hiſtories of France, Spain, and all the reſt of the Kingdoms founded by the Northern Nations. As there were but few Men of Letters among the Nations, that, like a Deluge, over-ran the Roman Empire, there were conſequently but few Writers who took care to tranſmit to Poſterity, Memorials of their Hiſtories. This Hiſtory, like moſt others, may be compared to a River which ſwells in proportion to its Diſtance from the Fountain-Head, and grows immenſely great where it falls into the Ocean. But as England is a Part, and That the moſt conſiderable of Great-Britain, it will not be improper to prefix to the Hiſtory of that Kingdom, a general Account of the Iſland, of the firſt Inhabitants, their Cuſtoms, Manners, Government and Religion.

THE ISLAND of ALBION or BRITAIN was ſcarce known to the Romans till the Time of their Emperors. Julius Cæſar was properly the firſt that diſcover'd it to them, by carrying thither the Roman Eagles, and by the Account of his two Britiſh Expeditions, the Particulars whereof he has given in his Commentaries. He ſays, it is an Iſland in the ſhape of a Triangle: He ſets down the Length of each Side, and tells us, the whole Circuit of the Iſle meaſures about fifteen hundred Miles, or five hundred French Leagues. After ſuch a Deſcription, one cannot but wonder at what Tacitus ſeems to aſſert, and Dion Caſſius poſitively affirms, that Britain was not diſcovered to be an Iſland till the Government of Julius Agricola, that is, in the Reign of Veſpaſian, Titus, or Domitian. Was it poſſible for Cæſar's Commentaries to be unknown to theſe Hiſtorians? (1)

(1) Well may the Engliſh be called Lords of the Britiſh Seas, ſince the Royal Navy of England conſiſts of 7 Men of War of 100 Guns, 13 of 90, 16 of 80, 23 of 70, 19 of 60, 47 of 50, (that is, 125 of the Line of Battle) beſides 23 of 40, 9 of 30, and 25 of 20: In all 182. See Burchett's Preſ. to his Hiſtory.

Tac. Life of Agric. Dio. Caſſ. l. 39.

Extent of Great-Britain.

Great-Britain, as Cæſar obſerved, being almoſt Triangular, if it be conſidered as bounded by three Right-lines, forming a perfect Triangle, the three Sides together may be reckoned about fifteen hundred Miles. But allowing for the Windings of the Coaſt, they are found to make about eighteen hundred Miles, or ſix hundred French Leagues in Compaſs. The ſhorteſt Side, which looks towards France, and reaches from the North-Foreland in Kent (2) to the Land's-End (3) in Cornwall, contains about three hundred Miles. The Weſtern Side, over againſt Ireland, from the Land's-End to the northermoſt Point of Scotland, may be about eight hundred Miles in length, and the third or Eaſtern Side about ſeven hundred.

Camd. Brit.

Etymology of the Word Albion. Camden.

The Names of Albion and Britain, by which this Iſle has been known, are both of ſo ancient a Date, that their Origin is not to be trac'd. To Conjecture only, recourſe has been had in this Caſe. The firſt of theſe Names, ſay ſome, was received from a certain Giant, Son of Neptune. Others derive the Name Albion from the Greek Word Alphon, ſignifying White, becauſe the Coaſts, when viewed at a diſtance, look of that Colour. Some again imagine Albion comes from the Celtick Word Alp or High, the Land appearing ſo as you approach it from the Continent (4).

Etymology of the Word Britain.

As for the Origin of the Name Britain, we find, among the Antiquaries, variety of Opinions or Conjectures, the Principal of which are theſe Four. The firſt, that the Name of Britain was given to the Iſland by Brutus, a Trojan Prince.

Somner.

The ſecond is Somner's, a learned Engliſhman, who ſuppoſes that becauſe of the violent Motion of the Sea which waſhes the Coaſts of Great-Britain, this Name may come from the Britiſh Word Brydio or Rage. The third, eſpouſed by Camden, Sir William Temple, and others, is founded upon the Word Brith, ſignifying in the Britiſh Tongue, Woad, becauſe the ancient Britons uſed to dye their Skins blue with that Plant.

Bochart in Canaan.

The fourth is Bochart's: That famous Antiquary believed, the Phœnicians coming to buy Tin in the Iſland of Albion, gave it the Name of Barat-Anac, that is, the Land or Country of Tin, which being by the Greeks mollified into Britannia (5) was adopted by the Romans. This Etymology ſeems to be confirmed by the Græcians calling the Iſles of Scilly, Caſſiterides, which ſignifies in Greek the ſame as Barat-Anac in Phœnician.

Strabo, l. 2.

Examination of the four Etymologies.

If I may be allowed to ſpeak my Opinion of theſe four Etymologies, the Firſt ſeems to be founded altogether upon a Fable. The Second, deriving the Name, Britain from a Britiſh Word ſignifying Rage, is, I think, unwarrantable; becauſe the Iſland receiving this Name from Foreigners, as will be ſhown preſently, it is not likely they ſhould take it from the Britiſh Language, of which probably they were ignorant: Beſides, it is not Fact that the Sea rages more on the Coaſt of Great-Britain than in other Places. Conſequently its Motion not being uncommon, could not give occaſion to derive this Name from a Word ſignifying Rage. The Third, deriving the Name from the Word Brith or Woad, is the moſt generally received. But however, it is liable to one Objection, which thoſe that embrace it, ought to remove: and that is, the Name of Britain was certainly given to the Iſland by Foreigners. This is evident from the Natives never ſtiling their Country Britain, or themſelves Britons. Their true Name is Cumri or Cumbri, from whence Cambria, the Name of Wales to this Day among the Welſh. Now it is by no means probable, that Foreigners ſhould make uſe of a Britiſh Word to form the Name of this Iſland. So, the Fourth Opinion, viz. Bochart's, ſeems to me the moſt natural. It can't be ſaid to be unlikely that the Phœnicians, the firſt Traders to this Iſland, ſhould give it the Name of Barat-Anac, or the Land of Tin. Suppoſing this, it is probable the Name paſſing from the Phœnicians to the Grecians, and from theſe laſt to the Romans, was changed into That of Britannia (6). However this be, we have nothing to truſt to in this Matter but very doubtful Conjectures. The late Inſtances of the Names given to new-found Lands are ſo many Demonſtrations, that Caprice has as great a ſhare as Reaſon in coining theſe new Names. A Saint's Day, the Name of a Leader or Pilot, the firſt Object that chanced to preſent itſelf to view, an Accident happening at the Time of the Diſcovery of theſe new Lands, have uſually ſerved for Foundation to the Names aſſigned them. So that perhaps the Conjectures of Camden and Bochart are as little to the Purpoſe with reſpect to Britain, as Ours would be, if ignorant of the occaſion of the Names given to the ſeveral Parts of America, we ſhould endeavour to trace them from the Language, Cuſtom, or Commerce of the Natives.

Origin of the Britons.

We are as much in the Dark concerning the Origin of the firſt Inhabitants of the Iſland of Albion, for in all likelihood it was peopled by Colonies from different Places, and at different Times. Endeavours therefore have been uſed to give us ſome light into this Matter from their Cuſtoms, Manners, Religion, and Form of Government. But before I proceed to what has been conjectured on this Head, it will be neceſſary juſt to touch upon the Fabulous Story of Brutus, publiſhed by Geoffrey of Monmouth, a Writer of the XIIth Century. Not that it deſerves Notice; but being mentioned by almoſt all the Engliſh Hiſtorians, it ſeems hardly pardonable to paſs it over in Silence. Beſides, it is the part of a good Hiſtorian not only to relate Matters of Fact, but alſo to guard his Readers againſt the Fictions obtruded upon the World for Truths.

Cæſar. Tacitus.

Geoffrey of Monmouth, a Benedictin Monk, penned in Latin a Hiſtory of Britain, and dedicated it to Robert Earl of Gloceſter natural Son of Henry I. King of England. In this pretended Hiſtory Britain is ſaid to receive her Name from Brutus, the Firſt of her Kings. What the Hiſtorian relates is as follows:

The Story of Brutus.

Brutus, Son of Sylvius, Grandſon of Æneas, had the misfortune to kill his Father as he was ſhooting at a Deer. As he could not or would not, after this fatal Accident, ſtay any longer in Italy, he retires into Greece, where gathering together the Deſcendants of the Trojans that were brought thither after the Deſtruction of their City, he puts to Sea with them, and after long wandering on the Mediterranean, enters the Atlantick Ocean, and performs Wonders in ſeveral Places, particularly in Gaul againſt Goffarius King of Aquitain. At length, guided by an Oracle, he comes and lands in the Iſland of Albion, at a Place where Totneſs now ſtands in the County of Devon. The Iſland was at that time inhabited by Giants of the Race of Cham, whoſe Chief or King was Gog-Magog. Brutus and his Companions, though few in Number, not only keep their ground, but root out the Giants and get poſſeſſion of the Iſland, which Brutus from his own Name called Britain. Before his Death, he divided his Dominions among his three Sons. Locrin or Loegrin had for his Share Loegria ſo called from him, the ſame with England now, excluſive of Wales, which was the Share of Camber, Brutus's ſecond Son, and from him named Cambria. Albanact the youngeſt, had the Country ſince called Scotland, to which he gave the Name of Albania. (7)

Having laid theſe Foundations, the Author continues his Hiſtory, giving an Account of the various Revolutions that happened in the Iſland, under the Kings Succeſſors of Brutus, whoſe Names he relates with ſome of their Actions. But as to the Time of their Reigns he is not ſo exact, ſetting down neither when they began, nor how long they laſted. He is contented with ſaying, Brutus's Arrival in Albion was twelve hundred years after the Flood, and ſixty-ſix after the Deſtruction of Troy. This Hiſtory, publiſhed in ſo dark an Age, was greedily received, particularly by the Welſh, the Poſterity of the antient Britons. But it brings with it ſo many Marks of Forgery, that it is looked upon by all that have examined it with any Attention, as a Fiction of Geoffrey himſelf, or ſome other Author, whom he has too implicitly followed.

After rejecting this Fable, I wiſh it were in my Power to give a ſatisfactory Account of the Origin of the Britons. But that is impoſſible. We muſt be ſatisfied with the Conjectures of Cæſar, Tacitus, and ſome more modern Authors: The moſt probable Accouut ſeems to be this:

(1) Tacitus ſays, Hanc oram noviſſimi maris, tunc primum Romana Claſſis circumvecta, Inſulam eſſe Brittanniam affirmavit. Theſe Words, tunc primum, as appears by the Context, muſt refer to the Government of Agricola. This is Rapin's Obſervation. But after all Tacitus might ſay this, and yet have ſeen Cæſar's Commentaries. For in Cæſar's Time Britain was only ſuppoſed to be an Iſland, but not known to be ſo by the Romans, till Agricola's Fleet ſailed round it. Dion Caſſius lived about a hundred Years after Tacitus; in the latter end of the 2d, and the beginning of the 3d Century.

(2) Called by the Romans Cantium.

(3) Belerium.

(4) Alpin, in the Phœnician Tongue, ſignifies a High Mountain; and Albin, in the ſame Language, ſignifies White. The Derivation from Albin ſeems to be countenanced by the Britiſh Poets, who call Britain, Inif-wen, i. e. the White-Iſland. See Selden's Notes on Poly-olbion, p. 20.

(5) The Termination —tania, ſignifying in Greek, Region, ſhows, according to Camden, that this Word was formed by the Greeks, juſt as Mauritania, Luſitania, Aquitania, &c. Rapin. It is a queſtion whether there is any ſuch Greek Word as —Tania ſignifying a Country.

(6) A modern Author gives the following Derivation. The Phœnicians having paſſed the Streights, met with no Iſland in the Ocean comparable to theſe now called the Britiſh Iſles. Theſe therefore by way of Eminence they called Britban, that is, Outer, or Iſlands in the Outer-Sea, in Oppoſition to thoſe in the Mediterranean, which they called the Inner-Sea. From Britban, Britannia naturally flows. Le Clerc.

(7) The Name of Loegria is loſt; Cambria is retained by the Welſh, as Albany is by the Scots. But this is no Proof of the Origin of theſe Names, being ſuch as Geoffrey of Monmouth related. Rapin.

That

That Great-Britain was peopled by the Celtæ or Gauls, deſcended from Gomer Son of Japhet, is univerſally acknowledged. Of This the Name Cumri (1), by which the Welſh call themſelves ſtill in their Language, and ſeveral other Reaſons, will not ſuffer us to doubt. Beſides, the numerous ſwarms of Gauls that over-ran ſo great a Part of Europe and Aſia, make it credible, they neglected not to ſend Colonies into Great-Britain which lay ſo near them. The Affinity, taken notice of by Antiquaries, between the Gauls and Britons with reſpect to Religion, is a farther Confirmation of this Opinion. It is true indeed, the Belgæ are ſaid by ſome Writers to ſettle in the Eaſtern, the Spaniards in the Weſtern, and the Hibernians or Iriſh in the Northern Parts of Great-Britain. But this is not inconſiſtent with the common Opinion. The Belgæ were no other than Gauls, and the Spaniards, as well as the Iriſh or Scots, were, according to ſome Writers, Colonies of the Celtiberian-Gauls that inhabited along the Weſtern Coaſts of Spain. But ſuppoſing it were not very certain, that theſe Spaniards were Celtiberians, it can't be denied, that the Southern Part, now called England, was peopled by the Gauls. This is the moſt probable Account of the Origin of the Britons.

Camden. Brit. p. xiv. &c.

Manners and Cuſtoms of the Britons.

As for their Manners, Cuſtoms, Religion, and Government, though mentioned by Cæſar in his Commentaries, ſhould we confine ourſelves to what he has ſaid, our Knowledge would be but very imperfect. A fuller Diſcovery of theſe things muſt be drawn chiefly from the Authors who writ after the Romans were become Maſters of Britain. As the Britons did not at once, but by degrees, alter their Cuſtoms and Manners, what theſe Authors ſay of the Britons of thoſe Days, may be preſumed to agree in many reſpects with the antient Inhabitants of the Iſland.

Cæſar Com. l. v. Tacit. vit. Agricol.

The Britons were generally tall and well-made, and, like moſt of the Iriſh at this Day, yellow-hair'd. Their Conſtitution was ſo good, that, according to Plutarch, they frequently liv'd a hundred and twenty Years. This length of Days was probably owing to their Sobriety and Temperance as much or more than to the Wholſomneſs of the Air. The uſe of Cloaths was ſcarce known in the Iſland. None but the Inhabitants of the Southern Coaſts cover'd their Nakedneſs with the Skins of wild Beaſts careleſly thrown over them, not ſo much to defend themſelves againſt the Cold, as to avoid giving Offence to the Strangers that came to traffick with them. They were wont by way of Ornament to make Inciſions in their Bodies in the Shape of Flowers, Trees and Animals, which with the Juice of Woad they painted of a Sky-colour that never wore out. Theſe Scars are by Tertullian term'd Britannorum Stigmata.

Solinus Plin. Hiſt. Nat. l. xxii. c. 1.

They liv'd in Woods, in Hutts cover'd over with Skins, Boughs or Turf. There are People now in the North of Scotland that are ſaid to have no other Houſes. I remember alſo to have ſeen in Ireland poor People living in a Hutt cover'd only with green Turf, and not above three or four times bigger than their Body. I was told, they liv'd quietly in theſe Habitations, without ſtirring abroad unleſs to provide for their Subſiſtence, and, contented with Milk and Potatoes, gave themſelves no farther trouble. This may ſerve to give us an Idea of the way of living as well among the antient Britons, as, perhaps, among many other Nations. Their uſual Food was Milk, and Fleſh got by Hunting, their Woods and Plains being well ſtock'd with Game. As for domeſtick Fowls, Hens and Geeſe, if they bred any, it was for their pleaſure, being ſtrictly forbid by their Religion to eat them, as Cæſar expreſly obſerves. Neither did they eat any Fiſh, though the Rivers and the Sea that ſurrounded them, were plentifully ſtor'd with them. Their Towns or rather Villages were only a confus'd parcel of Hutts plac'd at a little diſtance from each other, without any Order or Diſtinction of Streets. They generally ſtood in the Middle of a Wood, the Avenues whereof were defended with ſlight Ramparts of Earth, or with the Trees that were fell'd to clear the Ground. Notwithſtanding this their plain and ſimple Manner of living, ſo remote from the Luxury of other Nations, they were as quick of Apprehenſion as their Neighbours the Gauls, and, if Tacitus may be credited, of greater Penetration. Diodorus Siculus does not ſcruple to prefer their Honeſty and Integrity before That of the Romans. One Cuſtom however they had that ſeem'd deteſtable to other Nations, though for their part they thought it very innocent: And that was, for ten or a dozen Brothers or Friends to live all together and have their Wives in common. This Cuſtom continued a long time among them, though in other reſpects they were grown very civiliz'd by their Commerce with the Romans, when Maſters of this Iſland. A Britiſh Lady being upbraided one day by Julia, Severus's Empreſs, with a Cuſtom ſo contrary to the Practice of other Nations, is ſaid, by an Hiſtorian, to return this bold Anſwer, The Roman Ladies have little Reaſon to reproach us upon this Account, ſince we do publickly with the beſt of our Men no more than what they do privately with the worſt of Theirs, Freedmen and Slaves. The Britons, without doubt, differ'd from more civiliz'd Nations in many other Cuſtoms (2). But their Country being little frequented by Foreigners, we know but few Particulars about them, eſpecially with regard to the Time before the Arrival of the Romans. We muſt therefore be ſatisfied with what we find ſcattered here and there in Authors, who it may be, for the moſt part, knew but little of the Matter.

The Britons manner of Fighting.

Cæſar gives a great Character of the Valour of the Britons, and their going to Battle with undaunted Bravery. But it is hard to underſtand his Deſcription of their way of Fighting. He ſays, they fought for the moſt part in Chariots, from whence, furiouſly driving among their Enemies, they flung their Darts: but when they had to deal with the Horſe, they left their Chariots to fight on Foot with Advantage. Now this ſeems very ſtrange. For my part, I own I can't conceive what Advantage they could have to engage the Horſe rather on foot that in their Chariots.

Cæſar Com. l. iv.

Their Trade.

As well ſituated for Trade as the Britons were, we don't find they had any large Veſſels, or ventur'd to Sea beyond the Coaſts of Gaul. Their chief Commerce was with the Phœnician Merchants (3), who, after the Diſcovery of the Iſland, exported every Year great Quantities of Tin, with which they drove a very gainful Trade with diſtant Nations. But notwithſtanding all their Care to conceal the Fountain-Head, the Greeks (4) diſcovered it at length, and came and traded alſo to the ſame Place.

Their Religion.

This Commerce being carried on in the furtheſt Parts of Cornwal only. Foreign Merchants had no Opportunity to know exactly the State of the Iſland. For which Reaſon we are ignorant at this day, of many Particulars, concerning the Religion and Government of the Britons, that probably would have been tranſmitted down to us, if other Nations had met with Information. A full account therefore muſt not be expected of theſe Matters, ſince Here, as well as in many other Caſes, Conjectures only are all we have to go upon. Thus much however is known, that the Britons had in a manner the ſame Gods with the Gauls. For Inſtance, Dis and Samothes were Deities equally worſhipped by both Nations. But the Britons had a very particular Veneration for Andate, Goddeſs of Victory, to whom they ſacrificed their Priſoners of War.

The Druids. Cæſar, l. vi. Pliny, l. xvi. c. 44.

We know moreover the Druids, as well among the Britons as Gauls, had the Care and Direction of all Religious Matters (5). The Name Druid comes from the Word Deru, ſignifying in the Britiſh or Celtic Language, an Oak, like Drus in the Greek (6). For the Miſletoe that grows on the Oak was looked upon by them as a moſt ſacred Thing, and the greateſt Bleſſing from Heaven (7). The Druids were held in ſuch Veneration by the People, that their Authority was almoſt abſolute. No publick Affairs were tranſacted without their Approbation: not ſo much as a Malefactor could be put to death without their Conſent. Religion not only afforded them a Pretence to

The Druids, now, while Arms are heard no more,
Old Myſteries and barb'rous Rites reſtore:
A Tribe who ſingular Religion love,
And haunt the lonely Coverts of the Grove.
To theſe, and theſe of all Mankind alone,
The Gods are ſure reveal'd, or ſure unknown.
If dying Mortals Doom they ſing aright,
No Ghoſts deſcend to dwell in dreadful Night:
No parting Souls to griſly Pluto go,
Nor ſeek the dreary ſilent Shades below:
But forth they fly Immortal in their Kind,
And other Bodies in new Worlds they find.
Thus Life for ever runs its endleſs Race,
And like a Line, Death but divides the Space;
A Stop which can but for a Moment laſt,
A Point between the Future and the Paſt.
Thrice happy they beneath their Northern Skies,
Who that worſt Fear, the Fear of Death deſpiſe:
Hence they no Cares for this frail Being feel;
But ruſh undaunted on the pointed Steel;
Provoke approaching Fate, and bravely ſcorn,
To ſpare that Life which muſt ſo ſoon return. Lucan.

(6) Father Pezron, in his Book of the Original of the Celtic Language, will have both Greek and Latin to come from Celtic. If ſo, the Greek Word Drus muſt come from the Celtic Deru. Rapin.

(7) Ad Viſcum Druidæ, Druidæ cantare ſolebant. Ovid. They called the Miſletoe, as they ſtill call it in ſome Part of Wales, the Pren-Awyr. Theſe Groves where they worſhipped were called Lhwyn, thence probably the Word Llan ſignifying now in Welſh a Church. Theſe Groves were Incloſements of ſpreading Oaks, ever ſurrounding their ſacred Places. In which were 1. Gorſeddau, or Hillocks where they ſat and pronounced their Decrees, and ſpoke Orations to the People. 2. Carneddi, or Heaps of Stones on which they had a peculiar Mode of Worſhip. 3. Cromlechi, or Altars on which they perform'd the Solemnities of Sacrifices. Rowland, p. 69.

concern themſelves in the Government, but authorized them, as they pretended, to intermeddle in private Affairs. Under colour that there is hardly any caſe but where Religion may be concerned, they clamed a Power to exclude from the Sacrifices all ſuch as refuſed to ſubmit to their Determinations. By that means they became very formidable, this ſort of Excommunication being deemed ſo infamous, that the Perſon on whom it was pronounced, was avoided by All. The Chriſtian Clergy in this Point have but too cloſely imitated the antient Druids. The Chief of the Druids was a ſort of Pontiff or High-Prieſt, who had Authority over all the reſt. This Dignity was Elective: and ſometimes when the Candidates were of equal Merit, ſuch Heats and Broils have raged among them, that they have fallen to Blows before the Election was over.

The Bards. Cæſ. Com. l. ix.

The Bards among both Britons and Gauls, were Prieſts of an inferior Order to the Druids. Their Buſineſs was to celebrate the Praiſes of their Heroes in Verſes and Songs, which they compoſed and ſung to their Harps (1). They continued in being a long time. There were ſome even after the Romans had entirely abandoned the Iſland.

The Eubates.

A third ſort of Prieſts, as well in Britain as Gaul, were the Eubates (2), who applied themſelves chiefly to the Study of Philoſophy, and the Contemplation of the wonderful Works of Nature, as Marcellinus informs us.

Religion of the Gauls and Britons.

In ſhort, as the Britons and Gauls had properly but one and the ſame Religion, 'tis very probable one of theſe Nations received it from the other. Cæſar was of Opinion, that the Gauls had it from Britain, becauſe, as he obſerves, thoſe that were deſirous to have a thorough Knowledge of this Religion, went thither to ſtudy it. But this Argument at moſt ſerves only to prove, that their religious Myſteries were celebrated with greater Exactneſs in Britain, it may be by reaſon of the Revolutions that happened in Gaul, by the Wars raiſed there by the Romans. Buchanan, not ſo poſitive as Cæſar, ſays, it can't certainly be known which of the two Nations received it from the other. 'Tis very likely however, the Gauls when they peopled Britain, brought their Religion with them. Be that as it will, ſince the Britiſh and Gauliſh Druids had the ſame Notions, and there is nothing certain concerning the Firſt, we can form no Idea of their Religion, but by that of the Gauls, which is a little better known to us. This Knowledge however is of no great Extent, the Druids having left nothing in Writing, it being their Cuſtom to teach their Diſciples every thing by heart. A Burgundian Author has been at the Pains to collect ſome of the Druidical Maxims or Rules, of which the moſt remarkable are theſe:

Gollut. Mem. de Franch. Comt.

Maxims of the Druids.

None muſt be inſtructed but in the Sacred Groves.

Miſletoe muſt be gather'd with reverence, and if poſſible in the Sixth Moon. It muſt be cut with a Golden Bill.

Every thing derives its origin from Heaven.

The Arcana of the Sciences muſt not be committed to Writing, but to the Memory.

Great Care is to be taken of the Education of Children.

The Powder of Miſletoe makes Women fruitful.

The Diſobedient are to be ſhut out from the Sacrifices.

Souls are immortal.

The Soul after Death goes into other Bodies.

If the World is deſtroyed, it will be by Fire or Water.

Upon extraordinary Emergencies, a Man muſt be ſacrificed.

According as the Body falls, or moves after it is fallen; according as the Blood flows, or the Wound opens, future Events are foretold.

Priſoners of War are to be ſlain upon the Altars, or burnt alive incloſed in Wicker, in Honour of the Gods.

All Commerce with Strangers muſt be prohibited.

He that comes laſt to the Aſſembly of the States, ought to be puniſhed with Death.

Children are to be brought up apart from their Parents, 'till they are fourteen Years of Age.

Money lent in this World wil be repaid in the next.

There is another World, and they who kill themſelves to accompany their Friends thither, will live with them there.

Letters given to dying Perſons, or thrown on the funeral Piles of the Dead, will faithfully be delivered in the other World

The Moon is a Sovereign Remedy for All things, as its name in Celtic implies.

Let the Diſobedient be excommunicated; let him be depriv'd of the Benefit of the Law; let him be avoided by All, and render'd incapable of any Employ.

All Maſters of Families are Kings in their own Houſes, they have a Power of Life and Death over their Wives, Children and Slaves.

Theſe Articles may ſerve to give us a Specimen of the Principles and Religion of the Druids, which flouriſh'd a long while in Great-Britain as well as in Gaul. It ſpread as far as Italy, as appears by Auguſtus's Injunction to the Romans not to celebrate its Myſteries. There were Women, as well as Men, Druids. It was a female Druid of Tungria (3), that according to Vopiſcus foretold to Dioclefian (when a private Soldier in Gallia) that he would be Emperor of Rome (4).

The Government of the Britons.

If the Religion of the Britons may be learnt by That of the Gauls, an Idea of their Goverment may likewiſe be formed the ſame way. As both Nations were of Celtic Extraction, they had, very probably, the ſame Form of Government. In order therefore to know the Nature of the Britiſh Government, recourſe may be had to what was in uſe among the Gauls. From the Time of the founding of Rome, the Gauls were divided into ſeveral petty States, with a Head or King over each. Some of theſe being more powerful than the reſt, kept their Neighbours in a ſort of Dependance, and one of them, upon great and imminent Dangers, was by common Conſent choſen chief Commander, whoſe Power was limited, as well as the Time of his Adminiſtration. During his Office, he was conſidered as a Soveriegn Magiſtrate, having Power to put the Laws in Execution, and act as Captain-General of all their Forces. Livy (according to the Cuſtom of the Romans) calls this Magiſtrate, King. But a modern Author, who believed he underſtood better the Nature of that Dignity, affirms the Title of King not to be at all proper for the Perſon inveſted with it, and therefore calls him only Paramount, or one ſuperiour to the reſt. However this be, the Britons may be ſuppoſed to have had much the ſame Form of Government, ſince we find the whole Country between the Tine and the Channel was divided into ſeventeen petty States, with each its Head, dignified by Authors with the Name of King. When Julius Cæſar invaded Britain, the Command of their Army was conferred by the Britons on Caſſibelanus King or Chief of the Trinobantes; and in the Time of Claudius, Caractacus King of the Silures was choſen General. In the Map annexed, the Names, and Situation of theſe States are laid down. Theſe Nations without doubt, depending on each other no farther than Neceſſity compell'd them, had frequent Quarrels and Conteſts. But we have no certain Knowledge of their Affairs; and therefore the Beginning of their Hiſtory can be dated no farther back than Cæſar's Invaſion. From thence to the Time of their being freed from the Dominion of the conquering Romans, the Thread may in ſome meaſure be carried on, though ſeveral large Gaps occur, which 'tis not poſſible to fill up, by reaſon of the Fewneſs of the Authors that have treated of this Subject. But before I begin, it will be neceſſary to premiſe a brief Account of the Picts and Scots, Inhabitants of North-Britain.

S. Julian Orig. of the Burgund.

Pomp. Mel. l. iii.

If the Britons aſpire to a very ancient Original, by calling themſelves Deſcendants of Brutus, Great-Grandſon of Æneas, the Scots ever jealous of the Glory of their Neighbours, reſolve not to yield to them even in this imaginary Honour: Nay, they go beyond them, and lay Claim to a much greater, but withal a no leſs fabulous Antiquity. Their Hiſtories are full of their Nation being founded by Gathelus Son of Cecrops, King of Athens; or, as ſome ſay, Son of Argus, fourth King of Argos, jointly with Scota Daughter of Pharaoh King of Egypt. This Fable is dreſſed up in the following Manner.

The fabulous Origin of the Scots. Hector Boethius. Buchanan.

Gathelus being forced to quit his native Country, to avoid the Perſecution of his Enemies, puts to Sea in company with ſome Friends who would not forſake him. After ſeveral Adventures too long to relate, he comes into Egypt and ſerves under Moſes in Pharaoh's War with the Ethiopians. At length, upon Moſes leaving Egypt, Gathelus

(4) Rowlands in his Mona Antiqua imagines the Second Sight (which he ſeems to believe) called Taiſh in Scotland, to be a Relick of Druidiſm, and builds his Conjecture upon this noted Story related by Vopiſcus, who ſays, Dioclefian, when a private Soldier in Gallia, on his removing thence, reckoning with his Hoſteſs, a Druid Woman, ſhe told him he was too penurious, but that he needed not to be ſparing of his Money, for after he ſhould kill a Boar, ſhe aſſured him (looking ſtedfaſtly in his Face) he would be Emperor of Rome. Theſe Words made great Impreſſion upon him, and he was afterwards much delighted in hunting and killing Boars, often ſaying when he ſaw many made Emperors, and his own Fortune not much mending, I kill the Boars but 'tis others that eat the Fleſh. However, many years after, one Arrius Aper, Father-in-law of the Emperor Numerianus, graſping for the Empire, treacherouſly ſlew him, for which Fact being brought by the Soldiers before Dioclefian (then become a prime Commander in the Army) he aſked his name, and being told he was called Aper (i. e. Boar) without further Pauſe ſheathed his Sword in his Bowels, ſaying, Et hunc aprum cum cæteris, which done the Soldiers ſaluted him Emperor.

having ſignaliz'd himſelf by many brave Actions, ſucceeds him in the Command of Pharaoh's Army, who gives him his Daughter Scota in marriage. Thirty-nine Years after, Gathelus, terrified by an Oracle foretelling the Deſtruction of Ægypt, ſails from thence with a great Number of Greeks and Ægyptians who adhere to his Fortune. He makes ſeveral Attempts to ſettle in Africa, but not ſucceeding, roves about uncertain of his Fate, and at laſt lands at a Port on the weſtern Coaſt of Spain, calling the Place Portus Gathali, from whence came the Name of Portugal. [Here the Author of this Fable forgot that Gathelus ſpoke Greek and not Latin.] After ſome ſtay, Gathelus leaving a Colony here, ſteers his Courſe farther Northward, and ſettles in a Country, from his own Name call'd Gathelicia, or Galicia. Some time after, his Son Hiberus embarking with ſome of his Father's Followers, ſails towards the North, and leads a Colony to an Iſland by him nam'd Hibernia, and afterwards Ireland. As this Iſland was not then very populous, the Natives gladly receive the New-comers, and mixing with them, ſoon became one Nation under the general Name of Scots, from Scota Mother of Hiberus.

It would be loſt time to refute a Fable that brings its own Confutation along with it. Neither ſhould I have mention'd it, had not Buchanan inſerted it in his Hiſtory of Scotland, and ſhewn the Abſurdities of it to remove the Prejudices of Thoſe of his Countrymen who ſtood up in its defence. This may be call'd the fabulous Origin of the Scots. The Account given for Truth by the Writers that are leſs prepoſſeſs'd in favour of the Antiquity of their Nation, is as follows:

A probable Account of the Origin of the Scots.

The Iſland of Iren, called by the Romans Hibernia, and by the Engliſh and Scots, Iren-landt or Ireland, had been long poſſeſs'd by the Scots from Scythia in Europe, when a Colony of Spaniards came with a deſign to ſettle there, much about the time that the Carthaginians became Maſters of Spain. The Number of theſe Foreigners not being very conſiderable, the Natives, far from being alarmed, willingly admitted them, and aſſigned them Lands to cultivate. Buchanan ſuppoſes theſe Spaniards to be deſcended from a Colony of the Celtiberians that were ſettled in Spain. The good Reception theſe met with in Ireland, drew others thither: inſomuch that in the end the Iſland grew very populous, and the two Nations mixing together became one People under the Name of Scots. In proceſs of time, the Land being over-ſtockt, abundance of Families threw themſelves into the Ebudes or Hebrides, Iſlands ſituated North of Ireland, which being ſmall, were likewiſe in time as well peopled as Ireland itſelf. The Scyths or Scots are ſaid to land in Ireland not long after the Flood, and the Spaniards to arrive there in the Year of the World 3380.

Arrival of the Picts in Britain. Bede, l. 1. c. 1.

The Hebrides being thus peopled by the Scots, certain ſtrange Ships came and offer'd to land. Theſe Ships were fill'd with Picts, a German Nation inhabiting the Countries now called Mecklenburg and Pomerania. They were roving about according to the Cuſtom of the northern Nations, in queſt of new Habitations, their Country being too populous to find them a Subſiſtence (1). They demanded of the Scots ſome part of their Iſles to ſettle in. The Scots replied, the Soil was ſo barren, that it was incapable of ſupplying them all with Neceſſaries. But withal inform'd them, that a large Iſland call'd Albion lay not far diſtant, where the northern Parts being thinly inhabited, they would infallibly find room enough, offering them aſſiſtance in caſe of Oppoſition. The Picts ſatisfied with this Diſcovery, ſteer'd directly to Albion, and finding but few Inhabitants where they landed, ſettled without much trouble in the northern Parts.

The Scots, having been long deſirous to extend their Habitations into Albion, where they hoped to find greater Plenty than in their Iſlands, laid hold of this Opportunity to ſhare in the new Settlement (2). The Picts were not diſpleaſed to ſee ſuch Numbers flock over, for beſides the Buchan. Need they ſtood in of their Aſſiſtance againſt the Attacks of the Natives of Albion, they could not poſſibly have ſubſiſted long in that Country, if the Scots had not ſupplied Picts and Scots unite. them with Wives to perpetuate their Colony. But this was done upon condition the Heirs of the Women ſhould have the Preference before thoſe of the Men in the Succeſſion to the Kingdom they were going to eſtabliſh. This Law, Bede ſays, was in force in his time. The two Nations, being thus united together in one common Intereſt, compell'd by degrees the antient Inhabitants of Albion to retire to the Southward, and leave them in poſſeſſion of all the Country lying North of the Tine. At length, their They ſeparate. Numbers being mightily increas'd, they agreed to ſeparate; whether the Difference of their Laws and Cuſtoms occaſioned frequent Quarrels, or for ſome other unknown Reaſons. The Scots choſe the Weſtern Part, as neareſt Ireland, with the Hebrides, and the Picts took the Eaſtern as oppoſite to Germany (3). After the Separation, the two Nations began to be diſtinguiſhed from one another, and govern'd each by their own Laws. The Scots that inhabited Albion began to be diſtinguiſhed from Thoſe that remained in Ireland and the adjacent Iſles. The Former were called Albins, and the Latter, Iriſh. Hence comes likewiſe the Diſtinction between Great Scotland or Ireland, and Little Scotland or North Britain. The Albin Scots ſtrengthned by continual Supplies from their Brethren the Iriſh, increas'd to ſuch a degree, that in the end growing much more powerful than the Picts, they utterly deſtroy'd them. But this happened not 'till many Ages after their Separation.

Diſtinction between the Scots, and Great and Little Scotland. Camd. Deſc. of Scot.

It is difficult for Amity and a good Underſtanding to remain long between two bordering Nations. Jealouſy and oppoſite Intereſts furniſh them with too frequent Occaſions of Quarrel. The Picts and Scots were no ſooner parted, but they began to fall at variance about ſome trifling Affair. The Conteſt being inflam'd, they were upon the point of coming to an open Rupture by the Inſtigations of the antient Inhabitants, who fomented the Diviſion to the utmoſt of their Power. Theſe laſt, whom I ſhall for the future call Britons, though I know not when that Name was firſt given them, began to repent of ſuffering theſe Foreigners to ſettle in the Iſland. Wherefore, at this ſo ſeemingly favourable an Opportunity, they thought it their Intereſt to kindle a War which could not fail to be fatal to both Parties, and might even prove equally deſtructive of Both. As the Britons were in moſt danger from the Scots by reaſon of their Neighbourhood to Ireland, they offer'd their Aſſiſtance to the Picts to drive the Scots out of the Country, in expectation afterwards to find an opportunity to do the ſame by thoſe they were now ſo deſirous to ſide with. The Scots being inform'd of this Alliance, turn'd their Thoughts to Ireland, and applied for Aid to King Ferchard, who ſent over his Son Fergus. This young Prince finding the Albin-Scots in a ſort of Anarchy, without a Chief or Head but what they choſe upon extraordinary Occaſions, and repreſenting to them the Inconveniences attending ſuch a State, they reſolved to inveſt him with Sovereign Authority. Fergus therefore was the firſt King of Scotland properly ſo call'd, for Great Scotland or Ireland not only had been govern'd by Kings many Ages before; but if the Iriſh are to be credited, was the moſt antient Monarchy in the World. Fergus is ſaid to arrive in Scotland in the Year of the World 3627, about the Time Alexander the Great made his Entrance into Babylon. But this Pretenſion is ſo ſtrongly conteſted, it muſt not be too eaſily admitted.

Buchan.

Fergus, as ſoon as he was ſeated in his Throne, made great Preparations for the War againſt the Picts, without neglecting however the Means to avoid it. He repreſented to them by his Ambaſſadors that the Conteſt between the two Nations being of little moment, might eaſily be decided without coming to Blows, would both ſides but agree to hearken to reaſon: That it was to be feared their weakening one another, would afford their Neighbours and common Enemies the Britons an opportunity to deſtroy both Nations, which it was eaſy to perceive was their Intention. This Remonſtrance made ſuch Impreſſion on the Picts, that ſuddenly altering their firſt Deſign, they entered into a ſtrict Alliance with the Scots againſt the Britons. Fergus thus ſtrengthened by the Aſſiſtance of the Picts, march'd againſt the Britons, and gave them Battle, in which their King Coilus was ſlain. After this Defeat, the Britons finding themſelves too weak to reſiſt the two northern Nations, ſue for Peace. Fergus ſhortly after, returning to Ireland, was caſt away and drowned near the Place where Carick-Fergus now ſtands (4).

This is the Account of the Scotiſh Hiſtorians concerning the Settlement of the two Nations that inhabited North-Britain. From the Arrival of Fergus to the Roman Invaſion, they pretend things remained in much the ſame State without any conſiderable Alteration in the Iſland, or of the Inhabitants. From the Channel to the Tine, the Country was poſſeſſed by the Britons, and divided into ſeventeen petty States or Kingdoms. From the Tine to the utmoſt Bounds of the North, the Picts (5) inhabited the Eaſtern, over againſt Germany, and the Scots the Weſtern Parts, oppoſite to Ireland, from which they were parted by a very narrow Channel. The Scots count fifteen Kings from Fergus to Ederus, who reigned in Scotland when Cæſar invaded Britain.

Diſpute about the Settlement of the Scots in Great-Britain.

Though one ſhould think the Scots beſt knew the Origin of their own Monarchy, yet this Antiquity of Theirs is greatly conteſted by ſeveral famous and learned Engliſh Writers. Inſtead of admitting what the Scots advance, they pretend to demonſtrate that the Nation was not ſettled in Great-Britain 'till the beginning of the Sixth Century. This Diſpute appears at firſt ſight to be of little Conſequence, the Scots being able to plead too long a Preſcription to apprehend their Right of Poſſeſſion may be called in queſtion. On the other hand, it does not ſeem to be of much Benefit to the Engliſh to conteſt with them the Honour of this Antiquity, ſuppoſing it to be imaginary. Notwithſtanding, as Religion was concerned in the Caſe, the Diſpute was carried on with great Warmth. The Presbyterians among their Objections againſt Epiſcopacy advance, that the Church of Scotland was governed by Presbyters only, call'd Culdees (1), before there were any Biſhops in the Country; whence they would infer that Eſpiſcopacy is not of divine Inſtitution. The Engliſh Biſhops anſwered this Objection by denying the Fact, affirming, the Church of Scotland was ſo far from being govern'd by Presbyters, that it was not yet in being, the Scots not ſettling in the Iſland before the Year of our Lord 503. According to the Engliſh then, eight hundred Years of the Time the Scots aſcribe to their Settlement in Great-Britain muſt be taken away. This Difference is ſo conſiderable, that one can hardly think the Scots ſhould be ſo much miſtaken. Is it poſſible, the forty Kings that are pretended to ſit on the Throne of Scotland, from Fergus I. to Coran, who reigned in the Year of Chriſt 501, were imaginary Kings only? On the other ſide, it is no leſs difficult to believe that their learned Adverſaries would lay ſo great an Error to their Charge, were they not perſuaded they had good Proofs to ſupport their Opinion. As the Generality of my Readers are but little concerned in this Diſpute, it is not, I ſuppoſe, expected that I ſhould fully relate the Arguments urged on both Sides, they being the Subject of many Volumes. I ſhall content my ſelf therefore with briefly ſhowing how this Diſpute was managed.

Had the Scots been obliged to prove directly their Settlement in Great-Britain from the Time of Alexander the Great, I am afraid their Arguments would not have been altogether ſatisfactory to unprejudic'd Judges. But they wiſely gave the Diſpute another Turn. When a Nation, ſay they, aſcribes any thing to itſelf in an hiſtorical Way, it ought not to be denied without ſufficient Evidence to the contrary. By this means they put their Adverſaries upon proving a Negative, which every one knows to be a very difficult Taſk. However, this is what they have undertaken to do. Their main Argument is drawn from no Writers mentioning the Scots as Inhabitants of Great-Britain 'till the Sixth Century. They alledge on the contrary ſeveral Paſſages from Latin Authors, wherein you have a Liſt of the Nations that inhabited the northern Parts of the Iſland, without the leaſt mention of the Scots. But the Scots maintain that this negative Proof deſtroys not their Pretenſions, for their Nation not being ſubdued by the Romans 'till the Reign of Severus, and remaining but a very ſhort Space under their Dominion, it is no wonder they knew ſo little of it, and conſequently gave ſo imperfect an Account. They add moreover, tho' the Deucaledonians, Meatæ, Attacotti, are mentioned by Tacitus and other Hiſtorians, as inhabiting the northern Parts of Great-Britain, it does not follow that theſe Nations were not Picts or Scots, juſt as the Iceni, Trinobantes, Silures, were truly Britons, though diſtinguiſh'd by particular Names. Among the Adverſaries of the Scots in this Diſpute, the moſt conſiderable are Uſher, Lloyd, Stillingfleet, Authors of great Note. In their Defence the principal Writers are Hector Boethius, Buchanan, Mackenzie, all three very eminent in Scotland.

Like Diſpute concerning the Picts.

If the Picts were ſtill in being, they would have the like Charge to maintain. For the ſame Engliſh Authors affirm, the Picts were no other than Britons, who to avoid the Tyranny of the Romans, retir'd into the northern Parts of the Iſland; where continuing to paint their Bodies with Woad, the Romans gave them the Name of Picts, to diſtinguiſh them from thoſe that, after their Submiſſion to the Roman Power, had left off that Cuſtom. This Opinion is not groundleſs, ſince it is certain, many Britons, unwilling to ſubmit to the Roman Yoke, retir'd northward, as the Conquerors advanc'd in the Iſland. But as the Romans ſubdued the Seventeen Britiſh Nations, not all at once, but by degrees, it may be aſk'd why they gave the Name of Picts to Thoſe only that fled beyond the Tine, and not to the other Nations before they were conquer'd, to diſtinguiſh them alſo from ſuch as had ſubmitted. The Scots further reply, that the Argument alledg'd by the Engliſh is more ſpecious than ſolid, being entirely built upon the Conformity of the Name Picts with the Latin Word Picti: That many Britons, it is true, retir'd among the Inhabitants of the North, but to prove Theſe to be the ſame with them that were afterwards call'd Picts, it muſt be ſhown how they came to be a ſeparate Body, and a diſtinct People from the other northern Nations, as it is certain the Picts were for ſeveral Ages, with Laws and Cuſtoms different from Thoſe of the Britons and Scots: That ſeeing nothing like this can be ſhown, it is more natural to think theſe fugitive Britons retiring among the Picts were incorporated with them. This Opinion, to which I confeſs I am inclin'd, may be farther confirmed, by conſidering that the Scots, not being conquered 'till the Reign of Severus, and remaining but a very little time under the Dominion of the Romans, called their Neighbours Pehiti. Now if this Name be the ſame with that of the Picts from the Latin word Picti, how can it be conceiv'd that the northern People, whether Scots or others, ſhould give their Neighbours a Roman Name? But if it be a different Name, it muſt then be owned, the Picts were not Britons, nor receiv'd their Name from the Cuſtom of painting their Bodies. Buchanan, who takes the Name of the Picts to be Roman, confeſſes however his Ignorance of the Name they gave themſelves. But on the other hand, he pretends they came from certain Gauliſh Colonies ſettled in Thrace, where they painted their Bodies as well as in Britain. The Picts, continues he, ſpoke the ſame Language as the Britons and Scots, ſince we don't find in Hiſtory that theſe three Nations had occaſion for Interpreters to trade together. I own this does not ſeem to me to be a ſatisfactory Reaſon, it being very poſſible theſe Nations might ſpeak different Languages, and yet Hiſtorians make no mention of Interpreters (2). Buchanan however concludes from hence they were originally Celtæ. Verſtegan, an Engliſh Author, ſays the Name of the Picts comes from a Word in their own Language, ſignifying Warrior. I don't think it neceſſary to examine any farther the Origin of a Nation that has now been entirely extinct without the leaſt Remains almoſt nine hundred Years.

This is all I could find worth notice concerning the Picts and Scots, who are to make ſo conſiderable a Figure in the following Hiſtory. It is time now to return to the Britons, and ſhow in what manner they were ſubdued by the Romans.

(1) Biſhop Lloyd ſays they were call'd Kelledei, or in old Scotch, Kyldees, from Cylle, a Cell, and Tee or Dee a Houſe, that is, a Houſe of Cells. But afterwards when it was uſual to find out Latin Derivations for thoſe Words of which Men did not know the Original. Kyldees or Kylledei came to be called Culdei or Colidei, that is, Worſhippers of God. Either way it appears they were Monks. Now the firſt Monks among the Scots were St. Martin's Diſciples, who died in 401. Conſequently the Culdees were not of ſo antient a Date as pretended by Selden and the Scotiſh Hiſtorians. They are not mentioned by Bede or Nennius.

(2) Bede ſays, in his time God was ſerved in five ſeveral Languages in Britain, namely, Anglorum, Britonum, Scotorum, Pictorum, & Latinorum, l. 1. c. 1. Huntingd. p. 299.

THE HISTORY of ENGLAND.

BOOK I.

From the first Invasion of Britain by the Romans under JULIUS CÆSAR, to the Calling in of the SAXONS. Containing the Space of about Five Hundred Years.

THE Romans were become Masters of almost all Europe, of the best Part of Africa, and of the richest Countries of Asia, before they undertook the Conquest of Great-Britain. While so many Kingdoms were by these Conquerors continually added to their Empire, Great-Britain preserv'd her Liberty: but it was owing rather to her Situation than Strengh. She was consider'd as a separate World by herself, to which the Inhabitants of the Continent seem'd to have no Pretensions, or at least, knew nothing there capable of exciting their Desires. Besides, the Wars with the Gauls kept the Romans so long employed, that they had not leisure or opportunity to think of the Britons. Julius Cæsar was the first that form'd the Project of that Conquest, during his Government of Gaul, where he caus'd the Roman Arms to triumph. His frequent Victories over the Gauls had extremely increas'd his Fame, and procur'd great Advantages to the Commonwealth. But he was not himself satisfied with the Reputation he had lately acquir'd in Gaul. His Thirst of Glory and Desire of enlarging the Bounds of the Empire, inspired him with the Design to extend his Conquests, and bring the Britons under the Dominion of the Romans. Some accuse him of being influenc'd by a more ignoble Motive, and of aiming in this Enterprize at the enriching himself with the Spoils he hoped to find in the Island (1). But this Imputation cannot be said to be well-grounded. However this be, Great-Britain, tho' little known in those days, had charms sufficient to raise the Ambition of that renowned Warrior. His Pretence for invading the Britons was their assisting the Enemies of the Commonwealth: a Pretence frequently us'd by the Romans to carry their Conquests into the most remote Countries. Upon this Ground he made two Expeditions into the Island, the Particulars whereof are thus related in his Commentaries.

Cæsar forms the Design to conquer Britain.

Sueton. Mela.

Cæsar, tho' he had spent part of the Summer in making an Irruption into Germany, resolv'd to employ the rest in the Execution of his Design upon Britain. He was very sensible however, the Season was too far advanc'd to expect to make any great Progress. Nevertheless, he consider'd it would be no small advantage if he could take a View of the Island, almost wholly unknown to all but the Merchants that traded on the Coasts. And these Merchants themselves were so little acquainted with what Cæsar wanted to know, that sending for some of them, he could learn neither the Extent of the Island, nor whether it was well-peopled or not. Much less could they give him any Information concerning the Ports and Havens, and whether there were any fit to receive Ships of Burthen. This Uncertainty made him resolve to send Volusenus to view the Coasts as far as was possible without danger, whilst his Troops were marching to the Place of Imbarkation (2).

Account of his first Expedition into Britain. Ant. Chr. 55. Cæsar Com. l. iv.

The Britons, receiving Intelligence by the Merchants of Cæsar's Design, endeavour to divert him from his purpose, by sending Ambassadors with Offers of Obedience to the Romans, and the Delivery of Hostages. Cæsar gives the Ambassadors a very civil Reception, but exhorting them to persist in their Resolution, dismisses them without Answer, or at least without telling them positively what he intended to do. With them however he sends Comius (whom he had a few days before made King of the Attrebates) (3) with Instructions to persuade the Britons to make an Alliance with the Romans, and acquaint him with his Design to come over into their Island. They were by no means pleas'd with the News, for they expected what they had done would have induc'd the Roman General to alter his Resolution. So, whether Comius spoke to them too haughtily, or they had a mind to let the Romans see they did not fear them, they committed the Ambassador to Prison, loading him with Irons.

The Britons send Ambassadors.

Mean while Volusenus having coasted along the southern Parts of the Island without landing, returns and gives an Account of the Diſcoveries he had made. Whereupon, every thing being ready to begin the Expedition, Cæſar imbarked two Legions on board eighty Tranſports, leaving order for the Horſe to follow with all ſpeed in eighteen more that could not yet join the Fleet, and were expected every moment: but his Orders were not timely enough executed. At his Arrival on the Coaſts of Britain, he ſees the Hills and Cliffs that ran out into the Sea, cover'd with Troops that could eaſily with their Darts prevent his landing (1). Upon which he determines to look out for ſome other place, where he may land his Army with leſs danger. However, he lies by 'till Three in the Afternoon (2), expecting ſome Ships that were not yet come up. Upon their joining the Fleet, he makes a Signal for the principal Officers, and giving them his laſt Inſtructions concerning their landing, makes ſail and comes to an Anchor about two leagues farther, near a plain and open Shore (3). The Britons perceiving his Intent, ſend their Chariots and Horſe that way, whilſt the reſt of their Army advance to ſupport them. The main difficulty in landing proceeded from the Largeneſs of the Veſſels which hinder'd them from coming near enough to the Shore; ſo that the Roman Soldiers ſaw themſelves under a Neceſſity of leaping into the Sea arm'd as they were, in order to attack their Enemies who ſtood ready to receive them on dry Ground. Cæſar perceiving his Soldiers did not exert their uſual Bravery on this occaſion, orders ſome Gallies to get as near the Shore as poſſible, and ſet upon the Enemy in the Flank. This Precaution had the deſired Effect. For the Slings, Engines, and Arrows were ſo well employed from theſe Gallies, that the Courage of the Britons began to abate. But the Romans ſtill demurr'd upon throwing themſelves into the Water, and it may be would hardly have done it at all, had not the Standard-Bearer of the Tenth Legion ſhown them the way, by leaping in firſt with his Colours in his Hand, crying out aloud, Follow me, Fellow-Soldiers, unleſs you will betray the Roman Eagle into the Hands of the Enemy. For my part I am reſolv'd to diſcharge my Duty to Cæſar and the Commonwealth. Upon theſe Words, he leaps into the Sea and advances with his Eagle towards the Barbarians. Emulation and Shame cauſing the Soldiers to forget the Danger, they couragiouſly follow him and begin the Fight. But their Reſolution was not able to compel the Britons to give ground: Nay, it was to be feared that the Romans conſtrained thus to fight in the Water without keeping their Ranks, would in the End have been repuls'd, had not Cæſar caus'd ſome armed Boats to ply about with Recruits, which made the Enemy fall back a little. The Romans improving this Advantage advance with all poſſible Expedition, and getting firm footing, preſs the Britons ſo vigorouſly, that at length they put them to rout. They durſt not however purſue them, becauſe the Horſe were not yet come. Which Cæſar ſays, was the only thing that hinder'd the Victory from being compleat (4).

He lands with great Difficulty.

The Britons are routed.

They ſue for Peace.

The Britons, aſtoniſh'd at the Roman Valour, and fearing a more obſtinate Reſiſtance would but expoſe them to greater Miſchiefs, ſet Comius at liberty, and ſent him back to Cæſar, throwing the Blame of his ill Treatment on the Fury of the Populace. At the ſame time Ambaſſadors are diſpatch'd to ſue for Peace and offer Hoſtages. Cæſar very readily pardons them, on condition they ſend him a certain Number of Hoſtages. Part of them were immediately delivered with a Promiſe of ſending the reſt.

Cæſar grants their Requeſt.

The Romans ſuſtain a great Loſs by a Storm.

Peace being thus concluded four days after landing, the Britiſh Troops were diſmiſs'd, and ſome of their chief Men came to Cæſar to manage the Concerns of their Nation. Mean while, the Ships that were tranſporting the Roman Horſe putting to Sea meet with a violent Storm, which forces them back again into the Ports of Gaul. The ſame Storm falls likewiſe upon Cæſar's Fleet lying in the Road, ſome whereof are daſhed in pieces, others loſe their Anchors, Cables and Rigging. And what added to the Misfortune, the ſame night the Tide of Flood roſe ſo high, (as is uſual at the full of the Moon, a thing then unknown to the Romans) that the Gallies, having been drawn aſhore were filled with Water. This Accident threw the Romans into great Conſternation, for they had not brought with them wherewithal to repair their ſhatter'd Veſſels, nor any quantity of Proviſions, Cæſar having all along intended to winter in Gaul.

The Britons break the Treaty.

The Britons that were with Cæſar ſoon perceiv'd his want of Proviſions, Ships and Cavalry. Beſides, it was eaſy to gueſs, by the ſmall extent of their Camp, that the Number of the Romans was not conſiderable. Having made theſe Obſervations, they ſteal away by degrees, and repreſent to their Countrymen, "what a favourable Opportunity offer'd to free themſelves from Servitude: How the Romans were few in Number, without Proviſions and Horſe: How they had juſt loſt their Ships, and with them all hopes of retiring." Upon this the Britons reſolve to uſe all poſſible means to cut off the Romans Proviſions, and amuſe them 'till Winter come on. Cæſar gueſſing their Intentions by what had happen'd to him, took all imaginable Care to lay in as great a Stock of Proviſions as he could, and put them under a ſtrong Guard within the Camp. Then ſending to Gaul for part of what he had occaſion for to refit his Fleet, he made uſe of the Timber and Iron of the broken Veſſels to repair the reſt. The Soldiers labour'd with ſo uncommon a Diligence, (as their Safety was at ſtake) that in a few days the Fleet was in condition to ſail, twelve Ships only having been loſt.

Cæſar repairs his Fleet.

The ſeventh Legion attack'd by the Britons,

Mean while, the ſeventh Legion being ſent out to forage, News was brought to Cæſar, that a Cloud of Duſt was ſeen to riſe from that quarter. He ſuſpected immediately what was the matter; and taking with him two Cohorts (5) that guarded the Camp, ordered the reſt of the Forces to follow with all expedition. When he came to the Place, he found the Legion ſurrounded by the Enemy, and overpower'd with Numbers. As the Harveſt was brought in every where elſe, the Britons did not queſtion but the Romans would come and forage there, ſo lay in a Readineſs to fall upon them. It was very eaſy to put Soldiers in Diſorder that had quitted their Arms, and were diſpers'd up and down to gather the Corn. They kill'd ſome at the firſt Onſet; and to prevent the reſt from eſcaping, began to ſurround them with their Chariots. Cæſar came very ſeaſonably to the Relief of the Legions, and ſaved them from being all taken or ſlain. Having brought them off, he ſtood ſome time in order of Battle in ſight of the Enemy, but at length retreated to his Camp, not deeming it proper to engage, unleſs compell'd to it.

who obtain ſome Advantage.

The Britons attack the Roman Camp.

The Britons, fluſh'd with this Succeſs, drew together a greater Body of Troops, with a Reſolution to attack the Roman Camp. Tho' Cæſar had but thirty (6) Horſe in all, he drew up his Men, that the Enemy might not think he was afraid of them. They attack'd him as he foreſaw. But inſtead of forcing the Camp, they were vigorouſly repuls'd and purſu'd for ſeveral Miles. The Britons were ſo diſheartned at their Loſs, that they ſent the ſame Day Ambaſſadors to Cæſar to ſue for Peace. The Poſture of Cæſar's Affairs would not ſuffer him to improve his Victory, becauſe he had no Horſe to oppoſe to thoſe of the Enemy. This Conſideration induc'd him to conclude a Treaty with them, whereby they were bound to deliver a greater Number of Hoſtages, and ſend them to Gaul, where he intended to go as ſoon as poſſible. Tho' the Paſſage was not long, the Fear of expoſing his Fleet to another Storm, if he ſtay'd 'till the Equinox, made him haſten his Departure (7) The Britons neglecting to ſend their Hoſtages, he puts his Troops into Winter Quarters, and forms the Deſign of a more important Expedition in the following Spring. Mean while, the Senate being inform'd of Cæſar's Exploits in Britain, a Proceſſion of twenty Days is decreed for him, though the Advantages Richborough or Portus Ritupenſis is plac'd in the 2d Iter of Antonine's Itinerary at twelve Miles diſtance from Durovernum or Canterbury. Twelve Roman are about nine computed Miles.

(4) The Time of Cæſar's landing in Britain is thus known. His firſt Expedition was, as he ſays himſelf, in the Conſulate of Pompey and Craſſus, that is, according to Dr. Halley, in the Year of Rome 699. But Auguſtus died in the Year 767, that is, Sixty-eight Years after Cæſar's Deſcent. Upon News of Auguſtus's Death, there was a Mutiny in the Pannonian Army, which was quieted by Druſus, by help of an Eclipſe of the Moon. Now from this Eclipſe it is certain that Auguſtus died in the 14th Year of Chriſt, conſequently Cæſar's firſt Deſcent, which was Sixty-eight Years before, muſt be in the 55th Year current before the Chriſtian Æra. And as the Year, ſo may the very Day and Hour when he landed, very probably, be fix'd. For Cæſar having mention'd the 4th Day after his landing, ſays, the Night after it was full Moon. Now, the Summer being far ſpent, this full Moon muſt have been in July or Auguſt. But the full Moon of July was in the beginning of the Month, and of the two full Moons that Year in Auguſt, that on the 1ſt Day was at Noon, wherefore it muſt be the other a little after Midnight of the 30th. Hence it is plain, Cæſar landed four Days before, on the 26th of Auguſt, about five in the Afternoon. See Lowthorpe's Abridgm. Phil. Tranſ. Vol. III. p. 412.

(5) It was the Cuſtom of the Romans to place whole Coborts before the Gates of their Camp. Hence our Engliſh Phraſe, Court, or Cohort of Guard. A Cohort was the 10th Part of a Legion, about ſix hundred Men. The firſt or chief Cohorts are ſaid to contain ſometimes above a Thouſand Men. Brady, p. 8.

(7) The Equinox, which now falls upon the 11th of September, muſt in Cæſar's Time have been on the 25th of that Month. (This Difference is occaſioned by our reckoning the Year to be about 11 Minutes more than it really is.) So that probably Cæſar left the Iſland about the 20th of September, about twenty-five Days after his landing, and as he ſays, a little before the Equinox.

he had gain'd were of little Conſequence to the Commonwealth (1).

B. C. 54. Cæſar's ſecond Expedition. Comm. l. v.

Cæſar, according to his Cuſtom, went and paſſed part of the Winter in Italy, leaving Orders with his Officers to repair the old, and build ſome more new Ships. When he had received Advice that his Orders were executed, he came to Portus Itius (2), where he found ſix Hundred Ships (3), and twenty-eight Gallies, on board of which he put five Legions, and two Thouſand Horſe. He conducts this numerous Fleet to a Place on the Britiſh-Coaſt, mark'd by him the Summer before, and lands his Forces without Oppoſition. For the Britons, as he was told afterwards, at the ſight of ſo mighty an Armament, thought fit to retire into the Country behind ſome Hills. Cæſar, according to the Roman Cuſtom, fortifies his Camp, and leaving a Guard, ſets out in the Night in queſt of the Enemy. Having marched about twelve Miles, he ſees them poſted on the other ſide of a River (4) to oppoſe his Paſſage. As reſolute as they ſeemed at firſt, they could not withſtand the furious Charge of the Roman Horſe, but were forc'd at length to quit their Poſt. They retir'd a little farther into a Wood, the Avenues whereof were block'd up with huge Trees laid a-croſs one another, and which ſeemed to be fortified in ſome former War. Tho' it appeared very difficult to force theſe Intrenchments, the ſeventh Legion however performed that Service, and obliged the Britons to betake themſelves to flight. But Night coming on, and the Country unknown, Cæſar forbids all Purſuit.

He lands without Oppoſition.

The Britons are worſted.

The Roman Ships are ſhattered by a Storm.

Next Day, he divides his Army into three Bodies, which march at ſome diſtance from each other in purſuit of the Enemy. During the march, he received the melancholy News that his Fleet was almoſt entirely deſtroyed by a violent Storm, moſt of the Ships being daſh'd in pieces or driven aſhore. As this Accident might be attended with ill Conſequences, he reſolved to haſten back to the Sea-ſide. Here he finds forty of his Ships deſtroyed, and the reſt ſo damag'd, that they were hardly repairable. However, Neceſſity compelling him to go about it without loſs of time, he ſets all the Carpenters in the Fleet and Army to work, ſending for others at the ſame time from Gaul. To prevent the like Misfortune again, as ſoon as the Ships are refitted, he employs his Soldiers, Night and Day, to draw them by Strength of Arms into the midſt of the Camp. This Work, notwithſtanding the difficulty of it, was finiſhed in ten Days (5). Mean while, he writes to Labienus his Lieutenant in Gaul, to build more Ships and ſend them over when ready. Then leaving a ſufficient Force to guard the Camp, he reſumes the Deſign interrupted by the Misfortune befallen his Fleet.

Cæſar repairs the Fleet, and draws the Ships within the Camp.

Caſſibelanus General of the Britiſh Forces, attacks the Romans.

He had not march'd far, before he was informed that the Enemies Forces were much increas'd, under the Conduct of Caſſibelanus King of the Trinobantes, whoſe Kingdom lay beyond the Thames, about eighty Miles from the Sea (6). This Prince had hitherto wag'd continual Wars with his Neighbours; but upon the Romans Approach, they had concluded a Peace with him, and choſen him Commander in Chief. Whilſt the Roman Army was on the march, they found themſelves attacked on a ſudden by the Britiſh Horſe and Chariots. But this attack, tho' vigorous, was repuls'd with great loſs on their Side. Nevertheleſs, they were not diſheartened. Some Days after, whilſt the Romans were employed about their Intrenchments, a Body of their Troops that lay concealed in the neighbouring Woods, fell furiouſly upon thoſe that guarded the Camp, and put them into great Diſorder. Cæſar ſeeing this, immediately ſends two Cohorts to their Aſſiſtance, who, ſurpriz'd at the Britiſh manner of fighting, are routed at the firſt Charge. Quintus Laberius Durus a Tribune was ſlain in the Action. As this Battle was fought in ſight of the Camp, Cæſar ſaw plainly the great Diſadvantage the Romans, encumber'd with their heavy Armour, lay under, againſt ſwift and light-arm'd Enemies that engag'd in ſmall Parties only, with a Body of Reſerve in their Rear, from whence they were continually recruited. The Roman Horſe were no leſs embarraſs'd than the Foot. As the Britons frequently counterfeited a Retreat, the Horſemen detach'd to purſue them were immediately cut in pieces; ſo that it was equally dangerous to purſue the Enemy or to retire. The confus'd manner of Cæſar's relating this Affair, is a clear Evidence that the Romans were worſted, tho' he does not ſay it in ſo many Words. Beſides, the Reaſons he alledges to excuſe his ill Succeſs are very weak; or if they are of any weight, whence is it that he did not meet with the ſame Difficulties in ſo many other Actions, wherein he pretends the Britons were routed Horſe and Foot?

He is repuls'd.

Another Skirmiſh, where the Britons have the Advantage.

Another Conflict, wherein the Britons are defeated.

On the morrow, the Britons poſted themſelves on ſome Hills within ſight of the Roman Camp. As they appear'd to be but few in Number, 'twas thought they had no Deſign to engage a ſecond Time. Mean while, Cæſar ſending out all the Horſe to forage, with three Legions to guard them, the Britons fall with great Fury upon the Foragers, who were defended by their Guard. The Reſiſtance made by the Legions giving Cæſar time to advance with the reſt of the Army, a great Battle enſu'd, wherein the Britons were entirely defeated.

Cæſar paſſes the Thames in ſight of the enemy.

After this Victory, Cæſar marches towards the Thames with intent to penetrate into Caſſibelanus's Dominions. When he comes to the River Side, at a very difficult Ford, he ſees the Enemy drawn up on the oppoſite Bank. Beſides their great Numbers, they had fortified that Part of the River with ſharp Stakes (7), driven ſo deep that ſome of them did not appear above the Water, as Deſerters ſaid afterwards. Notwithſtanding theſe Obſtacles, Cæſar reſolves to attack them, and orders the Horſe to ride in, and the Foot to follow, the Soldiers being ſcarce able to hold their Hands above Water to carry their Arms. The Attack was made with ſuch Reſolution that the Britons at length were forced to quit their Poſt and leave the Romans a free Paſſage (8). Caſſibelanus finding he could not hinder Cæſar's paſſing the Thames, diſmiſſes his Army, reſerving only Four Thouſand Chariots with which he harraſſes the Romans and endeavours to cut them ſhort of Proviſions, by carrying off all the Corn and Cattle that lie in their Rout. The Romans were great Sufferers in this March; for they did not dare to make the leaſt Excurſions in ſearch of Proviſions, for fear of Sallies from the Woods and By-places.

The Trinobantes ſubmit to Cæſar,

Mean while, the Trinobantes, upon Cæſar's approaching their Country, ſend Deputies to him to ſue for Peace, praying him withal to take into his Protection Mandubratius their King, who fled into Gaul upon Caſſibelanus's murdering his Father Immanuentius, and depriving him of his Dominions. Cæſar promiſes to ſend back Mandubratius, if they will ſupply him with Proviſions and deliver forty Hoſtages, to which they immediately agree. Several other States following the Example of the Trinobantes, Cæſar found himſelf in condition to attack the Capital City of Caſſibelanus, where the Country People were retir'd with their Flocks and Herds (9). What the Britons called a City was only a Wood ſenc'd with a Ditch to defend them againſt the Incurſions of their Enemies. Tho' this Intrenchment ſeemed very ſtrong, Cæſar ordered it to be ſtorm'd ſo briſkly at two different Places, that the Britons not being able to ſtand the Aſſault, fled out at one of their

(1) Cæſar had no great Cauſe to boaſt of this his firſt Expedition, ſince, according to Bede, he loſt the greateſt Part of his Ships, with many of his Men, and all his Horſe. l. 1. c. 2. Oroſius ſays, the Ships that were to bring the Horſe were caſt away in the Storm. Tyr. p. 30, 35. About three hundred Soldiers that were in two of the Tranſports not being able to reach the ſame Port with the reſt, were upon their landing ſet upon by the Morini, but reſcu'd by a Party of Horſe ſent to their Relief. This Paſſage of Cæſar gives ſome light into the Number of Men in a Legion. Theſe two Ships are expreſly call'd Onerariæ, or Ships of Burthen. Now if theſe two held Three hundred, the whole Eighty deſign'd for the Tranſportation of the Foot of two Legions, would carry Twelve thouſand, and conſequently there were about Six Thouſand Foot in a Legion. And to compute the Number of Horſe belonging to a Legion, we may conſider that a Tranſport, ſufficient for a Hundred and fifty Foot, will carry between forty and fifty Horſe. Conſequently the Eighteen Tranſports deſign'd for the Horſe had about Eight hundred on board, and ſo Four hundred will belong to each Legion. The Foot then in a Legion ſeems generally to have been about fifteen times as many as the Horſe.

(2) Boulogne, ſays Tyrrel and Brady; about Calais, ſays Horſley. Rowlands in his Mona Antiqua, p. 24, derives it from Porth-eilba, i. e. the utmoſt, or furtheſt Paſſage, obſerving that Cæſar only latinized the antient Gauliſh or Britiſh Names, leaving us to ſeek their Etymons not in the Roman but in the Britiſh Language. Horſley obſerves, that Cæſar calls the Paſſage the ſhorteſt and eaſieſt, being about thirty Miles. Now by an accurate Survey the Diſtance at Calais from Land to Land is twenty-ſix Engliſh Miles, or twenty eight and a half Roman, which ſhows how near Cæſar came to the Truth.

(3) Rapin by miſtake ſays Six-ſcore.

(4) This River could not be the Thames, that being too diſtant, but the Stour. So that the Battle very probably was fought on the Banks of the Stour to the North of the Town towards Sturry or Fordwich. The ſtrong Place to which the Britons retreated after their Defeat, muſt have been Durovernum, or Canterbury, (twelve Miles from the Place of Cæſar's landing) which was taken (and poſſibly kept till Cæſar's Return) by the ſeventh Legion. This might afterwards be converted by the Romans into a Station, as they treated ſeveral other Towns of the Britons, as Camelodunum, Verulamium, Iſurium, and others, the Capital Towns of ſeveral States. Horſley, p. 14.

(5) Upon the Shore about Deal, Sandon and Walmer, are a long Range of Heaps of Earth, where Camden thinks this Ship-Camp was, which, he ſays, by the People thereabouts was call'd Rome's-Work.

(6) Rapin, by miſtake, ſays twenty. Cæſar's Words are, a mari circiter millia paſſuum octoginta. The Borders of Caſſibelanus's Territories extended to the Thames in Surry, over-againſt Oatelands, which lies Eighty Miles from the Eaſt Shore of Kent, where Cæſar landed. The Trinobantes inhabited Eſſex, with part of Hertfordſhire, Verulam being the chief Town of their Kingdom.

(7) Theſe Stakes are juſt above Walton in Surrey, and the Meadow facing them is call'd Coway. They are even now to be ſeen at Low-water, and one of them was pulled out of the Thames laſt year, but with great Difficulty: They are of Oak, and though they have lain ſo long in the Water, are as hard as Brazil, and as black as Jett. At Shepperton they have ſeveral Knife-handles made of them. See Camden, p. 155. Bede, l. i c. 2. Tyrrel, p. 34.

(8) Cæſar does not mention a Stratagem he is ſaid to make uſe of upon this Occaſion. He cauſed an Elephant well-fenced with Iron, with a wooden Tower on his back full of Men, to be forced into the River; the ſight of which monſtrous Creature, that look'd like a walking Battery, did not a little contribute to frighten the Britons from the oppoſite Shore. Polyænus Stratag. l. viii.

(9) This is ſuppoſed to be Verulamium, or the preſent St. Albans. It is certain London was not ſo conſiderable in Cæſar's Time as Verulamium, this laſt appearing to have been more antient, and was a Municipium or Colony, when London was not.

Avenues,

Avenues, but not without great Numbers ſlain and taken, and leaving behind them abundance of Cattle.

Four Kentiſh Kings attack the Roman Camp.

Whilſt Cæſar was advancing into the Enemies Country, the Kentiſhmen inhabiting on the South-Coaſt over againſt Gaul, drew their Forces together, with deſign to cut off the Romans that were left to guard their Ships. As ſoon as they were ready, they marched under the Conduct of four Kings, namely, Cingetorix, Carvilius, Taximagulus, and Segonax, and furiouſly attacked the Roman Camp; but after a long and obſtinate Fight were repulſed, and King Cingetorix taken Priſoner.

They are repuls'd, and one taken Priſoner.

Caſſibelanus begs Peace,

After ſo frequent Defeats, Caſſibelanus, conſidering that moſt of his Kingdom was now in Subjection to the Romans, and ſeveral neighbouring States had made, or were ready to make their Submiſſion, treats with them likewiſe, by the Mediation of Comius. He eaſily obtains a Peace, Cæſar's Reſolution to return to Gaul not permitting him to purſue his Conqueſts in Britain. Beſides, he conſider'd that the Weather beginning to grow bad, would help Caſſibelanus to defend himſelf the reſt of the Campaign, as well as the whole enſuing Winter. By the Conditions of the Treaty, the Britons are annually to pay the Romans a certain Tribute; Caſſibelanus is to deliver ſuch a Number of Hoſtages, and leave Mandubratius in quiet Poſſeſſion of his Dominions (1.) Tho' Cæſar had ſcarce Ships enough to tranſport his Army, he choſe rather to ſtow his Men on board what Veſſels he had, than run the hazard of being ſurpriz'd by the Autumnal Equinox. He embark'd them therefore in the beſt manner he could, and receiving the Hoſtages, puts to Sea, and ſafely arrives in Gaul (2).

Tribute impoſ'd upon the Britons.

Remarks on Cæſar's Account of his two Expeditions.

This is the Account given by that great General of his two Expeditions into Britain. And here we may obſerve, that tho' out of an affected Modeſty, he refrains from all Commendations of himſelf, yet by the bare Recital of his Actions, he gives himſelf the higheſt Praiſes. For to make a Deſcent with two Legions only, in an Enemy's Country, in ſight of an Army formidable for Number, Bravery, and Way of fighting; to force Enemies entrench'd on the Side of a River, and what is more wonderful, to paſs the Thames at a Ford guarded by a numerous Army, ſtuck full of ſharp Stakes, and withal ſo deep as to take the Soldiers up to their Chins; theſe, I ſay, are Actions that ſufficiently ſpeak their own Praiſe, and need no amplification. And if Cæſar in penning his own Hiſtory, is charged with turning every thing to his Advantage, this Imputation ſeems to be no where more juſtly caſt upon him than in the preſent Caſe. Indeed, one can't read the Particulars of his two Britiſh Expeditions, without being ſenſible that ſomething is wanting, and what is paſs'd over in ſilence was not to his Honour. I forbear to inſiſt upon the great difficulty of knowing where the Ford he mentions could be, ſince in the very place he is thought to paſs the Thames, there is no leſs than ſix Foot Water. But what I have been ſaying will appear ſtill more evident, if we conſider Cæſar's Deſign in attacking the Britons, and the Iſſue thereof. He ſails from Gaul with a Reſolution to conquer Great-Britain, and reduce the whole Iſland to a Roman Province. This is what Dion Caſſius poſſitively aſſerts. He every where gets the better of the Britons. He paſſes the Thames in ſpite of all Obſtacles. Caſſibelanus, vanquiſh'd and routed, diſbands his Forces, not believing himſelf able to ſtand againſt him. Cæſar becomes Maſter of his Capitol, and the Britons ſubmit and ſue for Peace. With all theſe Advantages he is contented to impoſe an eaſy Tribute on Caſſibelanus, and without fortifying any one Place, or leaving any Troops in the Iſland, drops his firſt Deſign, ſatisfied with reſtoring Mandubratius, as if the War had been undertaken purely for his ſake. Does not this ſhow that he was forc'd to be ſatisfied with ſo inconſiderable an Advantage? Lucan's Teſtimony is a further Confirmation of the Matter, who taxes him plainly with turning his Back to the Britons (3). Tho' Lucan was no Friend to him, he would not however have ventur'd to upbraid him with running away, without ſome Ground. Dion Caſſius ſays, that in a Battle the Britons utterly routed the Roman Infantry, but were afterwards put in Diſorder by the Cavalry (4). Horace and Tibullus intimate in ſeveral Places of their Works, that in their Days the Britons were not conſider'd as a conquer'd Nation (5). All which evidently ſhows that the Fame acquir'd by Cæſar in theſe two Expeditions came far ſhort of the Idea he would give of it in his Commentaries. But however this be, moſt certainly the Common-wealth reap'd no great Benefit by them; which doubtleſs was the Reaſon of Tacitus ſaying, Cæſar rather ſhow'd the Romans the way to Britain than put them in Poſſeſſion of it. Vit. Agricol.

After Cæſar's Death, who had render'd himſelf Sovereign of that Common-wealth whereof he was born a Subject, the Empire was ſo torn with Civil Wars that it was not poſſible for the Romans to think of Britain. So that Tribute was not paid, nor, it may be, demanded for twenty Years. But when, after the Defeat and Death of Mark Anthony, Auguſtus was firmly ſettled in the Poſſeſſion of the Empire, he undertakes to compel the Britons to ſtand to their Agreement with his Predeceſſor, and to that end advances as far as Gaul twice in order for Britain (6), but is prevented the firſt time, by a Revolt in Pannonia, and the ſecond, by the Submiſſion of the Britons, who ſend Ambaſſadors to ſue for Peace, which he very readily grants. Britain, conſider'd then as a wild uncultivated Country, did not ſeem to him worth the pains of conquering. Beſides, he was determined not to enlarge the Bounds of the Empire, wiſely conſidering that a State, like a Ship, cannot be managed when too vaſt and unweildy: Yet as the Britons neglected to perform their Promiſe, he reſolves in good earneſt to go and ſubdue them: But hearing of his Deſign, they find means to appeaſe him. Tenuantius, Succeſſor of Caſſibelanus, ſends the ſame Emperor rich Preſents, which were laid up in the Capitol. Cunobelinus his Succeſſor, following his Example, keeps fair with the Romans. Nay, he orders Money to be coin'd, ſome Pieces of which are ſtill to be ſeen in the Cabinets of the Curious, with the five firſt Letters of his Name, C. u. n. o. b. or C. a. m. the three firſt of Camelodunum, his capital City on one Side, and on the Reverſe, a Man ſitting and coining Money with theſe Letters, T. A. S. C. I. A. by which Antiquaries underſtand that this Money was deſigned for the Payment of the Tribute (7).

Tiberius, Succeſſor of Auguſtus, neglected Britain as a Country of little Conſequence, it being unknown to him. Satisfied with the Reſpect ſhown him by the Britons in ſending back ſome of Germanicus's Soldiers that were ſhipwreck'd on their Coaſt, he left them to enjoy their Liberty.

Caligula his ridiculous Expedition againſt the Britons. Sueton. Dion Caſſ. 49.

Caligula, his Succeſſor, would not doubtleſs have turned his Eyes towards Britain, if he had not by a Briton himſelf been drawn into the Project of conquering the Iſland. Adminius, Son of Cunobelinus, incurring his Father's Diſpleaſure, and flying to Rome for Protection, finds means to perſwade the Emperor that nothing was more eaſy than this Conqueſt. Caligula, whoſe Folly is well known, imagines, upon what the young Prince tells him, that the Sight of him is ſufficient to ſubdue the Britons. Full of this Notion, he advances in Perſon to the Coaſt of Belgick Gaul, where he had ordered his Army to march. But being told, as he was embarking his Men, that the Britons ſtood ready to receive him on the other Side of the Water, his warlike Ardour cool'd, and he deſiſted from an Enterpriſe which began to appear too hazardous. However, as he was led by his Caprice to the moſt extravagant Actions, he went on board a Galley, ordering the People to row with all ſpeed towards Britain, as if he intended to have alone the Glory of conquering the Iſland. But preſently after, he is ſeen to return back as faſt as he went off. As ſoon as he lands, he harangues his Troops, as if he were going to employ them in ſome important Expedition. Having ended his Speech, a Charge is ſounded juſt as if the Enemy were in view. Upon which, the whole Army, purſuant to an Order given to the principal Officers, fall to gathering of Cockleſhells in their Helmets. The Emperor pleas'd with the Alacrity of his Soldiers on this Occaſion, liberally rewards them, and ſends Letters to Rome of his Succeſs, wiſhing the Senate to decree him a Triumph. But being informed the Senate made ſome Difficulty to comply with his Order, he reſolves to put all the Senators to Death. He would doubtleſs have executed his barbarous Purpoſe, had he not been depriv'd of the Power with his Life, by a Conſpiracy ſoon after form'd againſt him.

After Julius Cæſar's ſecond Invaſion, to which ſome very improperly give the Name of Conqueſt, the Britons preſerv'd their Liberty above ninety Years, during the

(2) It is conjectur'd that Cæſar's 2d Expedition was in May, and that he return'd to Gaul about the middle of September. For in a Letter to Cicero from Britain, dated September 1, Cæſar ſays, He was come to the Sea-ſide in order to imbark.

Reigns of the four first Emperors; their Subjection to the Romans not commencing till the time of Claudius. The occasion of that Emperor's undertaking the Conquest of Britain, and the cause of the Britons losing their Liberty was this:

22. CLAUDIUS He forms the Design of conquering Britain. Dion. l. 60. Sueton. in Claudio. c. 17.

Cunobelinus leaves two Sons, Togodumnus and Caractacus, who both succeeded him: but whether they reign'd jointly or separately, or whether one was superiour to the other, is unknown. In their Reign it happens that one Bericus (1), being forc'd to depart the Kingdom for endeavouring to raise a Sedition, flies for Refuge to Claudius the Emperor at Rome. His extreme desire of being reveng'd of the two Kings his Sovereigns, inspiring him with a Design to betray his Country to the Romans, he frequently talks to the Emperor of the Conquest of Britain, as of a thing very easily to be accomplish'd. By his Description of the Island and Posture of the British Affairs, he intimates to him that he would meet with little or no Opposition. The Emperor giving Credit to what he says, resolves to acquire Fame by an Enterprize seemingly difficult, but, according to the British Lord's Account, very practicable. Having taking this Resolution, he gives the Ambassadors of the two British Kings a very ill Reception, who are sent to demand the Fugitive Bericus, refusing to deliver up one whom he intends to make his chief Instrument in the Execution of his Project. Shortly after, he himself sends to the Britons and demands the Tribute due to the Empire: but finds them not at all ready to give him Satisfaction. Besides that this Tribute was never regularly paid, the haughty Treatment they had just met with in the Persons of their Ambassadors, by no means dispos'd them to pay him any great Deference. They refuse therefore, and very justly, as they think, to pay the Tribute, and moreover prohibit all Commerce with the Romans. As Claudius wanted only a Pretence for the War, he was not sorry they afforded him so plausible a one. Shortly after, he orders Plautius to begin the Expedition, whilst he is preparing to follow when there should be Occasion. Plautius accordingly draws an Army together in Gaul, and advances to the Sea-side. But when the Soldiers came to imbark, they refuse to obey him, declaring, They will not make War out of the Compass of the World. The Emperor hearing of this Mutiny, sends Narcissus his Freedman to appease it. Narcissus, tho' a great Favourite with his Master, when he would have harangu'd the Troops, could not prevail with them to hear him. The Moment he opened his Mouth, the Soldiers cried out, Io Saturnalia, alluding to the Custom, during that Feast, of the Slaves taking the Place and Habit of their Masters. However, the Mutiny went no farther. The Soldiers suddenly altering their Resolution, of their own accord obey the Orders of their General, who immediately puts them on board whilst they are in the Mind. He sails from three Ports in order to land at three different Places. But this Precaution was needless. The Britons inform'd of the Mutiny in the Roman Army, and not expecting so sudden an Alteration, neglect to prepare to oppose their Landing. So the Roman General lands his Forces without any Resistance. He was very desirous to come to a Battle at his Arrival; but the Britons were resolved to avoid it, and keep themselves in separate Parties, behind their Morasses, or on their Hills. Their Aim was to make the Romans lose Time, in Expectation that Plautius, after the Example of Julius Cæsar, would go and winter in Gaul. This Resolution gave the Roman General a great deal of Trouble, being forc'd to hunt after Enemies dispersed in several Places, whom he could, as he flatter'd himself, easily vanquish at once, were it but in his Power to bring them to a general Battle. In spite of these Difficulties, he finds means to attack Togodumnus separately, and entirely routing him, goes in quest of Caractacus, and obtains the like Victory over him. The Britons, pursuant to their first Design, retire beyond a River, where they encamp in a careless manner, imagining the Romans could not pass without a Bridge. But Plautius had, in his Army, some German Soldiers that were us'd to swim the strongest Currents. These Soldiers, though few in Number, swimming the River in their Arms, so astonish the Britons that they quit their Post and retire at a greater distance (2). The Roman General improving this Advantage, sends over a considerable Body of Troops under the Command of Vespasian, and his Brother Sabinus. These two brave Leaders advancing towards the Enemy, engage them and put them to flight. The Britons however are not discouraged. Next Day, they attacked a Roman Detachment commanded by Sidius Geta, so vigorously that the Romans were immediately put in Disorder; their Commander himself was engag'd in such a manner amongst the Enemies, that he was thought to be dead or taken. But the Scale was soon turned against the Britons. Geta happily escaping out of their Hands, heads his Troops again, and charges the Britons, now sure of Victory, so briskly, that after an obstinate Fight, he compels them at last to take to flight. This Affair was so well manag'd, and Geta acquir'd so great Reputation on this Occasion, that the Honour of a Triumph was granted him by the Senate, tho' he had never been Consul. The vanquish'd Britons retire towards the Mouth of the Thames, and being perfectly acquainted with the fordable Parts of the River, cross'd over with Ease, whilst the Romans following them at a Distance, fall into the Bogs and Morasses, from whence they very hardly disentangle themselves. At last, the Germans lighting upon a Ford, and the rest of the Army passing over a Bridge a little higher up, the Britons are surrounded on all Sides, and great Slaughter made of them (3).

He passes a River in sight of the Enemy.

The Britons attack the Romans and put them in disorder, but are defeated at last.

They retire beyond the Thames.

Plautius thought it now time to send to the Emperor to come and reap the Honour of putting an End to the War. Claudius having every Thing ready, sets out immediately, and embarking at Ostium, arrives in a few Days at Marseilles. Then pursuing his Journey by Land, he re-embarks at Boulogne (4) to go and head his Army on the other Side of the Thames. Whilst the Emperor was on his Way, Plautius had it in his Power to attack the Britons, who deceived by his seeming backwardness, resumed their Courage, fancying it proceeded from his Fear. But Plautius took care not to rob his Master of the Honour of a Victory he thought himself sure of. As soon as Claudius arrives he heads his Troops, approaches the Britons, and forcing them to come to a Battle, entirely routs them. After this Victory, he advances to Camelodunum (5), where he meets with little Resistance, and pushing his Conquests, subdues some of the neighbouring States. Upon these Successes he is by the Army saluted Imperator several times, contrary to the Roman Custom, which allowed no General to be honour'd with that glorious Title above once in the same War.

Plautius passes the Thames. D. Cass. l. 60.

44. He sends to the Emperor to come into Britain.

Claudius arrives and defeats the Britons.

If by this Expedition, which was finished in fifteen Days, Claudius acquir'd great Fame, his Moderation was no less honourable and advantagious to him. The vanquish'd Britons, touch'd with a Sense of his Generosity in leaving them the Possession of their Goods, which he might have taken from them, carried their Gratitude so far as to erect a Temple to him, and pay him Divine Honours. After this successful Expedition, the Emperor committing the Government of Britain to Plautius, sets out for Rome, where he safely arrives after a six Months Absence only. At his Return, the Senate decreed him the Honour of a Triumph, and the Sirname of Britannicus, in Memory of his subduing the Britons. The Publick Rejoicings on this Occasion held several Days, and the Poets display'd in lofty Strains the Greatness and Importance of his Victories. And yet, Suetonius says, he became Master of Part of Britain without Battle or Bloodshed (6). But it is more probable, as Dion Cassius affirms, that it cost him a bloody Battle.

45. Plautius continues the War. Sueton. in Vespasian, c. 4.

Plautius carried on the Conquests begun by the Emperor, being bravely seconded by Vespasian, and his Son Titus, who served under him. Titus, then a Tribune only, signalized himself on all Occasions. He had even the good Fortune to save his Father's Life in a Battle. Vespasian, who had a large Command, was often detached by the General on Expeditions of Moment, which gained him great Reputation.

43. Plautius is sent thither with an Army. A Mutiny in the Army.

Is is appeased.

Plautius defeats the two British Princes one after another.

(1) This Bericus perhaps was the same with Adminius Son of Cunobelin, mentioned by Suetonius, or one of the Fugitives that accompanied him.

(2) This River is suppos'd to be the Severn, and consequently this Battle was fought on the West-side upon the Borders of the Silures. Horsley, p. 30.

(3) Notwithstanding the Authority of Dion Cassius, it is very difficult to conceive that the Thames should be fordable near its Mouth, or a Bridge stand a little higher up. He must have confounded some River that runs into the Thames with the Thames itself. (This is Rapin's Observation.) But the Passage in Dion Cassius is capable of another Sense. His Words are, Ἀναχωρησάντων δ' ἐντεῦθεν τῶν Βριτανῶν ἐπὶ τὸν Ταμεσιν ποταμὸν καθ' ὃν ἐς τὸ ὠκεανὸν ἐκβάλλει, πλημμυροντός τε αὐτῦ λιμνάζει, καὶ ῥαδίως αὐτὸν διαβάντων, ἅτε καὶ τὰ σίρφα τά τε ὕφορα τῦ χωρίου ἐιδότων, οἱ Ῥωμαῖοι, &c. Which may be thus render'd, "The Britons retreated to the River Thames, where it falls into the Sea, and That [the River] overflowing stagnates, or forms a "Lake, which having pass'd, as knowing those Places that were firm at bottom and fordable, the Romans, &c." The Words being thus understood, it is manifest, that it was the Land-water or Lake, over which the Britons pass'd and the Germans swam. And probably there might be a Bridge cross this Water further up from the Shore, where some of the Romans might also pass. There is a Passage in Herodian relating to Severus, which seems to add much light to this Passage of Dion, Μάλιστα ὃ γεφύρας, &c. Lib. III c. 47. That is, "Severus took care in the first Place to lay Bridges through the fenny Grounds, "that the Soldiers might pass them with Safety, and might stand upon a solid Bottom when they fought. For many Places of Britain being overflowed by the "Sea, upon the Recess of the Tide become fenny, which the Barbarians are accustom'd to swim over or wade through." To this may be added, that the Mouth of the Thames in Dion's Time was as well known to the Romans, as the Mouth of the Tiber. Horsley takes these Fens to have been on the South-side of the River.

(4) Gessoriacum. Dr. Halley takes Gessoriacum to be Gravelin or Dunkirk. Claudius in all probability landed at Portus Rutupensis, called afterwards Portus Britanniarum.

(5) According to some Maldon, according to others Colchester in Essex. Dr. Gale will have it to be Walden.

(6) Mr. Wright of Stretton in Cheshire has lately published in his Travels, an Inscription which confirms this account of Suetonius. He took a Copy of it,

Tacit. Agric. Reputation. He fought thirty Battles with the Britons, ſubdued two powerful Nations, and conquered the Iſle of Wight. As all this was done under Plautius the Commander in Chief, he acquir'd great Reputation in this War. At length, being recalled, he goes and receives at Rome the Reward of his Services, the Senate having decreed him the Honour of an Ovation, or inferior Triumph. He was met by the Emperor without the Gates, who gave him the Right Hand as they walked, in Token of his great Eſteem for him (1).

50. Oſtorius Scapula Governor of Britain. Tacit. Ann. l. 12. & vit. Agric.

Oſtorius Scapula was ſent into Britain in the room of Plautius. He arrives in the midſt of Winter, and finds the Britons making continual Inroads into the Roman Conqueſts. They never imagin'd the new Governor would march his Army at ſuch a Seaſon in an unknown Country. But he does not ſuffer them long to continue their Ravages. Drawing his Troops together, he forthwith marches againſt them with all Expedition, and defeating the firſt that ſtand their Ground, ſo diſperſes the reſt in the end, that he has no more to fear from their Incurſions. However, not to be expoſed to continual Alarms, he reſolves to confine them between the Avon and Severn, by means of Forts built between the two Rivers. Before he puts this Reſolution in practice, he makes Camelodunum a military Colony. Much about the ſame time London was alſo made a [Trading] Colony, and that Part of Britain lying between the Thames and the Sea, was reduced into the Form of a Province, and called Britannia Prima.

Camelodunum is made a Colony, and likewiſe London. Stillingfleet. Part of Britain made a Province.

The Iceni (2) not yet weakened by the foregoing Wars, having from the beginning been in Alliance with the Romans, were the firſt that oppoſed Oſtorius's Deſign. Some neighbouring Nations followed their Example, and joining their Forces under one General, they encamp'd upon advantagious Ground, throwing up in haſte a Breaſtworſt of Flints, to prevent the Attempts of the Horſe. Tho' Oſtorius was then without any but the auxiliary Forces (3), he attack'd them however, ordering the Horſe to diſmount and ſupport thoſe that were to charge firſt. The Reſiſtance of the Britons was more obſtinate than expected. Nevertheleſs their Intrenchments were forced at laſt with great Slaughter on their Side. After this Victory, Oſtorius turns his Arms againſt the Cangi (4), who keeping in ſmall Parties, are quickly diſperſed. The Roman Army was not far from the Sea that parts Ireland from Great-Britain, when the General is informed that the Brigantes (5) are in Arms. This News obliging him to defer the Execution of his firſt Deſign, he marches with all ſpeed againſt the Brigantes, being willing to ſecure the Old, before he proceeds to new Conqueſts. The Inſurrection is appeas'd by the Death of the chief Revolters. But the Silures (6), the braveſt and moſt powerful of all the Britons, could not be tam'd, either by Clemency or Severity. Their Forces were ſo conſiderable that the Legions were obliged to march againſt them. They were headed by their King Caractacus, famous for his great Exploits, and univerſally eſteemed by his Countrymen, being accounted the beſt General Britain had ever produced. This Prince, whom the Nations in Alliance with the Silures had made Commander in Chief, was retired into the Country of the Ordovices (7), where aſſembling all his Forces, he reſolves to expect the Romans. To that end he chuſes an advantagious Poſt of very difficult Acceſs, and draws up his Army on the Side of a ſteep Hill, with a little River (8) at the bottom, which tho' fordable in many Places, was of great Service to him. Moreover his Camp being ſurrounded with a ſort of Rampart of Flints and Stones, he ſeem'd, thus poſted, to be out of all Danger (9). Theſe Difficulties are not ſufficient to check the Romans, who appear before their Enemies with their wonted Bravery, and reſolved to exert their utmoſt in Expectation of ending, by a ſingle Battle, a War that kept them, as it were, in another World. The Britons on their part prepare for Battle with all poſſible Ardor, not queſtioning but they ſhould free themſelves that Day from the Roman Yoke. Their Leaders ride up and down, exhorting them to do their Duty, by all the Motives that could enflame their Courage, and excite them to brave Actions. Caractacus tells them, "This is the Day that "will give them Liberty or perpetual Slavery; and bids "them call to mind the Glory of their Anceſtors, who "drove Cæſar out of Britain, and freed their Country "from the Dominions of the Romans." The Soldiers with loud Acclamations declare, they are ready to ſhed the laſt Drop of their Blood in Defence of their Liberty. The Reſolution that appear'd in the Looks of the Britons ſtartled the Roman General at firſt. But finding his Army extremely eager to engage, he makes the Signal of Battle, having firſt obſerved in what Places the River might beſt be forded. The Romans paſs it without much Difficulty, but before they can approach the Enemy's Camp, they are expoſed to a Shower of Darts by which many are kill'd and wounded. In ſpight of theſe Difficulties, they make ſeveral Breaches in the Rampart, which being nothing but looſe Stones, is eaſily thrown down. As ſoon as they could uſe their Swords, it was not poſſible for the Britons to ſtand againſt the warlike and veteran Troops who quickly put them to flight. Beſides the Loſs ſuſtained by the Britons in the Action, their Defeat was the more conſiderable by the taking of the Wife, Daughters and Brothers of Caractacus. This Victory was followed, in a few Days, with an unexpected Happineſs to Oſtorius. Caractacus flying for Protection to Cartiſmandua Queen of the Brigantes, was by her deliver'd up to the Romans, for fear doubtleſs of drawing a victorious Army into her Country, ſhould ſhe think of protecting the vanquiſh'd Prince. He had now commanded the confederate Army of the Britons nine Years; and his Fame had reach'd as far as Rome, where all were ſurpriz'd at his ſo long reſiſting the Roman Power. When the Emperor had notice of the Victory and taking of Caractacus, he order'd the Captives to be ſent to Rome, that he might behold in Chains a Prince that had been talk'd of as a very formidable Enemy. On a Day appointed, the People being all preſent, and the Emperor ſeated on his Throue, there came firſt Caractacus's Vaſſals and Retinue, with the Capariſons and other Spoils of War, then his Wife, Daughters and Brothers, and laſtly Caractacus himſelf, walking with a ſettled Countenance, without holding down his Head, or appearing too much dejected at his Misfortune. When he came near the Emperor, he made the following Speech, if it be true that Tacitus did not make it for him.

The Britons unite againſt Oſtorius.

They are defeated.

and deliver'd up to the Romans.

Caractacus General of the Britons

His Speech to Claudius.

"If my Moderation had been as great as my Birth or "Fortune, Rome had ſeen me this Day her Ally and not "Captive, and perhaps ſhe would not have diſdain'd to "rank in the Number of her Friends a Prince royally "deſcended, and who commanded many Nations. My "preſent Condition is as diſhonourable to me, as it is glo"rious to you. I had Arms, Horſes, Riches, and Gran"deur. Is it ſtrange I ſhould part with them unwillingly? "Does it follow, becauſe you have a mind to rule over "All, that therefore every one muſt tamely ſubmit? "Had I ſooner been betray'd to you, neither your Glory "nor my Misfortunes had been render'd ſo famous, and my "Puniſhment would have been buried in eternal Oblivion:

This Pomponia Græcina Wife of Plautius, and Claudia Ruffina a Britiſh Lady, are ſuppoſed to be of the Saints that were in Cæſar's Houſhold, mention'd by St. Paul. Claudia is celebrated by Martial for her admirable Beauty and Learning in the following Epigram.

Claudia cæruleis cum ſit Ruffina Britannis

(3) Every Legion had ſo many Auxiliaries, the Number of which is ſuppos'd, as to the Foot, to be the ſame with the Legion, but double, as to the Horſe. Horſley, p. 87. The Auxiliaries were Foreigners, whereas the Legions were Romans.

(6) Inhabitants of Herefordſhire, Radnorſhire, Brecknockſhire, Monmouthſhire, Glamorganſhire.
(7) Inhabitants of Montgomeryſhire, Marionethſhire, Caernarvonſhire, Flintſhire, Denbighſhire.

" But now if you preſerve my Life, I ſhall be a ſtanding " Monument of your Clemency to future Ages." The Emperor moved with theſe Words generouſly pardons the Captives, and orders their Chains to be taken off. The firſt Uſe they make of their Liberty is to go and fall at the Empreſs's Feet, who, in all appearance, interceded for them. The Senate being aſſembled to conſider of a due Reward for Oſtorius, his Victory was ſpoken of in Terms very much to his Advantage. It was declar'd to equal Scipio's over Syphax, and Paulus Æmilius's over Perſeus; and therefore it was reſolv'd that the ſame Honours ſhould be decreed him.

52. The Britons reſume their Courage. Mean while, Oſtorius's Reputation began to ſink, either becauſe he grew remiſs after acquiring ſo great Fame, or becauſe the Britons had exerted themſelves more vigorouſly to repair the Diſgrace of their late Defeat. They ſucceſsfully attack'd the Troops that were left to build Forts in the Country of the Silures, and had not timely Relief come from the neighbouring Garriſons, would have cut them in pieces. The Commander and eight Captains, with a good Number of Soldiers, were ſlain. Another time they defeated the Roman Foragers, and put the Horſe that guarded them in diſorder. In this Action they improv'd their Advantage in ſuch manner, that Oſtorius was obliged to advance with the Legions, after having tried in vain to reſtore the Battle with Supplies of the light-armed Troops. The coming of the Legions revived the Courage of the Romans, and forc'd the Britons to retreat though with little Loſs. After that there were ſeveral Conflicts with various Succeſs, according to the Circumſtances of Time and Place.

The Silures are intractable. The Silures, of all the Britiſh Nations, were the moſt obſtinate, being exaſperated at the Emperor's ſaying, Britain would have no Peace, till, like the Sicumbri, they were tranſported into ſome foreign Country. They ſurpriz'd two Cohorts, that by the Avarice of the Officers and greedy Deſire of Pillage, were advanced too far into the Enemy's Quarters. By diſtributing the Spoil and Priſoners, they endeavour to draw in the reſt of the Nations to revolt. Oſtorius dies about this time with vexation for not being able to put an end to the War. The Britons rejoice at his Death, and the more for their aſcribing it to his Grief that he could not ſtop the Progreſs of their Victories.

53. Aulus Didius ſucceeds him. As it was dangerous, in the preſent Poſture of Affairs, for the Emperor to leave the Army long without a General, Aulus Didius is immediately ſent over, who finds Matters in a worſe Condition than ever, a Legion commanded by Manlius Valens having been defeated. The Loſs however was not ſo great as reported. Nevertheleſs Didius himſelf magnified it very much, that he might gain the more Honour in reſtoring Affairs, or leſſen the Diſgrace, if the War ſhould continue any time. His Arrival was a Check to the Silures, who, exalted with their late Succeſs, were making Inroads into the Frontiers of the Roman Province.

The War kindles afreſh. Mean while Venutius King of the Brigantines, Succeſſor of Caractacus, in the Command of the Army, is perſwaded by the Inſtigation of Cartiſmandua his Queen, (the ſame that betray'd Caractacus) to enter into an Alliance with the Romans. As long as this Prince lived in a good underſtanding with his Queen, he ſuffered the Romans peaceably to enjoy their Conqueſts. Satisfied with preſerving his own Dominions, without troubling himſelf about the Concerns of the other Nations. A Quarrel ariſing between him and his Queen, and ending in a domeſtick War, cauſed him to take other Meaſures (1). Though hitherto he had no Averſion to the Romans, he is now forced to declare againſt them, they having impolitickly eſpouſed the Cauſe of his Queen. This Partiality of theirs ſo enrages him that he uſes all his Intereſt with his Countrymen to ſtir them up to a Revolt. The War is kindled afreſh with greater Fury than ever, though in the abſence of Didius, who, being very old, managed Affairs by his Lieutenants.

Tacit. Hiſt. l. 3.

57. Veranius ſucceeds Didius and dies. Tacit vit. Agricol. Veranius who ſucceeded him in the Reign of Nero, died before he had done any thing remarkable. 'Tis true, his Head was full of vaſt Projects, and the Fame he had acquired in other Poſts, gave Occaſion to think him capable of executing the greateſt Undertakings. But his Will, ſtuffed with flattering Praiſes of the Emperor, and full of vain Boaſts, that in caſe he had lived but two Years longer he would have ſubdued all Britain, made him forfeit the good Opinion People had conceived of him.

58. Suetonius Paulinus was appointed to fill his Place. Great Matters were expected from this General, whoſe Merit was compar'd with Corbulo's, who had lately conquer'd Armenia. As he himſelf looked with Emulation on the Glory acquir'd by that great Man, he burn'd with deſire to confirm by freſh Exploits, the good Opinion the World had entertain'd of his Experience and Bravery. The Moment he comes to his Government, he forms the Project of conquering the Iſle of Mona (2), now called Angleſey. To that end, he paſſes the Foot over in flat-bottom'd Boats, the Sea being very ſhallow in that Place, the Horſe following, ſome ſwimming, others fording (3.) The Iſlanders are drawn up on the other Side, with the Women running up and down, dreſs'd like Furies, their Hair hanging looſe, Firebrands in their Hands, and ſurrounded with the Druids, who with Hands lifted up to Heaven, pour out dreadful Curſes and Imprecations. The Horror of this Sight ſo aſtoniſhes the Romans, that they ſtand ſtock ſtill, expoſed to the Enemies Darts. But at length, the Shame of being frighted by a Company of frantick Women and Prieſts, and the Exhortation of their General bringing them to their Senſes and Courage, they fall upon the Enemy Sword in Hand, and become Maſters of the Iſland. The firſt thing Paulinus did was to order all the conſecrated Groves to be cut down, where the Iſlanders ſacrificed their Captives, and conſulted their God, by inſpecting the Entrails of Men.

Suetonius Paulinus is ſent into Britain. Tacit. Annal. l. 14.

He conquers Mona.

But whilſt Paulinus is employed in this Expedition, an unexpected Turn obliges him to leave Mona in an abrupt manner, to go and ſettle Affairs of much greater Moment.

60. A general Inſurrection in Britain. Tacitus, D. Caſſ. The Cauſes of it.

Praſutagus King of the Iceni dying, leaving by Will the Emperor and his Daughters Co-heirs to his great Treaſures, in Expectation to procure by that means Nero's Protection for his Family and People. But this Precaution has a quite contrary Effect. Praſutagus is no ſooner lain in his Grave, but the Emperor's Officers ſeize upon all his Effects in their Maſter's Name. Boadicea (4) his Widow, a Woman of great Courage and a high Spirit, oppoſing theſe unjuſt Proceedings, meets with freſh Cauſe of Diſcontent in the Contempt ſhown to her Remonſtrances. As ſhe is expreſſing, by her Complaints, her reſentment of the Injury done to her Daughters, the Brutiſhneſs of the Officers is ſuch, that they order her to be publickly whipp'd. And then, not ſatisfied with ſo outragious an Affront, they cauſe her Daughters to be raviſh'd by the Soldiers.

The Britons look upon this ſtrange Barbarity with ſuch Indignation, that the whole Iſland is poſſeſſed with a Spirit of Revolt, which quickly breaks out into Action. The Iceni lead the Way, and are ſoon followed by their Neighbours the Trinobantes. Venucius and his Party join with them, and in ſhort, all the Nations in Subjection to the Romans riſe in Arms with one Conſent, the City of London only excepted. The Roman Hiſtorians themſelves own, that the Injuſtice and Violence of the Emperor's Officers gave the Britons but too juſt Cauſe to revolt. They were thruſt out of their Poſſeſſions without any Form of Law, by the Veterans that were ſent to ſettle in the Iſland. Catus Decianus, Nero's Procurator, without any regard to the Ordinance of Claudius, that left the Vanquiſh'd in Poſſeſſion of their Goods, confiſcated their Eſtates to the Emperor's uſe. The Petitions preſented to him on that Occaſion were all rejected, and without alledging any other Reaſon but his Will, which he made a Law, he minded nothing but his own, and his Maſter's Profit. Seneca himſelf, with all his noble Sentiments of Moderation and Diſintereſtedneſs which ſhine in his Writings, but were never ſeen in his Practice, is ſaid to contribute very much to the Inſurrection, by rigorouſly exacting on a ſudden the Money he had lent ſome of the Britons upon Uſury (5). This Treatment bred in the Minds of the People ſo great an Averſion to a foreign Yoke, that they were all unanimouſly determined to ſhake it off. Venutius, mortal Enemy of the Romans, cheriſhes the Rebellion to the utmoſt of his Power. The very Adherents of the Queen laying aſide their domeſtick Quarrels, and renouncing the Friendſhip of the Romans, join with the reſt of their Countrymen for the recovery of their Liberty.

General Maſſacre of the Romans.

Boadicea, animated with an ardent Deſire of Revenge, heads the Revolters, and earneſtly exhorts them to take Advantage of the Roman General's Abſence to free themſelves from Slavery, by putting their Oppreſſors, the Foreigners, all to the Sword. The Britons immediately embrace the Propoſal, and fall in a ſudden and furious manner upon the Romans diſperſed in their Colonies, which were more carefully embelliſhed than fortified, maſſacring all without Diſtinction of Age or Sex. Unheard of Cruelties are acted upon this Occaſion, and ſtrange Puniſhments invented to glut the Fury of the enraged People. Wives are hung up with their Infants at their Breaſts, to make them ſuffer in ſome meaſure a double Death. Virgins have their Breaſts cut off and cramb'd into their Mouths, to make them ſeem in the Agonies of Death to eat their own Fleſh. The Veterans at Camelodunum retiring into a Temple for Sanctuary, are ſacrilegiouſly burn'd alive, rather than ſuffer'd to ſtarve to Death. In a word, the Fury of the Britons is carried to that height, that not a ſingle Roman eſcapes. Eighty thouſand (1) are computed to periſh in this Maſſacre.

Let us reflect here a little on the Politicks of thoſe Conquerors of the World, ſo great Maſters in the Art of Government. Upon their ſubduing a Country, they immediately ſent thither numerous Colonies, who by Degrees mixing and intermarrying with the Natives, ſecured to them their Conqueſts. Of this Britain is a remarkable Inſtance, where, though the Iſland had been conquered but eighteen Years before by Claudius, above eighty thouſand Romans were already ſettled, beſides Paulinus's Army, and doubtleſs, ſome Garriſons in the fortified Places, which the Fury of the Britons could not penetrate.

Paulinus leaves Mona.

Paulinus receiving advice of this Revolution, ſuddenly quits the Iſle of Mona to march againſt the revolted Britons, who have now an Army of a Hundred Thouſand Men, under the Conduct of Boadicea, whoſe noble Stature and heroic Courage make them hope ſhe may have likewiſe all the Qualities of a General. This Princeſs fired with the Affronts ſhe had received, ardently deſires to engage with Paulinus, whoſe Army is only Ten Thouſand ſtrong, in Expectation of compleating her Revenge, by the Deſtruction of ſo inconſiderable Remains of the Enemy. Mean while, Paulinus expecting no Succours from any Place, is in great Strait. The ninth Legion, commanded by Petilius Cerealis, was juſt then entirely defeated. Pœnius Poſthumus, with a conſiderable Detachment of the Second, refuſed, contrary to the Law of Arms, to obey his General's Orders, to come and join him. Thus Paulinus is under a Neceſſity either of marching againſt his Enemies with his little Army, or of epxecting them in ſome Town. He chuſes the latter, and ſhuts himſelf up in London, but quickly alters his Reſolution. Foreſeeing his Endeavours to ſave that Colony will endanger the whole Province, he marches out notwithſtanding the Cries and Intreaties of the Inhabitants not to abandon them to the Fury of the Rebels. However, with his handful of Troops, he ſeemed little able to ſtand againſt an Army of a Hundred thouſand Men. But great Men very often by their Courage and Experience find Means to extricate themſelves out of the greateſt Difficulties. Paulinus plainly ſees that in ſuch an Extremity he muſt either conquer or die, the relief he might expect being too far off, and the Danger at hand. Therefore, inſtead of retiring from the Britons, now marching towards him, he reſolves to meet them. This Reſolution inſpires his Troops with ſuch Courage, that they readily follow him; ſo powerful is an Army's good Opinion of their General. Paulinus ſummons all his Experience to balance by his Conduct the Advantage of the Enemy's Numbers. He pitches upon a narrow Piece of Ground for the Field of Battle, with a Foreſt behind that ſecures him from Ambuſcades in the Rear, and a large Plain before, where the Britans are encamp'd. He draws up the Legions cloſe together in the Center, the light arm'd are placed round them, and the Horſe make the two Wings. The Enemies ſwarm about the Plain in Battalions and Squadrons, exulting at their Numbers (2), and ſecure of Victory. Their Wives and Children are brought into the Field in Waggons, which line their Intrenchments, to be Witneſſes of their Actions and Partners in the Spoil.

Boadicea's Speech to the Army.

Boadicea, with her Daughters by her Side in the Chariot, rides up and down, addreſſing herſelf to the ſeveral Nations in the following manner, "That it was not the firſt time "the Britons had been victorious under the Conduct of "their Queens. That for her part ſhe came not there, "as one deſcended from Royal Progenitors, to fight for "Empire or Riches, but as one of the common People, "to avenge the Loſs of their Liberty, the Wrongs done "to her own Perſon, and the Violation of her Daughters "Chaſtity. That the Romans Luſt was grown to that "Height, that neither Old nor Young eſcap'd its Pollutions; "but the Gods had already begun to puniſh them ac"cording to their Deſerts; for one Legion that durſt ha"zard a Battle was cut in Pieces, and the reſt ſkulk'd "in their Camp (3), or fled for their Lives; ſo that "inſtead of being able to ſtand the Attack of a victorious Army, the very Shouts of ſo many Thouſands "would put them to flight. That if the Britons would "but conſider the Number of their Forces, and the Motives of the War, they would reſolve to vanquiſh or die. "That it was much better to fall honourably in Defence of "their Liberty, than be expos'd again to the Outrages of "the Romans. This was her Reſolution; but as for the "Men, they might, if they pleaſed, live and be Slaves." She is ſaid at the end of her Speech to let looſe a Hare, ſhe concealed in her Boſom, as a good Omen of Victory.

Paulinus harangues his Army.

Whilſt Boadicea is endeavouring to animate the Britons, Paulinus is not idle at the Proſpect of ſo great a Danger. Tho' he is aſſured of the Bravery of his Troops, he exhorts them to deſpiſe the Clamour and Threats of the Barbarians. He repreſents to them, that "among the Enemy "there were more Women than Soldiers, and that the "greateſt Part of them, having neither Arms nor Cou"rage, would immediately take to their Heels, when "they came to feel the Force of their victorious Arms. "That in the moſt numerous Armies, the Deciſion of "the Battle depended upon a few, and that their Glory "would be ſo much the greater as it was the leſs divided. "That they ſhould take care only to keep their Ranks "cloſe, and fight Sword in Hand, after they had "thrown their Darts. And laſtly, that they ſhould not "loſe time about the Spoil, which would be the certain "Reward of their Victory." Theſe Words are followed with ſuch loud Acclamations, and the Reſolution of the Soldiers appears ſo great, that the General not doubting of Succeſs, orders a Charge to be ſounded. The Romans dart their Javelins without quitting the Advantage of their Poſt. But their Quivers being emptied, they advance Sword in hand, ſeconded by the Auxiliaries, who fight with equal Bravery, in an Opinion there is no ſafety but in Victory. Whilſt the Fight was carried on with Darts at a Diſtance, the Britons were in hopes the Romans, daunted at the Number of their Enemies, would take to flight. But when they ſee the Legions advancing Sword in Hand, with ſhort and thick Steps, and no Signs of Fear in their Looks, they fall into Diſorder, which continually increaſes, there being no Leader or Officers capable of repairing it (4). The Romans ſeeing them thus ſhaken, fall upon them with great Fury, and put the whole Army into the utmoſt Confuſion, who now think only of ſaving themſelves by Flight. At the ſame time, the Roman Horſe in the Wings breaking through the Britiſh Cavalry, a terrible Rout enſues of the frighted Troops. 'Tis even with Difficulty they run away, by reaſon of the great Number of Carriages, full of unſerviceable Multitudes, which firſt retiring, became an Obſtacle to the Flight of the Army. The Roman Soldiers ſpare neither Age nor Sex, but ſacrifice to their Revenge the Women and Children, and even the very Horſes. This Victory equalled their moſt famous ones, if it be true, as Tacitus affirms, that eighty thouſand Britons were ſlain, with the Loſs only of four hundred Romans, and as many wounded. Boadicea eſcaped falling into the Hands of the Conquerors, but was touched with ſo deep a Senſe of her Shame and Loſs, that ſhe ended her Days with Poiſon. On the other Side, Pœnius Poſthumus who refuſed to obey his General, either to avoid the Puniſhment due to his Offence, or for Grief at loſing his ſhare of the Glory of the Victory, ſtabb'd himſelf.

A bloody battle.

The miſerable Condition of the Britons.

How advantagious to the Romans the Conſequences of ſo great a Victory were, may be eaſily conceived. The Britons, in the utmoſt Conſternation, without General or Army, fly before their Enemies without offering the leaſt Reſiſtance. Their Miſery is farther increaſed by a Famine, brought upon themſelves by neglecting to ſow their Lands. All their hopes are, that the inconſiderable Number of their Enemies muſt oblige them to keep together, and thereby afford time to form another Army. But theſe hopes vaniſh upon the Romans receiving a ſtrong Reinforcement from Germany. No doubt, as Matters then ſtood, Paulinus's Army would have been ſufficient to compleat the Conqueſt of Britain, if Diſſenſions ariſing among the Romans had not prevented them from improving their Advantages.

Diſcord among the Romans. Tacit. Ann. l. 14.

Julius Claſſicianus, who ſucceeded Decianus in the Office of Procurator, diſagreeing with Paulinus, ſtudied to croſs him in all his Deſigns. Probably the General would not ſuffer him to continue the Oppreſſions that occaſioned the late Revolt. However this be, Claſſicianus conceives ſo violent a Hatred for him, that he declares publickly, and even writes to the Emperor's Miniſters at Rome, that there is is no Proſpect of ending the War, as long as the Management is left to Paulinus. In all his Reports to the Emperor's Miniſters, he imputes the good Succeſs to Fortune, and the bad to the Governor's ill Conduct, intimating, that if another General were ſent, it would be very eaſy to appeaſe the Troubles without diſobliging the Province. At laſt, Nero hearing of this Diſſenſion, orders his Freedman Polycletus to go and learn the Cauſe. The Reſpect ſhown him by Paulinus was ſurprizing to the Britons, who could not conceive that ſuch a General and a victorious Army ſhould be accountable to a Freedman. This Reſpect however was not paid in vain. Polycletus, in his Report to the Emperor, juſtifies Paulinus, and ſo manages that he keeps his Command. But in the end, Claſſicianus beginning afreſh, prevails by his Friends and ſecret Practices, to have Paulinus relieved by Petronius Turpilianus, who being a Perſon of no Ambition, acted nothing memorable, hiding his Love of Eaſe and Sloth under the ſpecious Name of the Love of Peace.

62. Paulinus is relieved by Turpilianus,

To him ſucceeds Trebellius Maximus, as indolent as himſelf, and famous for nothing during his Government but his Quarrel with Cælius Commander of the twentieth Legion. This Quarrel is carried ſo high, that great Part of the Army deſerting their General, he is forced at length to fly to Vitellius, who commanded the Roman Army in Germany.

In the mean time Nero dying, the Britons enjoy ſome Reſpite, during the ſhort Reigns of Galba and Otho, there being neither Governor nor General. The Roman Army was commanded only by Tribunes, among whom Cælius bore the chief Sway. Vitellius being come to the Empire, ſends Vectius Bolanus into Britain, to take upon him the Command of the Army. The new Governor, little skilled in the Art of War, leaves the Britons in Quiet, and contents himſelf with gaining the Affections of the Soldiers, without having the Authority of a General. He continues in the Province till Veſpaſian, who ſucceeds Vitellius in the Imperial Throne, being informed of the Wants of Britain, ſends thither Petilius Cerealis. Petilius, during his Government, attacks and defeats in ſeveral Battles the Brigantes, the moſt numerous and conſiderable of all the Britiſh Nations (1). Julius Frontinus ſucceeds him, and acquires no leſs Glory than his Predeceſſor. He ſubdues the warlike Silures, whoſe Country ſeemed, by its Situation, to ſcreen them from all Attacks.

75. 78. Julius Agricola is made Governor of Britain. Tacit. vit. Agricolæ.

Towards the End of Veſpaſian's Reign, Julius Agricola is ſent into Britain to ſucceed Frontinus. Here we begin to have fuller Accounts of the Britiſh Wars; for which we are wholly indebted to Tacitus, who has taken care to write the Life of his Father-in-law Agricola, in order to give that Luſtre to his Actions they juſtly deſerved, and which perhaps they would have wanted, had it not been for that illuſtrious Hiſtorian (2).

Some time before Agricola was appointed Governor of Britain, the Ordovices had ſurprized and cut in pieces a Body of Roman Horſe, quarter'd in their Frontiers. This Accident gave occaſion to apprehend the like again, and cauſed the Romans to expect with great Impatience the Arrival of a new Governor. The News that Agricola was to command them, revived their Courage. They did not queſtion but under a General of ſo eſtabliſhed a Reputation, they ſhould quickly put an end to the War. However, he could not come till about the middle of Summer. Tho' he finds no Magazine for the Army, diſperſed in ſeveral Places for their better Subſiſtence, he draws them together without Delay. He immediately attacks the Ordovices, and notwithſtanding the Difficulty of the Undertaking, by reaſon of the incommodious Places he is forced to go thro' in queſt of them, makes them pay dear for the Advantage they had lately gained. All the World was ſurprized to ſee him fighting the Enemies of the Empire upon his firſt Entrance, a Time uſually ſpent by other Governors in Feaſting and Diverſions. or in receiving the Compliments of the Province. But there was ſtill greater Reaſon to admire his Diligence, when he was ſeen, in this firſt Campaign, to attack the Iſle of Mona, which the Romans had been forced to abandon, tho' he wanted flat-bottom'd Veſſels for the Expedition. He order'd a choice Body of Auxiliaries, who were acquainted with the Shallows, to ſwim over, which they performed ſo dextrouſly, (being trained up by the Cuſtom of their native Country to manage in ſwimming themſelves, their Horſes and Arms) that the Inhabitants, aſtoniſh'd at the Sight, and never ſuſpecting any ſuch thing, ſurrender'd the Iſle to the Romans without obliging them to draw a Sword.

78. Agricola's firſt Campaign.

War was not the only Affair that employ'd the new Governor. Whilſt his Arms are triumphant, he carefully enquires about every thing relating to the Government of the Province, and the propereſt Means to keep the People in Obedience. This Enquiry ſhows him that the Britons are not to be tam'd by Arms alone, but that Lenity is no leſs neceſſary than Force. And therefore he ſpends the whole Winter after his firſt Campaign, in diligently regulating ſeveral Abuſes crept in by the Avarice or Negligence of former Governors. He takes care to prevent all kind of Exactions; to cauſe Juſtice to be adminiſtred punctually and impartially; in a word, to remove every Occaſion of Diſcontent from the Britons in Subjection to the Empire. This Proceeding gain'd their Affection to ſuch a Degree, that he had no Cauſe to fear a Revolt whilſt he ſhould be employ'd in making new Conqueſts. Veſpaſian dying about this Time, his Son Titus ſucceeds him, and knowing Agricola's great Merit, continues him in his Government.

He gains the Love of his Britiſh Subjects.

79. Agricola's ſecond Campaign.

In the Spring the General takes the Field again, and marches towards the North, where he makes ſome Conqueſts. He obſerved the Romans commonly loſt in the Winter what they gained in the Summer, becauſe they durſt not venture to quarter in the conquer'd Countries, which were too much expoſed. To prevent this Inconvenience, he reſolved to build Forts in proper Places, where Garriſons might be kept in the Winter, always ready to repulſe the Enemy. As he was a great Maſter in the Art of Fortification, theſe Forts were built and ſituated in ſuch manner, that the Romans were never under a Neceſſity to quit them, nor the Enemies ever able to take them (3).

He induces the Britons to come into the Cuſtoms of the Romans.

During the following Winter Agricola's chief Buſineſs was to ſoften the rough Manners of the Britons, and inſtill into them a Deſire to imitate the Cuſtoms of the Romans. His Pains are not beſtow'd in vain. Soon after, Britain is adorn'd with ſtately Temples, noble Porticos, and many fine Structures both publick and private, of a very different Taſte from what had been hitherto ſeen. The Britiſh Nobles even pride themſelves in ſpeaking the Latin Tongue, to which a little before they were utterly averſe. They dreſs likewiſe after the Roman Manner; and, in ſhort, as Tacitus obſerves, are brought to eſteem, as Politeneſs and good Breeding, what was only a Badge of their Slavery.

80. Third Campaign.

In his third Campaign, Agricola advances as far as the River Tweed, fortifying his Conqueſts with Caſtles and Fortreſſes in ſeveral Places.

81. Fourth Campaign.

The fourth Summer was ſpent in ſubduing the Nations inhabiting between the Tweed and the two Friths of Glota and Bodotria, now called of Dunbritton and Edinburgh. Theſe two Arms of the Eaſt and Weſt Seas ſhoot ſo far into the Land, that they are parted only by an Iſthmus of between thirty and forty Miles. Upon this Iſthmus Agricola raiſes Forts and plants Garriſons for the Security of the Roman Province, which he had extended thus far. By this means the Nations yet unconquer'd, were pent up as it were in a ſeparate Iſland.

82. Fifth Campaign.

What Agricola had done ſhould, one would think, have ſatisfied his Ambition: But he was labouring alſo for the Glory of the Roman Name, which, as Tacitus expreſſes it, knew no Bounds. During the fifth Campaign, Agricola leads his Army beyond the Friths, where he diſcovers Countries and Nations, whoſe very Names were unknown to the Romans. Some of them he conquers, and leaves Garriſons in the Weſtern Parts oppoſite to Ireland. His Deſign was to attempt the Conqueſt of that Iſland, that it might be a Check upon Britain, being perfectly inform'd of the State of the Country by a Lord baniſh'd from thence. Tacitus ſays, he heard his Father-in-law ſay, that with one Legion and a few Auxiliaries, he could eaſily become Maſter of that Iſland, the Conqueſt whereof would be of great Service to keep the Britons in Awe.

83. Sixth Campaign.

In his ſixth Campaign, the Roman General paſſes Bodotria, ordering his Fleet to row along the Coaſts, and diſcover the Creeks and Harbours in thoſe Northern Parts. This was the firſt Roman Fleet that appear'd on thoſe Seas, the Sight whereof inſpir'd the Enemy with Terror, but the Romans with Courage, who having ventur'd upon thoſe unknown Countries with ſome Dread, were extremely animated by the Communication they had with their Fleet, which always kept near the Shore.

(1) Their Capital was Iſurium, call'd by Antonine Iſu-Brigantum, now Aldborough in Yorkſhire, which appears to have been a very large Station. It muſt be obſerv'd, that Encampments upon a March were by the Romans call'd Caſtra. Winter or Summer Quarters, Caſtra, hiberna, aut æſtiva. The Word Statio is us'd by Cæſar, Tacitus, &c. for the Duty of Soldiers upon Guard, or for the Men employ'd in this Duty. But afterwards Statio was applied to a Fort or Place where the Soldiers lodg'd, and like Vegetius's Caſtella, were often built like Towns in the Borders of the Empire, where they were conſtant Fences againſt the Enemy. The Stations here in England were ſtrong Fortifications, of no great Extent, adjoining to which were uſually other Buildings, forming a ſort of Town, to which the Station was in the nature of a Citadel.

(2) Tacitus's Life of Agricola is juſtly eſteem'd a Maſter-Piece by the beſt Judges. The Strength and Vivacity of the Expreſſion, the Beauty and Variety of Thought are almoſt inimitable. Horſley, p. 38.

(3) This Paſſage of Tacitus (ſays Horſley) is almoſt incredible, tho' we extend it no farther than to the Time of Tacitus writing his Hiſtory. There is perhaps a good deal of Compliment in it to Agricola, the Hiſtorian's Father-in-law and favourite Hero. It ſeems not to be well conſiſtent with another Paſſage, perdomita Britannia & ſtatim amiſſa. Hiſt. l. 1. c. 2. The Forts built this Year by Agricola are ſuppos'd to be on the Borders, eſpecially on the Weſtern Side of the Iſland, along which Agricola march'd. Horſley, p. 40.

But while Agricola was advancing towards the North, a Report was ſpread that the northern Nations had drawn together a formidable Army and attack'd the Forts built on their Frontiers. The News of this Armament being confirm'd a few Days after by Deſerters, the principal Officers of the Army adviſed the General to relinquiſh his Conqueſts beyond the Friths, and avoid the Shame of being compell'd to it by force. But he rejected this Advice as injurious to his Maſter's Honour and Intereſt. Whilſt he was deliberating upon this Affair, he had notice that the Enemies were coming upon him with an Army of numberleſs Multitudes, according to common Report. Apprehenſive of being ſurrounded, he divided his Army into three Bodies, hearing the Enemy had done the ſame. This Precaution had like to have coſt him dear. For the Enemies having Intelligence of it, alter their Reſolution, and with united Forces ſet upon the ninth Legion in the Night as they lie encamp'd at a good diſtance from the reſt of the Army. They ſurprized the advanc'd Guard, and attacking the Camp with great fury, had like to become Maſters of it. Agricola, upon notice of their march, made all poſſible haſte to the Relief of the Legion. But for fear of being too late, he order'd the Horſe to go before and maintain the Fight, till the reſt of the Army came up. He appear'd at Day-break in Sight of the Enemies, who ſeeing him advance, would have retreated, but not having time were forc'd to continue the Fight. The Battle was fierce and obſtinate. The Romans, that were almoſt defeated in their Camp, vigorouſly endeavour to repair their Diſgrace, at the Sight of their Companions who were coming to their Aſſiſtance. And theſe, ſeeing the ninth Legion in danger, ruſh furiouſly upon the Enemy to relieve them. Both fought with ſuch Courage and Bravery, that the Enemy began at laſt to give ground. The Fens favour'd their Retreat, otherwiſe the War had been terminated by that ſingle Battle (1).

The ninth Legion is attack'd in their Camp.

Agricola marches to their Aid.

The Iſlanders are defeated.

They aſſemble again.

This Defeat, tho' conſiderable, diſhearten'd not the Iſlanders. They imputed their Misfortune to Chance and other Circumſtances, rather than to the Valour of the Romans, and reſolv'd to try the Fortune of War once more. Having convey'd their Women and Children into the Towns, they came together from all Parts, and form'd a more numerous Army than the firſt, with a Reſolution ſtoutly to defend their Liberty.

A Cohort of the Roman Army deſerts,

But whilſt the Romans are preparing in the Winter to withſtand the Efforts of their Enemies, and even to attack them, a Cohort of Uſiſppians, levied in Germany, form a Deſign to return home, and execute it with that Secrecy and Expedition, that it could not be prevented. A Captain and ſome Roman Soldiers, placed among them to diſcipline them, were killed, leſt they ſhould oppoſe the Deſign. Which done, theſe Germans ſeize upon two (2) ſmall Veſſels, kill one of the Pilots, and compel the other to conduct them, threatning to ſerve him as they had done his Companion: After which they ſet ſail before their Intentions could be known. They had laid their Meaſures ſo ill that they were quickly in want of Proviſions, and reduc'd to the Neceſſity of eating ſome of their Comrades. Thoſe that remain'd alive, ignorant of the Art of Navigation, were driven aſhore on the Coaſt of Friſeland and made Slaves (3).

84. Agricola's ſeventh Campaign.

Upon opening the next Campaign, Agricola orders his Fleet to row along the Coaſt, to keep ſeveral Places in awe. At the ſame time he marches at the Head of his Troops, taking for Guides ſome Natives of known Fidelity, that were acquainted with the Ways. When he comes near the Grampian Mountain, he ſees the Enemies drawn up to the Number of Thirty thouſand, beſides Volunteers, who flock'd together to be at a Battle, of which Liberty or Slavery was to be the Iſſue. Upon the Armies approaching each other, Galgacus, Commander of the Iſlanders, repreſents to them, "That being at the Extremity of the "Iſle, they have no Refuge left if vanquiſh'd, and there-"fore nothing but victory can deliver them from perpe-"tual Bondage." On the other Side, Agricola exhorts his Soldiers "to do their Duty, by the Conſideration of their "paſt Victories. Particularly he ſets before their Eyes "their ſad Condition, if after being defeated, they are "forc'd to ſeek for Shelter among the Britons, who for "fifty Years together have felt the Force of their victorious "Arms." Whilſt the General is yet ſpeaking, the Soldiers by their Looks diſcover their Eagerneſs to fight, and their Hopes of Victory. The Army was drawn up in ſuch manner that the Auxiliary Foot were to bear the firſt Shock, in order to prevent as much as poſſible the Effuſion of Roman Blood. The Legions were plac'd in the Rear to ſupport the Auxiliaries in caſe of Repulſe. Galgacus had rang'd his Men on the Side of a Hill, that his whole Army might be viſible at once to the Romans, and ſtrike them with the greater Terror. The Horſe were drawn up on the Plain at the Bottom of the Hill, and the Chariots ran between the two Armies. Agricola apprehenſive of being ſurrounded by theſe Multitudes, widened his Front, though he thereby weaken'd it, rejecting the Advice given him of ordering the Legions to advance. Then alighting from his Horſe, full of Courage and Hopes, he went and headed the Legions. They fought ſome time with Darts, the Iſlanders being unwilling to quit the Advantage of their Poſt. Beſides, their little Targets, and unwieldy pointleſs Swords, were not ſo proper for cloſe fighting. But Agricola found means to compel them to it, by detaching two Cohorts of Batavians, and as many of Tungrians, who fell upon them Sword in hand. The Iſlanders, unuſed to that Way of fighting, could not long withſtand the Charge of theſe warlike Troops, who preſſing them with the Points of their Bucklers, ſoon broke their foremoſt Battalions and began even to aſcend the Hill. Thoſe that followed them, animated by their Example, fought with the ſame Bravery, and without giving the Enemies time to rally, overthrew all that withſtood them. Mean while, the Britiſh Horſe began alſo to give Ground, and their Chariots were forc'd to drive up the Hill to aſſiſt the Foot that were in extreme Diſorder. Tho' the Chariots at firſt ſomewhat daunted the Romans, yet did they but little Execution by reaſon of the unevenneſs of the Ground. The Hill being pretty ſteep, the Charioteers had no Command of the Horſes, and ran without Diſtinction over Friends and Foes according as they came in their way. The Foot that were poſted on the Top of the Hill, and had not yet engaged, ſeeing the Romans hotly purſuing their Victory, now made a Motion to ſurround them, becauſe of the ſmallneſs of their Number. But Agricola perceiving it, detach'd four Squadrons of Horſe, who not only withſtood the Charge of the Foot, but entirely routed them. Then falling upon the Enemies in Flank that were ſtill on the Plain, made great Slaughter of them. This Action compleated the Victory. Galgacus finding it impoſſible to renew the Fight, retreated with the Remains of his Troops. He loſt Ten thouſand Men in the Action; but on the Side of the Romans there fell but Three hundred and forty: Among whom was Aulus Atticus, Captain of a Cohort, who by the Heat of Youth, and the Unruline's of his Horſe, was carried into the midſt of the Enemies. The Conquerors paſs the following Night with Joy and Gladneſs, and the Vanquiſh'd with Lamentations and Sorrow, taking Advantage of the Darkneſs to eſcape the Purſuit of the Romans. Far from any Thoughts of rallying, their Flight was ſo haſty, that when Day appeared it was in vain to purſue them (4). Agricola ſeeing they were entirely diſpers'd, the Summer almoſt ſpent, and unſafe to ſend his Army to waſte the Enemy's Country, marched back into the Territories of the Horeſtians (5), from whom he received Hoſtages. He marched ſlowly, to ſtrike Terror into the Britons, and in Expectation of his Fleet, which having alarm'd all the northern Coaſt, returned about the End of the Summer, and anchor'd in the Port of Trutulum (6).

Agricola's Speech to his Army.

The Romans gain the Victory.

Domitian, now Emperor upon the Death of his Brother Titus, receives the News of this Victory with a ſeeming Satisfaction, though inwardly he repines at the Reputation Agricola gained by it. Envy not ſuffering him to continue him in his Poſt where his Fame might ſtill have an additional Luſtre, recalls him on pretence of promoting him to the Government of Syria. But after cauſing the Senate to decree him a Statue crown'd with Laurel, he ſends him out of the World with a Doſe of Poiſon. In this manner he rewarded the Service that great Man had done the Empire. This unworthy Emperor could not bear the Fame of a General, whoſe noble Actions reproach'd him with the imaginary Triumph decreed him as Conqueror of the Germans, in which he had cauſed Slaves to be diſguiſed like Captives.

Domitian recalls Agricola, and poiſons him.

Agricola gave the finiſhing Blow to the Liberty of Britain. By his Valour and prudent Conduct, all that Part of the Iſland lying South of the two Friths, was reduced to a Roman Province. As for the northern Parts, they were left to the Inhabitants as a wild uncultivated Country, not worth the conquering or keeping. Only ſtrong Garriſons were placed in the Fortreſſes built on this Side the Friths.

The Britons begin to be civiliz'd.

Tho' the Loſs of their Liberty ſeemed to be an irreparable Damage to the Britons, it was in ſome meaſure repaired by the great Alteration for the better in their Cuſtoms and Manners, after their being ſubject to the Empire. In a ſhort time they were ſeen to lay aſide their rude and ſavage Ways, and aſſume the Politeneſs of the Conquerors. Arts and Sciences, little regarded by the Britons before this Revolution, flouriſh'd among them as much as in any other Part of the Roman Dominions. In a word, from mere Savages the Britons were become polite and civiliz'd, an Advantage the moſt northern Parts of the Iſland have not yet attained. After this Reformation, they made but faint Struggles for the Recovery of their Liberty, being pleaſed, for the moſt part, with their Servitude. It muſt however be noted, that a great many choſe to loſe their Poſſeſſions, and retire into the North among the Picts and Scots, rather than live in Subjection to the Roman Yoke. Theſe were the Men that joining with thoſe that afforded them Refuge, made continual War with the Romans, in maintenance of that precious Liberty their unhappy Country had loſt. They ſpared not even their Countrymen, whom they looked upon with Horror for being pleaſed with their Slavery. Theſe were the Men that with the Picts and Scots obliged Emperors themſelves to come over in Perſon and oppoſe the Efforts of their invincible Courage.

Policy of the Romans with regard to conquer'd Countries.

As for the Subjects of the Empire, they endured all the Hardſhips that are the uſual Lot of the Vanquiſhed. Exorbitant Taxes were laid upon them on numberleſs Pretences. Their Eſtates were taken from them and given to the Veterans, that were continually coming to ſettle in the Iſland. The Flower of their Youth were made Soldiers, and diſperſed in the other Provinces of the Empire. Such was the Roman Policy. They ſent away whole Bodies levied in a conquer'd Country, into other remote Regions. For Inſtance, the Britons into Pannonia, the Batavians into Illyria, the Germans into Britain, to keep them at a Diſtance from their own Country. By thus draining the conquered Nations of their main Strength, they diſabled them from revolting, and at the ſame time made uſe of them to acquire new Conqueſts.

85. Lucullus Governor of Britain.

After Agricola's Departure from Britain, we have but a ſlender Account of what paſſed in the Iſland till the Reign of Adrian. We only know that Salluſtius Lucullus was ſent thither by Domitian, to whoſe Suſpicions or Jealouſy he quickly fell a Sacrifice. 'Tis to be preſumed, the Subjects of the Empire were quiet, aud the Inhabitants of the North ſuffered to enjoy their Liberty in Peace. The Roman Hiſtorians mention alſo in the Reigns of Nerva and Trajan ſome Commotions in the Iſland that were quickly appeaſed; but the Particulars are unknown. It may likewiſe be obſerved in this Interval, the Romans after their Conqueſts ſuffered Kings to be in Britain; for they gloried in having ſuch for their Subjects. Juvenal ſpeaks of King Arviragus, who reign'd in ſome Part of the Iſland under Domitian (1).

117. Julius Severus made Governor. Spartian in Hadriano.

In the firſt Year of Adrian (2), the northern People, a Mixture, as ſuppoſed, of Picts, Scots, and Britains, but confounded by the Roman Hiſtorians under the Name of Caledonians, made an Irruption into the Roman Province. Their firſt Exploit was to demoliſh ſome of Agricola's Fortreſſes between the two Friths. Adrian being informed of theſe Commotions, appoints Julius Severus Governor of Britain; but before he has time to perform any thing, he is ſuddenly recalled and employed elſewhere (3). Mean time, the Caledonians continuing to infeſt the Roman Territories, the Emperor reſolves to go over in Perſon and ſubdue theſe fierce and troubleſome People. As ſoon as they hear of his Arrival, they relinquiſh the Country they were poſſeſſed of, and retire to the North. Adrian however advances as far as York, where he meets ſome of Agricola's old Soldiers, that had been with him in the northern Parts. The Deſcription theſe give him of the Country he intended to conquer, diverts him from purſuing his Expedition. Beſides that the Bogs and Mountains he was to paſs, would have engaged him in a War more laborious than honourable, he eaſily perceived, that, ſhould his Undertaking be crown'd with Succeſs, it would procure no great Advantages to the Empire. Wherefore he comes to a Reſolution to leave to the Caledonians all the Country between the two Friths and the Tine, in hopes by thus enlarging their Bounds to keep them quiet. But at the ſame time to ſecure the Roman Province from their Incurſions, he cauſes a Rampart of Earth to be thrown up, covered with Turf, from the Mouth of the Tine to Solway-Frith. This Rampart was eighty Miles in length, and ran quite croſs the Country from Eaſt to Weſt, by which he ſecured the ſouthern Parts, leaving the Caledonians all the Lands between the new Rampart and the Iſthmus that parts the two Friths (4). Having thus ſettled Matters in the Iſland, he returns to Rome, and is honoured with the Title of Reſtorer of Britain, as appears by ſome Medals.

120. Adrian goes over in Perſon.

He parts the Roman Provinces from the Northern Countries by a Rampart.

After theſe laſt Irruptions of the northern People, there was all along a mortal Enmity betwixt them and the ſouthern Britons. Theſe laſt finding themſelves entirely ſeparated by Inclination and Intereſt from the reſt of the Inhabitants of the Iſland, were the more forward to embrace the Cuſtoms and Manners of the Romans. Afterwards, by means of the Arts and Sciences, they came by degrees capable of being inſtructed in the Chriſtian Religion, which till then was ſcarce known in the Iſland.

Enmity between the Northern and Southern Britons.

They grew more civiliz'd.

How ſtrong ſoever Adrian's Rampart might be, it was not ſufficient to prevent the Inroads of the northern People. Indeed, they behaved peaceably as long as there were Roman Troops enough on their Borders to defend the Rampart. But the Moment theſe were removed, as it ſometimes happened, being wanted elſewhere, they began their uſual Ravages. Nay, in the Reign of Antoninus Pius (5), not ſatisfied with their Booty, they deſtroyed the Rampart in ſeveral Places. Antoninus being informed of it, and fearing their Boldneſs, if not curb'd, would carry them to greater Undertakings, orders Lollius Urbicus to go and quell them. The new Governor (having firſt ſubdued the Brigantes, who endeavour'd to ſhake off the Roman Yoke) in order to put a ſtop to the northern Irruptions, raiſes another Rampart on the Neck of Land between the two Friths, where Agricola had formerly built his Fortreſſes. Thus the Inhabitants of the North were confined within narrower Bounds than before. By means of this Rampart and a Camp at a little Diſtauce, where Troops were kept ready to march on occaſion, he compelled the Caledonians to remain peaceably in their Country. Tho' Antoninus was never in Britain himſelf, this Expedition, as done by his Orders, and under his Auſpices, gained him the Title of Britannicus (6).

The Northern People deſtroy Adrian's Rampart.

(1) Under Plautius and Oſtorius, in the Reign of Claudius, ſome Places (ſays Tacitus) were given to King Cogidunus, who continued faithful to the Romans. Over what People he was King does not appear; Camden thinks the Regni; Dr. Gale the Segontiaci. However, there was lately found at Chicheſter a very curious inſcription, relating to this Cogidunus. The Stone was found in a Cellar under the Corner Houſe of St. Martin's-Lane; it is about two Feet nine Inches broad, and very near three Foot long. It is now fixed in the Wall of the Houſe where it was found. The Inſcription, ſomewhat defac'd, is as follows:

..EPTVNO. ET MINERVAE
TEMPLVM
....O. SALVTE. DOMVS. DIVINAE
....AVCTORITATE TIB. CLAVD.
....GIDVBNI. R. EGA. AVG. IN BRIT
....GIVM. FABROR. ET QVI IN EO

The Stone in digging up was broken in four Parts, of which one is not taken up, lying under the Foundation of the next Houſe. See Philoſophical Tranſactions, N. 379.

(4) Adrian's Wall or Vallum was entirely of Earth. The whole Work conſiſted of the following Parts. 1. The North Agger; 2. The Ditch; 3. The principal Vallum; 4. The South Agger. The Ditch at Harlow-Hill, where the original Breadth and Depth is very apparent, meaſures near nine Foot deep and eleven over. The Height and Thickneſs of the Vallum and Aggers cannot be exactly known. The Diſtance of the North Agger from the Ditch is about 24 Foot, and that of the South Agger was originally thirty, tho' leſſen'd at preſent by the ſpreading of the Earth.

(5) Here is another Gap of 18 Years, from 120 to 138.

(6) From Antoninus's building his Wall in 140 to 165, we meet with no Occurrences, nor from thence to 183. Antoninus's Wall, like Severus's, had a Series of Forts or Stations, which are ſuppos'd (ſome at leaſt) to be prior to the Wall, and the ſame that were built by Agricola. This Wall reaches from the Frith of Forth to the Frith of Clyde, as appears by Inſcription. It begins at Cuer-ridden, and runs through Munrills, Falkirk, Camelon, Rough-Caſtle, Dick's Houſe, Caſtle-cary-fort, Weſtertwood-fort, Crotty-hill, Barbill-fort, Auchindavy, Kirkintilloch, Calder, Bemulie, New Kirk-patrick, Caſtle-hill-fort, Duntocher, Old Kirk-patrick, ending at Dunglaſs, near Dumbarton, where ſtood the old City of Alcluith, afterwards Dumbritton, i. e. the Town of the Britons. Horſley (who had it ſurvey'd) takes the Wall to have been near forty Roman Miles, that is (allowing fourteen Roman to thirteen Engliſh) a little above thirty-ſeven of our Miles. By the Inſcriptions ſhowing the Part that was raiſed by the Cohorts of the Legio Secunda, &c. the Number of Paces amount to 39726, that is thirty-nine Roman Miles, and ſeven Hundred and twenty-ſix Paces. It was built of Turf, upon a Foundation of Stone, four Yards thick. To this Work belongs a great Ditch, larger than that of Severus, on the South-ſide of which was the main Agger, Vallum or Rampart, and South of the Vallum a large military Way well pav'd, and is in ſeveral Places very magnificent and beautiful. How this Work came to be call'd Grime's Dike or Graham's Dike does not appear. It is ſaid that Graham in the Highland Tongue ſignifies Black, then Graham's Dike will be the ſame as the Black Dike.

165. Calphurnius Agricola is made Governor. Capitolin. in Aurelio. Lucius a Britiſh King becomes a Chriſtian.

Marcus Aurelius his Succeſſor gave the Government of Britain to Calphurnius Agricola. This Governor checks the Inſolence of the Caledonians, and ſtrengthens the Emperor's Dominion over ſuch of the Britons as ſeem to bear their Yoke with the moſt Reluctance. It was in the Reign of Marcus Aurelius, that Lucius, a Britiſh King, embraced the Chriſtian Religion, which had been long before planted in the Iſland; but for want of due Cultivation, had taken no deep Root. I ſhall ſpeak more largely of this King in the State of the Britiſh Church.

183. Troubles in Britain. D. Caſſius, l. 72. and others.

During the Reign of Commodus, Succeſſor of Marcus Aurelius, there were great Commotions in Britain. The northern Men taking up Arms, cut in pieces the Roman Army, commanded by an unexperienc'd General, and make great Ravages in the Province. All Britain was in Danger of being loſt, if the Emperor had not ſpeedily ſent Ulpius Marcellus, a General of great Reputation. The new Governor defeats the Rebels in ſeveral Encounters, and by his Conduct puts an end, in a very ſhort Space, to this dangerous War, that had made his Maſter extremely uneaſy. During his Stay in the Iſland, he obſerv'd that the Want of Diſcipline in the Roman Army, was the ſole Foundation of the Boldneſs of the Northern People, and the chief Cauſe of the Advantages gained by them over the former Governors. He undertakes therefore to bring it to its ancient Strictneſs, which he happily accompliſhes. But his Services were repaid with Ingratitude. The Emperor, not content with depriving him of his Government, was upon the Point of putting him to Death. This unworthy Prince, like Domitian, could not behold diſtinguiſhed Merit without Suſpicion and Envy.

187. The Army mutiny on account of Perennis, and ſend a Detachment to Rome.

Marcellus no ſooner leaves Britain, but the Army mutiny upon Perennis the Emperor's Favourite, breaking or calling home all the old Officers, and putting his Creatures in their Place. The Mutiny is carried ſo far, that the Army ſend a Body of fifteen hundred Men to demand Juſtice of the Emperor againſt Perennis. This Troop marching to Rome without any Obſtacle, are met by the Emperor without the City, who demands of the Leaders the Cauſe of their Diſcontent. "They were come (they "ſaid) to offer him their Aſſiſtance againſt Perennis, ac"quainting him withal how that dangerous Miniſter had "by degrees caſhier'd the braveſt Officers, and filled the "Army with his Creatures. a clear Evidence of his ill "Deſigns." Commodus having been jealous of him for ſome time, delivers him up to the Soldiers, who execute him upon the Spot.

Commodus delivers up Perennis.

188. Pertinax made Governor. Capitolin. in Pertinace. Mutiny in the Army.

Mean while it was neceſſary to ſend into Britain ſome Perſon of Authority to ſuppreſs the mutinous Temper of the Army. Pertinax, afterwards Emperor, being pitch'd upon for this Service, reſolves to proceed according to the Rigour of military Diſcipline. Whereupon the ninth Legion raiſe a Mutiny, which is not appeaſed without Bloodſhed. The General himſelf is wounded, and ſaves his Life only for being left for dead among the Slain. However, in ſpite of all Obſtacles he gains his Point, and brings the Army at laſt to ſubmit. But, as he was not beloved by the Soldiers, he deſir'd to be diſmiſſed from his Office, and Clodius Albinus was ſent in his room. Albinus being recalled upon a Suſpicion conceived of him by Commodus, Junius Severus was order'd to go and relieve him.

190. Clodius Albinus is made Governor, and

192. Succeeded by Junius Severus. Capitolin.

Pertinax being come to the Empire, after the Death of Commodus, makes the ſame Clodius Albinus, lately recalled, Governor of Britain. He was continued in that Poſt by Julian, Succeſſor of Pertinax. Albinus gains the Affection of the Soldiers by his Liberalities, to ſuch a Degree, that after Julian's Death they proclaim him Emperor. At the ſame time, Septimius Severus in Pannonia, and Peſcennius Niger in Syria, receive the ſame Honour from their reſpective Armies. Severus being neareſt Rome, haſtens thither to receive from the Senate the Confirmation of the Dignity conferred on him by the Soldiers. But notwithſtanding the Senate's Decree, the other two Emperors perſiſting in their Claims, put Severus to a ſtand. His Rivals were at the two Extremities of the Empire, and conſequently, while he marches againſt one, there was Danger of the other's making too great a Progreſs. He judges it neceſſary therefore to uſe Diſſimulation with Albinus, making him believe he is willing to ſhare the Empire with him. This Offer being accepted, Severus draws all his Forces together, and goes and fights Peſcennius, who at length is vanquiſh'd and ſlain in Battle; after which Severus conſiders how to get rid of Albinus likewiſe. He tries firſt to aſſaſſinate him by Villains hired and ſent into Britain for that purpoſe. But this Way failing, he reſolves to employ Force; and cauſing Albinus to be declared Enemy of the State, marches againſt him. Albinus was now with his Army in Gaul, intending to meet him and decide the Quarrel by a Battle. And accordingly it was decided near Lyons, where the two Emperors fought with equal Bravery, tho' not with equal Fortune. Albinus is defeated and ſlain, and by his Death Severus remains ſole Poſſeſſor of the Empire. Shortly after he divided Britain into two Governments. The Firſt containing the Southern Parts, was given to Heraclitus, and Virius Lupus had the Second, conſiſting of the Northern Provinces bordering upon the Caledonians, by whom he was ſo infeſted, that he was forced at laſt to purchaſe a Peace with Money.

196. Battle of Lyons between Severus and Albinus. Herodian, l. 3. Severus divides Britain into two Governments. Dion. l. 75.

After this Treaty Britain remains in Quiet till the fifteenth Year of Severus, when the Caledonians renew their Incurſions into the Roman Province. The Roman Soldiers having enjoyed ſeveral Years Peace, were grown ſo effeminate and negligent, that they ſeemed never to have had the leaſt Tincture of Military Diſcipline. It was this that emboldend'd the Caledonians, and made them think they ſhould not neglect ſo fair an Opportunity to attack their Neighbours, who till then had appeared ſo formidable to them. They make ſuch Progreſs, that the Emperor, though Sixty Years of Age, and afflicted with the Gout, reſolves to go in Perſon and chaſtiſe their Inſolence. His Intent was, once for all, to put an end to the continual Commotions in Britain, by the entire Conqueſt of the North. To that purpoſe he draws together a numerous Army, and ſets out for Britain, accompanied by his Sons Caracalla and Geta. The Caledonians, when they hear of his Arrival, ſend Ambaſſadors to demand Peace upon honourable Terms. But he refuſes to hearken to them, unleſs they will ſubmit to his Mercy; which they not conſenting to, he marches towards their Country with his eldeſt Son Caracalla, leaving Geta at London to take care of the Southern Parts.

205. Herodian, l. 3. c. 46, &c.

207. Severus goes over into Britain.

It was with infinite Toil that he penetrated to the utmoſt Bounds of the North, cutting down Woods, draining Bogs, or filling them with Bavins. By this hard Duty, and the continual Ambuſcades of the Enemy, he loſt fifty thouſand Men (1). However, notwithſtanding all Difficulties in his Way, he accompliſhes his Deſign, and ſubdues theſe fierce and hitherto unconquer'd People. But as ſoon as he had executed his Project, he perceived how fruitleſs it was, ſince he could not poſſibly keep the Country in Subjection without a great Army always on the Spot. This Conſideration made him ſenſible, it was better to relinquiſh theſe Conqueſts than to keep them. And therefore, confining himſelf to Adrian's former Project, he only divides the Iſland into two Parts by a Wall (2), in the Place where Adrian threw up his Rampart. This Wall, of which there are ſtill ſome Remains, was called by the ancient Britons Murſever, or Severus's Wall (3), and muſt not be, as it is by ſome, confounded with the Rampart rais'd by Lollius Urbicus between the two Friths. The Emperor having nothing more to do in the North, returns to York, leaving the finiſhing of the Wall and Command of the Army to his Son Caracalla. This Expedition got him, or cauſed him to aſſume, the Title of Britannicus Maximus. Caracalla, no longer reſtrained by the Emperor his Father's Preſence, ſuffers the Soldiers to commit all manner of Licentiouſneſs. So that the Caledonians, unuſed to the Yoke, take up Arms with one accord. Severus hearing of this Revolt, but not knowing the Cauſe, orders the Rebels to be all maſſa-

Dike. There is a military Way near Silcheſter in Hampſhire, call'd now Grime's Dike. The 's annex'd to Graham, is, doubtleſs, owing to the Opinion of its being the Name of a Man. The common Story is, that one of this Name broke through the Wall, and ſo gave his own Name to it. Within ſight of the Wall ſtands an antient Building, call'd Arthur's Oven, in the Shape of the Pantheon at Rome, twenty-two Foot high, and nineteen and a half in Diameter. Horſley takes it to have been a funeral Monument. It ſtands on the North-ſide of the Wall. See a large Deſcription of theſe Things in Book I. Chap. 10. of Horſley's Britan. Rom.

(1) Horſley imagines from this great Loſs of Men, that Severus's Wall muſt be reckon'd among theſe Works, tho' by much the greateſt of them, p. 61.

(2) Severus's Wall was of Free-Stone, as is certain from what is yet viſible. In ſome Places, where the Foundation was not good, they ſeem to have made uſe of oaken Piles. The inner Part of this Wall is filled with pretty large, and moſtly broad and thin Stones, always ſet edge-ways, ſomewhat obliquely. Upon theſe the running Mortar or Cement was pour'd, and by this Contrivance the whole Wall was bound as firm as a Rock. Theſe Stones are ſuppos'd to have been brought from Helbeck-Scar on the Gelt and Leuge-Crag, as appears from an Inſcription on the Rock that hangs over the Gelt. The Wall generally meaſures about eight Foot thick, and twelve high. Upon the Wall were plac'd Caſtles or Cheſters ſixty Foot ſquare, about ſix Furlongs and a half from each other, and Turrets four Yards ſquare, about three hundred Yards from each other. There ſeems to have been four Turrets between every two Caſtles. The Centinels plac'd in the Turrets being within Call, the Communication quite along the Wall might be kept up, without having Recourſe to the Fiction of Pipes laid under Ground to convey the Sound; tho' this ſeems to be credited by Echard and others. The Wall is trac'd from Couſin's Houſe through Newcaſtle, Berwell-Hill, Rutcheſter, Halton-Cheſters, Warwick-Cheſters, Carrawbrugh, Houſeſteids, Great Cheſters, Thirlwel-Caſtle, Burdoſwold, Cambeck-Fort, Watch-Croſs, Stanwick's, Brugh, Drumbrugh, to Boulneſs, ſixty-eight Miles three Furlongs. And therefore it is a wonder that ſuch great Men as Uſher, Burton, Buchanan, Dr. Smith, and others, ſhould ſay the Wall reach'd only to the Eſk, when the contrary, upon View, is plain to a Demonſtration. It was not built exactly upon Adrian's Wall, there being a good Diſtance ſometimes between them. It is obſervable that the Legionary Soldiers were employ'd in building this Wall, as they generally were in Works of this Nature. This is evident from the Centurial Inſcriptions on the Stones of the Walls, ſhewing what Part was built by each Centuria. A good Hint how Soldiers may be uſefully employ'd in peaceable Times.

Remark on the Caledonians.

As nothing very memorable paſſed in Britain during the Reigns of Severus's immediate Succeſſors, I might fill up this Void with an Inquiry, who were theſe northern People or Caledonians (2) ſo often mentioned? But this is a Subject fitter for a Diſſertation than a Hiſtory. It ſuffices to inform the Reader, that ſome maintain theſe Caledonians to be Picts and Scots, with a mixture of ſouthern Britons. Others affirm, the Scots ſettled not in the Iſland 'till the beginning of the ſixth Century, and that the Caledonians in Severus's Time, were no other than Britons, that had all along inhabited thoſe Parts, or fled thither after the Roman Invaſion. But tho' as to the Hiſtory, the Name of theſe People be not very material, I ſhall add here, that for my part, I think the Reaſons alledged in proof of the Picts and Scots not being yet ſettled in the Iſland, to be inſufficient, though it may be, their Settlement is of a later Date than pretended by the Scotiſh Hiſtorians (3).

Several Emperors at once, ſome of which in Britain.

259. Camden in Eſſex.

What is known of the Affairs of Britain from the Death of Severus to the Reign of Dioclesian, is inconſiderable (4), and amounts to no more than this. There is ground to ſuppoſe that ſome of the thirty Tyrants (5) who were in Poſſeſſion of the Empire for ſome time, were acknowledged, if not perſonally preſent, in Britain. This appears the more probable, as the Coins of Lollianus, Victorinus, Poſthumius, and others of theſe pretended Emperors, are commonly found in England. Bonoſus, who attempted to uſurp the Empire under Tacitus and Aurelian, was born in Britain. 'Tis known moreover, that a Governor ſent hither by Probus, aſſumed the Imperial Purple, and was ſhortly after killed by Victorinus, who had recommended him to the Emperor. Two other Particulars of the Reign of Probus with reſpect to Britain, ought to be recorded.

Vopiſcus in Bonoſo and Probo.

276. Probus gives the Britons leave to plant Vines, and ſends over great numbers of Vandals and Burgundians. Zoſim. l. 1.

This Emperor was the firſt that permitted the Britons (6) to plant Vines as well as the Gauls or Spaniards. But in all appearance, no great Benefit was reaped by this Permiſſion. The Emperor Probus alſo, after ſubduing the Vandals and Burgundians, ſent over great Number of them into Britain (7). Theſe new Colonies are generally thought to have been ſettled on Gogmagog-Hill near Cambridge, where there remains to this Day a Fortification, imagined to be the Work of theſe Foreigners. It is however more probably aſcribed to the Danes, who were long Maſters of Cambridge.

285. Carauſius aſſumes the Title of Emperor. Aur. Victor. Eutrop. l 9. c. 17.

In the Beginning of Dioclesian's Reign, Carauſius had the Command of a Fleet, with Orders to ſcour the Seas of the pyratical Franks and Saxons, that perpetually infeſted the Belgick, Armorican, and Britiſh Coaſts. Carauſius finds means to enrich himſelf immenſely, by plundering the Pyrates, or going Shares with them in their Spoils. After which, he begins by degrees to receive the Emperor's Commands with leſs Reſpect and Submiſſion. Maximian was then Emperor of the Weſt, Dioclesian of the Eaſt. Carauſius's Haughtineſs breeding in Maximian Suſpicions that were but too well grounded, he reſolves to have him aſſaſſinated. Upon notice hereof, Carauſius immediately aſſumes the Imperial Purple, purſuant to the Scheme he had laid. As his Riches had acquired him a great Intereſt in the Army, his Authority was readily acknowledged in the Iſland. Maximian, ſurprized at his Boldneſs, advances as far as Gaul with deſign to chaſtize him. But finding him too well eſtabliſhed, he alters his Reſolution, and thinks it more proper to aſſociate him into the Empire, and leave him Britain for his Share. There are Silver Coins ſtill found in England of theſe two Emperors, having on the Reverſe, two Hands joined together with theſe Words, Concordia Augg (8).

290. Maximian aſſociates Carauſius into the Empire.

This forced Agreement not removing Maximian's deſire to be rid of his Aſſociate, he commits the Execution of his Deſign to Conſtantius Chlorus lately made Cæſar, giving him an Army anſwerable to the greatneſs of the Undertaking. As Carauſius was retired into Britain, Conſtantius thought it neceſſary in the firſt place to become Maſter of Boulogne, that Town being as it were the Door into Britain from Gaul. Whilſt he is employed in the Siege, Carauſius is ſlain by Electus, who aſſumes the Title of Emperor. Whereupon, Conſtantius raiſes the Siege of Boulogne, and paſſes into Britain in order to drive the Uſurper from thence, before he has time to fortify himſelf. Shortly after, Alectus is killed by Aſclepiodotus, who aſſuming likewiſe the Imperial Dignity, loſes his Life afterwards in a Battle.

Whilſt theſe petty Tyrants are contending for the Poſſeſſion of Britain, Dioclesian and Maximian, both on a Day, reſign the Empire, one in the Eaſt, the other in the Weſt. Galerius and Conſtantius ſucceeding them, the laſt, as Emperor of the Weſt, had Britain in his Diviſion. Some Commotions in the Iſlands obliging him to go thither in Perſon, he dies at York (9), in the beginning of an Expedition againſt the northern People, now diſtinguiſhed by the Names of Deucaledonians and Vecturions (10). Conſtantius, before he expired, had the Satisfaction to ſee his Son Conſtantine, and appoint him his Succeſſor. Some think Conſtantine was born in Britain, of Helena Daughter of Coel King of Colcheſter (11). But this at beſt is only Conjecture. However, this Prince, at firſt only Emperor of the Weſt, vanquiſhed his Rivals, and became in the end Maſter of both Empires.

State of the Empire under Conſtantine. Pancirolli Notitia Imperii Occident. Brady, Vol. 1. p. 41—48.

The Britons, as long as Conſtantine ruled, lived in profound Tranquillity. His Reign was remarkable for three Circumſtances in which Britain was concerned. The firſt is, the Liberty granted by this Emperor throughout all the Roman Empire, of profeſſing the Chriſtian Religion, which Britain enjoyed as well as the reſt of the Provinces. The ſecond is, the general Regulation made by this ſame Prince for the better Government of his Dominions. He divided the whole Empire into four large Præfectures, namely, Italy, Gaul, the Eaſt, and Illyria, in which were contained fourteen great Dioceſes or Provinces. Britain, one of the fourteen, was ſubject to the Præfect of Gaul, and governed by a Vicarius or Deputy under him (12). (2) That is, Cilyddion, Borderers in the Britiſh Tongue, whom Biſhop Lloyd ſuppoſes to be firſt called Picts, about the Year of our Lord 300. Though at the ſame time they that lived next the Roman Frontiers were ſtill called Caledones or Borderers. Ammianus, who writ eighty Years after, ſays there were two Nations of the Picts which were called Dicaledones and Vecturiones, perhaps Deucilyddion and Clwithwrion, that is, in Britiſh, the Southern Caledones, or Borderers, and the Northern Men, (Deu and Clwith, right and left, being anciently uſed for South and North) the ſame, no doubt, that were afterwards called the South and North Picts, ſeparated (as Bede ſays) by a Ledge of high and ſteep Mountains or Grantſbain-Hills; amongſt which Hills the Country is called Braid-Albin, i. e. High-Albion, and the higheſt of them is called Drum-Albin, i. e. Ridge of Albion. This perhaps is the only Remains of that moſt ancient Name of this Iſland. See Amm. Marc. l. 27. p. 346. Uſſer. prim. p. 80, and 586. Bede, Hiſt. l. 3. c. 4. Paneg. ad Conſt. p. 235. Eumen. Paneg. ad Conſt. p. 258.

(3) Lloyd ſeems to have ſet this Matter in a clear Light in his Proofs of the following Particulars. 1. That the Inhabitants of Ireland or the Scots were never in Britain before the Year 300. 2. About that time they began their Incurſions, but ſettled not here 'till after the Decay of the Roman Empire, when the Saxons conquered the beſt part of Britain, calling it England. 3. Then part of the Scots or Iriſh ſeated themſelves among the Picts, and about the Year 500 erected the Kingdom of Argyle, and held it a long while peaceably. 4. About the Year 850, they conquered all that was North of Graham's Dike. 5. After the Year 900 they got the reſt of the Country, and it came to be called Scotland. This ſeems to be the moſt probable Account of this much conteſted Affair, which the Reader may ſee at large in Lloyd's Hiſtorical Account, &c. p. 5—46. It may not be amiſs to lay before the Reader one Argument alledged by Buchanan in favour of the Antiquity of the Scots in Britain. In Paneg. Maximiano, A. p. 258. The Orator comparing Conſtantius's Victory over Carauſius, with That formerly gained by Cæſar over the Britons, ſays, Ad hoc, natio etiam tunc rudis & Soli Britanni, Pictis modo & Hibernis aſſueta Hoſtibus adhuc ſeminudis, facile Romanis armis ſigniſque ceſſerunt. Hence Buchanan infers the Scots were in Britain in Cæſar's Time, by ſuppoſing Soli Britanni to be the Genitive Caſe. For then the Senſe will be This: Moreover the Nation (conquered by Cæſar) being yet rude, and uſed to no other Enemies but Picts and Iriſh of the Britiſh Stil, &c. that is, ſays he, Scots ſettled in Britain. But the Engliſh Writers ſeemingly more juſtly render the Words thus: The Nation being yet rude, and only Britons, uſed to no other Enemies but Picts and Iriſh, eaſily yielded to the Roman Arms and Enſigns. Hence the Iriſh here ſpoken of are not ſaid to dwell in Britiſh Soil, as Buchanan would have it.

But notwithſtanding the Silence of the Roman Hiſtorians, we learn from Inſcriptions the Names of three Proprætors under Gordian III, viz. Mæcilius Fuſcus, Cneius Lucilianus, (both mentioned in two Inſcriptions found at Lancheſter in the County of Durham) and Nonnius Philippius, (in one found at old Carliſle, dated 242.)

(12) 'Till Conſtantine's Time the Governor of Britain was called the Emperor's Proprætor or Lieutenant. But afterwards (as appears in the Notitia of the Empire) the Iſland was governed by a Vicar or Deputy, under the Præfectus Prætorio of Gaul. See Zoſim. Hiſt. l. 2. p. 678. The Enſigns of his Government were, 1. A Draught of the five Provinces of Britain expreſſed in ſeveral Buildings, with their Names on the triangular Form of the Iſland, as if they comprehended the whole Iſland. 2. The Book of their Inſtructions covered with Green, and the Commiſſion in a gilt Cover, with ſeveral Letters inſcribed on the Book. The Letters were, F. L. I. N. T. A. L. L. C. O. M. O. RD. P. R. i. e. Frons libri juſſu noſtro tranſcripti a laterculis continentis mandata ordinaria principis. There were two Books called the Laterculum Majus, and the Laterculum Minus. The firſt contained the Names, Inſtructions, &c. of the higher Officers, as the ſecond did thoſe of the inferior Officers. See Pancirol in Not. Imperii.

time, Britain was divided into two Provinces only. But that Emperor was pleaſed to divide it into three. The firſt was called Britannia Prima (1), containing all the Country South of the Thames, the Capital London. The ſecond, named Britannia Secunda, contained all the Country Weſt of the Severn to the Iriſh Sea, now called Wales, the Capital Iſca or Caerleon. All the reſt lying northward of the Thames, and eaſtward of the Severn, made up the third Province, diſtinguiſhed by the Name of Maxima Cæſarienſis, the Capital York. This laſt was afterwards ſubdivided into two Parts; the ſouthern Part retained the old Name of Maxima Cæſarienſis, and the other more northward, was called Flavia Cæſarienſis. But whether this Subdiviſion was made by Conſtantine is uncertain. In theſe three Provinces were twenty-eight large Cities, which in time became ſo many Biſhops Seats. The Lieutenant of the Præfect of Gaul had four Magiſtrates under him, two Conſulars, and two with the Title of Preſidents. Theſe Magiſtrates, with ſeveral inferior Officers, managed all Civil and Criminal Matters.

As for the military Government, there were in the Empire two Generaliſſimo's (2); one for the Eaſt, and the other for the Weſt. Each of theſe in the ſeveral Provinces in his Juriſdiction had others under him. In Great-Britain there were three General Officers to command the Militia; namely, The Count of Britain (3), the Duke of Britain (4), and the Count of the Saxon Coaſts (5). The Buſineſs of the Firſt was to keep Peace in the inland Parts of the Iſland, and probably of the weſtern Coaſts. The Second's Province was to defend the North from the Irruptions of the Picts and Scots. The Third was to guard the eaſtern and ſouthern Coaſts from the frequent Inroads of the Saxon Pyrates. Each of theſe Generals had a certain Number of Troops under his Command, and the Three together could form a Body of twenty thouſand Foot and about two thouſand Horſe (6.)

Beſides theſe civil and military Officers, there were others for more private Concerns; for Inſtance, The Count of the Emperor's Largeſſes, that is, the Receiver General or High-Treaſurer (7), had in Britain three Officers, a Regiſter (8), a Treaſurer (9), and a Procurator (10). And the Count or Auditor of the private Revenues of the Emperor, had alſo one to look after the Affairs belonging to his Office. From an Inſcription found not long ſince, 'tis thought there was alſo a Procurator of the Gladiators (11). Theſe were the principal Roman Officers in Britain, who with numberleſs others, ſought theſe Employments only to enrich themſelves at the Expence of the Province.

I have mentioned two of the three things in Conſtantine's Reign that Britain was concerned in. The Third is the Removal of the Imperial Seat from Rome to Conſtantinople. After this Removal the Emperor was frequently obliged to drain his weſtern Provinces of their Forces (12), which in the end proved extremely detrimental to them, as it gave the northern Nations Opportunity to ravage their Borders by continual Irruptions. Britain, though ſcreened from theſe Invaſions by the Sea that ſurrounded her, felt the Effects of them however, being often forc'd to ſupply Troops for the Defence of other Provinces. In the mean time the Britons were ſo expoſed to the Ravages of the Picts and Scots, that they were forced at laſt to call in a foreign Nation to their Aid, which in Time became Maſter of the Iſland.

337. Affairs of Britain from Conſtantine to Valentinian.

After the Death of Conſtantine, the Roman Empire was divided between his three Sons; but in a little time Conſtantius, one of the three Brothers, being poſſeſſed of the whole, ſent into Britain a Notary, one Paulus (13), who committed numberleſs Extortions. Complaints were brought to the Emperor, but he was not prevailed with to recal this Miniſter, tho' he publickly abus'd his Authority. Martinus then Governor of the Province, was long Witneſs of theſe Abuſes without daring to oppoſe them, Paulus having an independent Commiſſion. At length ſeeing no end of his unjuſt Proceedings, he could not forbear adviſing him to uſe his Power with more Moderation, declaring withal he would quit his Government rather than employ his Authority any longer in countenancing ſuch Oppreſſions. Paulus proud of his Maſter's Favour, inſolently told him, that they who found fault with his Conduct, deſerved to be put in Irons, ſince the daring thus to oppoſe the Execution of the Emperor's Orders, could not but proceed from a Spirit of Rebellion. The Governor, inraged at theſe Words, draws his Sword and ſtrikes at him, but miſſing his Blow, plunges it into his own Breaſt and kills himſelf.

353. The Extortions of Paulus. Amm. Mar.

After Martinus's Death, the Britons were expoſed more than ever to the Oppreſſions of Paulus. This mercileſs Man condemned to Death, Baniſhment, or Impriſonment, all that made the leaſt Reſiſtance to his Will, and the Emperor never concerned himſelf to reſtrain him (14.)

355. About the End of Conſtantine's Reign, the Government of the Weſt was conferred on Julian, now created Cæſar, who reſided at Paris. Shortly after his arrival there, News came that the Picts and Scots had made Incurſions into the Province of Britain, that it was neceſſary to ſend a ſpeedy Aſſiſtance. Whereupon Lupicinus receives Orders to repair thither with all Expedition; but is recalled before he reaches London. Probably, the northern People had appeaſed Julian by their Submiſſion.

Julian governs the Weſt. Amm. Mar. 360. 361. Sends Lupicinus into Britain.

From that time to the Reign of Valentinian I. nothing remarkable happened in Britain. But under that Emperor the Iſland was in a wretched Condition, by the joint Attacks of the Picts, Scots, Attacots (15), Franks, and Saxons. All theſe Nations, by Accident or a common League, invaded the Roman Province at once and made great Ravages. Nectaridius, Count or Guardian of the Coaſts, was defeated and ſlain by theſe new Enemies, and ſoon after, Duke Buchobaudes had the ſame Fate. Severus and Jovinus were ſucceſſively ſent into Britain to put a ſtop to their Ravages, but to no purpoſe. At laſt, the Emperor Valentinian pitches upon Theodoſius the Elder, ſo called to diſtinguiſh him from his Son, the firſt Emperor of that Name, to go and command in the Iſland. Theodoſius behaves like a Man of Courage and Experience. At his Arrival, he divides his Army into three Bodies, the better to oppoſe thoſe of the Enemies that were diſperſed in the Iſland. Fortune favouring his Diligence and Valour, he routs them in ſeveral Encounters, and at laſt drives them out of the Roman Province, recovering all their Booty, with a ſmall Part of which he rewards his Troops, reſtoring the reſt to the Owners. The Barbarians being repuls'd, Theodoſius returns in Triumph to London, and perceiving the City to have loſt much of her ancient Splendor, omits nothing to reſtore her to her former Condition. London is not the ſole Object of his Care. He applies himſelf alſo to repair the other ruin'd Cities and Caſtles, and to put them in Condition to hinder another time the Invaſions of the northern People. He was not ſatisfied even with this Precaution. As the Enemies were retired beyond the two Friths, he thought it neceſſary for the ſafety of Britain to keep all the Country they had abandon'd. To that end, he built Fortreſſes on the Neck of Land between the two Seas, to keep them at a greater diſtance. By this means the Roman Territories were enlarged with a great Tract of Land, of which Theodoſius made a fifth Province, calling it Valentia, in honour of Valentinian. This Country was part of the Kingdom of the Picts, which was thereby conſiderably diminiſh'd. Theodoſius having thus ſettled Matters in Britain, returned to Rome, leaving the Iſland under the Command of the Governors of each of the five Provinces (16).

Valentinian I. had for his Succeſſors his Son Valentinian II. and Gratian. Shortly after, Maximus was ſent into Britain upon the Picts beginning to ſtir. At his Arrival, he forms a Deſign to reduce the whole Iſland under the Dominion of the Romans. But the Union of the two northern Nations being a grand Obſtacle to the Execution of his Project, he reſolves to divide them, if poſſible, and then attack them one after the other. In order to this, deſigning to make uſe of the Picts to deſtroy the Scots, firſt, he feigns to be extremely provok'd with the Scots, and charges them with being the ſole Cauſe of all the Troubles in Britain. Then he publickly engages the Picts to join their Forces with his, upon a Promiſe of giving them all the Lands that ſhould be taken from the Scots. This Artifice has all the Succeſs he expected. 378. Gratian aſſociates Theodoſius in the Empire. Zoſim. l. 4.

Whilſt this General was employed in inlarging the Bounds of the Empire, Gratian, joint Emperor of the Weſt with Valentinian his Brother, aſſociates Theodoſius the Younger, Son of Theodoſius the Elder, who had commanded in Britain. This Choice, though univerſally applauded, diſpleaſes Maximus, who thinks himſelf more worthy of the Purple than the Perſon inveſted with it. He takes the Preference given by Gratian to Theodoſius as a heinous Affront, and therefore can't bear the Thought of ſerving ſo ungrateful a Maſter, and a young Prince ſo much in his Opinion beneath him in Merit. The Vexation to ſee himſelf thus ſlighted, throws him into a Reſolution to aſſume the Imperial Dignity. and ſo put himſelf upon an Equality with the Perſon Gratian had given him for Sovereign. After forming this Project, he alters his Meaſures. Inſtead of making War upon the Picts, according to his former Reſolution, he thinks only how to gain their Friendſhip. His Intent was to leave Britain in quiet and attached to his Intereſt, whilſt he was elſewhere employed againſt the three Emperors, from whom he deſigned to wreſt the Empire. But an unexpected War ariſing in Britain, prevented him from diſcovering his Purpoſe ſo ſoon as he intended. The Scots, ſtrengthened with the Aſſiſtance of the Iriſh, make an Irruption into the North, and endeavour to recover the Dominions from whence they were chaſed. Maximus therefore is forced to employ againſt them the Forces prepared for the Execution of his other Projects. He defeats them ſeveral times, and at length drives them back into Ireland, where he makes a Show of following them, to deprive them of that Refuge, and puniſh the Iriſh. But the Iriſh dreading to ſee a Roman Army in their Iſland, ſend to him to make his own Terms, which he did in a much more favourable manner than they expected, with intent to ſtifle all Seeds of Diviſion and Diſcontent, that might any way fruſtrate his principal Deſign.

Maximus grants a Peace to the Iriſh.

After theſe Troubles are appeaſed, Maximus aſſumes the Imperial Purple, and quits Britain to go and fight Gratian. He leads all the Roman Forces into Gaul, with a conſiderable Body of ſuch Britons as are fit to bear Arms. Thus Britain was on a ſudden deſtitute of Soldiers, and conſequently ſo weak, that ſhe could not defend herſelf in caſe of Attack. The Roman Hiſtorians inform us, that Maximus cauſing Gratian to be aſſaſſinated as he was flying into Italy, and dethroning Valentinian II, was himſelf vanquiſhed and beheaded by Theodoſius. This Victory procured the Reſtoration of Valentinian, who was ſoon after murdered by Arbogaſtes, and Eugenius placed on the Throne. Theodoſius was therefore forced to fight the new Uſurper, who met with the ſame Fate as Maximus. Eugenius being dead, Arbogaſtes deſpairing to eſcape due Puniſhment, lays violent Hands on himſelf (1). Thus Theodoſius remains ſole Maſter of the Empire, and keeps Poſſeſſion as long as he lives. The Fame of his Victories, and the Mildneſs of his Government keep his Subjects in Obedience, and his Neighbours in Awe. The Picts in particular, lived peaceably in their Country without moleſting the Britons.

392. Affairs of the Empire.

After the Death of Theodoſius, the Empire was divided between his two Sons. Arcadius was Emperor of the Eaſt, and Honorius of the Weſt. As Honorius was very young, the famous Stilico, by the Emperor his Father's Order, was Regent during his Minority. His firſt Care was to ſend a Governor into Britain with a Legion, to curb the Inſolence of the Picts, who after Theodoſius's Death, began to make Inroads into the Roman Province. He made choice of Victorinus, a Perſon of a fierce and arrogant Temper, who not ſatisfied with cooping up the Picts in their Country, treated them as Subjects of the Empire. He pretended to ſtretch his Authority ſo far as to forbid them to crown another King in the room of Hengiſt, whom Death had juſt taken out of the World. This Proceeding convinced the Picts, Victorinus had a Deſign to attack them, and laid them under Apprehenſions that after having helped to drive out the Scots, they ſhould be forced to follow them now that they could no longer depend upon the Aſſiſtance of their Neighbours, as formerly. They conſidered, by the Retreat of the Scots, they were deprived of an Aid, which in time to come might be to them very neceſſary. The little Regard the Roman Governor had for them making them apprehenſive he had formed ſome Deſign againſt their Liberty, they thought of Means to avoid their Ruin, by repairing the Error they had committed. In this State of Fear and Uncertainty, they reſolved to recall the Scots. To which end they ſend an honourable Embaſſy to Fergus, a Prince of the Blood-Royal of Scotland, who was retired into Denmark, and invite him with his Countrymen to come and take poſſeſſion again of the Country they were forced to abandon. As a farther Inducement they promiſe him the Command of their Army in the War with the Romans, which to them ſeemed unavoidable. Fergus accepts theſe Offers, and acquaints the fugitive Scots that he is ready to lead them back into their Country. There could never be a more favourable Juncture. The Roman Empire was not only rent with inteſtine Troubles by the Diſcord which reigned among the Governors, but powerfully attacked by barbarous Nations that ravag'd the Borders. Theſe Diſorders had obliged Stilico to recal Victorinus with his Legion, and employ him in other Parts, where the Occaſion was more urgent. At this very Juncture the Scots re-enter the Iſland under the Conduct of Fergus, whom they unanimouſly chuſe for their King (2).

As ſoon as Fergus II. is ſeated in the Throne, he meditates Revenge upon the Romans, which to him appears the more eaſy to effect, as they are extremely weakened by the Departure of Victorinus. Purſuant to this Reſolution, he aſſembles the Forces of both Nations, of which he was inveſted with the Command, and after taking the Fortreſſes built by Theodoſius the Elder, between the two Friths, advances to Severus's Wall. The ſmall Number of Troops left by the Romans in the Iſland not being able to defend a Wall of ſo great Length, the Picts and Scots enter the Roman Province with little or no Difficulty, and lay waſte the Country.

Being made King he wars againſt the Romans.

After Britain had ſubmitted to the Roman Yoke, a great Number of foreign Families removed thither, ſprung for the moſt part from the Veteran Soldiers, ſettled there. Theſe Families had ſo mixt with the Natives, that they now made but one People, governed by Officers ſent from Rome. I ſhall therefore call this mixt People henceforward by the Name of Britons, becauſe the Romans and other Foreigners, as well as the Natives, had the ſame Intereſt to defend Britain, now become their common Country. The Britons then finding themſelves thus harraſſed by their Neighbours, and deſpairing of Aſſiſtance from Rome, reſolve to elect an Emperor, whoſe Intereſt it ſhould be to protect them. Their Choice falls upon one Marcus an Officer of great Credit among them; but the new Sovereign not having the good Fortune to pleaſe all the World, is quickly ſlain or dethroned, and another, called Gratian, choſen in his Room. This laſt being a Man of a cruel and bloody Diſpoſition, meets the ſame Fate, four Months after his Election.

As theſe two firſt Emperors did not anſwer Expectation, Conſtantine a common Soldier was next raiſed to the Imperial Dignity purely for the ſake of his Name, which was thought to be fortunate. The new Emperor being a Man of Courage, and of a Genius far above his former Condition, beats back the northern People into their Country, and then concludes a Peace with them. This Succeſs inſpiring him with a higher Conceit of his Merit and Fortune, he is not content to reign in Britain only, but forms a Deſign to become Maſter of the whole Empire. To this end he draws together the Remains of thoſe that can bear Arms, as well Romans as Iſlanders, and forming an Army, paſſes into Gaul. His Intention was to improve the preſent favourable Juncture. Honorius was then attacked by Alaric King of the Goths, who a few Years after, became Maſter of Rome. Whilſt Conſtantine is making Preparations, he ſends Ambaſſadors to Honorius, to acquaint him with his being choſen Emperor by Britain, and to excuſe his accepting the Imperial Dignity without his Knowledge. Honorius, now preſſed by Alaric, is forced to admit of Conſtantine's Excuſes, and own him for his Aſſociate in the Empire. The Emperor's Condeſcention is not capable of ſatisfying the ambitious Conſtantine, whoſe Deſigns and Hopes are vaſtly inlarged. At his Arrival in Gaul, he aſſociates his Son Conſtans, taken out of the Monaſtery at Wincheſter; and leaving him an Army to maintain his Authority in theſe Provinces, marches towards the Alps in order to paſs into Italy and dethrone Honorius. Conſtans had for General of his Troops one Gerontius, who by his prudent Conduct, not only made his Maſter reſpected in Gaul, but alſo put him in poſſeſſion of Spain. The young Emperor was ſo exalted with this unexpected Succeſs, that for fear the Honour which he thought wholly belonged to himſelf, ſhould be aſcribed to Gerontius, he removed him from his Poſt. So ungrateful a Return goes not long unpuniſhed. Gerontius, exaſperated at the Affront, finds Means to aſſemble the Army, and cauſing Maximus, a Conſtantine ſeeing the Face of Affairs altered by the Revolt of Gerontius, and the Death of his Son, lays aſide his Deſign of going into Italy, and retires to Arles, where he is beſieged by Gerontius. But while Gerontius is pleaſed with the Hopes of having him ſoon in his own Power, he is forced on a ſudden to raiſe the Siege, and march againſt a more formidable Enemy. Count Conſtantius, to whom Honorius had given the Command of his Armies, upon the Peace lately concluded between the Emperor and the King of the Goths (1), was advancing with all ſpeed to curb the Inſolence of the Tyrants of Gaul. Upon his Approach, Gerontius is ſuddenly deſerted by his Army, and forced to fly into Spain, where he is ſlain by his own People. Conſtantine had no better Fortune than Gerontius. He was taken at Arles, with his Son Julian and his Brother Sebaſtian. Though before the Surrender of the Town he had taken Prieſts Orders, he was nevertheleſs ſent to the Emperor and beheaded.

The Britons thus left to themſelves after the Departure of the Roman Soldiers, and the Flower of their Youth, are quickly reduced to great Extremities. The Picts and Scots continue their Ravages without Oppoſition, by reaſon of the Weakneſs of their Enemies. This wretched State held ſome Years, and the Romans were not able to help it. They were too much taken up with their own Affairs to think of Britain. The Goths had renewed the War under the Conduct of Alaric, and having taken and ſacked the City of Rome, were now in poſſeſſion of Gaul (2). On the other Side, the Suevi, Vandals (3), Cotti, and Alani (4), had over-run Spain. In vain therefore do the Britons implore the Emperor's Aſſiſtance. He is neither able nor willing to give them any; Britain, ſo carefully preſerved by his Predeceſſors, beginning now to be a Burden. Wherefore to free himſelf at once from their Importunities, he voluntarily reſigns the Sovereignty of the Iſland, and diſcharges the Inhabitants of their Allegiance to the Empire. This ſolemn Renunciation was made in the Year 410, a little after Alaric's taking of Rome.

The Liberty the Britons had thus recovered, ſerved only to render them more miſerable. Whereas before they might claim the Protection of the Emperor, they were now deſtitute of all Hopes of Aſſiſtance. However, the Affairs of the Romans happening afterwards to be ſomewhat reſtored under Valentinian III, by the Victories of the famous Ætius over the Wiſigoths and Burgundians, this General, out of Pity to the wretched Condition of the Britons, ſends them a Legion commanded by Gallio of Ravenna, or as ſome ſay, by Maximian. This Aid arriving unexpectedly, beat back with eaſe the northern Nations, and forced them to retire into the Country. But the Emperor having occaſion for the Legion, they were recalled, juſt as the Enemies were preparing to renew their Devaſtations.

Advice of the Roman Commander to the Britons. Bede, l. 1. c. 21.

Before his Departure the Roman Commander told the Britons plainly, they were to expect no farther Aſſiſtance from the Emperor, who was wholly employed elſewhere againſt the northern Nations of Europe, whoſe Ravages extended to all parts of the Empire. After this Declaration, he adviſes them to inure themſelves to Arms, that they may be able to withſtand the continual Attacks of their Enemies; and conſidering their Weakneſs, exhorts them to repair the Wall of Severus to ſerve them for a Barrier; offering them the Aſſiſtance of his Soldiers and his own Direction in the Work. What could the Britons do in this their Extremity? They had no other Method to take, but That propoſed to them by the Roman Captain, and therefore fell to work upon their Wall with all poſſible Diligence, which as ſoon as they had finiſhed, the Romans took their laſt Farewel of Britain never to return more. The End of the Roman Dominion over Britain is to be fixed to the Time of this Legion leaving the Iſland, in the Year 426 to 427 (5).

They repair Severus's Wall.

The Romans quit Britain. Uſher. Gildas, n. 15. Bede, l. 1. c. 12.

The Picts and Scots, who lived in ſtrict Union after the Coronation of Fergus, began their Hoſtilities againſt the Britons with more Confidence than ever, when they heard of the Departure of the Roman Forces. The Wall of Severus lately repaired, is attacked afreſh, and abandoned at laſt, being defended only by Britons little uſed to war.

After which, the northern People made large Breaches in ſeveral Places, that it might be no Obſtacle to their future Incurſions into their Enemies Country. About this Time Fergus dies as he is returning to Ireland, leaving his young Son Eugenius II. a Minor, under the Regency of Greham his Grandfather by his Mother's Side.

The Weakneſs of the Britons was then ſo great, that deſpairing to reſiſt their Enemies, they abandoned part of their Country, and retired more Southward. Whereupon the Picts and Scots, grown more bold by their Advantages, form new Projects, and think of Means to drive the Britons entirely out of the Iſland. To this end they reſolve to ſend for Colonies from Ireland and the adjacent Iſles, to people the Lands forſaken by the Britons, as well as thoſe they hope to take from them hereafter. But Greham prevents, by his Authority, the Execution of this Project, fearing the Return of the Romans, and the making Scotland the Scene of the War. It may be, he was not altogether ignorant of the ſad Condition then of the Roman Empire; but knew not how low it was; and therefore, thought fit to oppoſe the Deſigns of the Scots, and prefer a ſolid Peace, with ſome real, though not great, Advantages, to a War which, as he imagined, might be attended with dangerous Conſequences. A Peace then was offer'd to the Britons upon honourable Terms, and by them gladly accepted. By the Treaty the Wall of Severus was to be the common Boundary of the two Nations. But for this Advantage the Britons were obliged to pay a conſiderable Sum of Money. The Scots thinking this Peace not advantageous enough, loudly murmur'd at it; but Greham took care to ſee it obſerved during his Adminiſtration.

The Britons abandon part of their Country.

Greham Regent of Scotland makes a Peace with the Britons.

As ſoon as Eugenius II was of Age to take the Reins of the Government into his own Hands, he reſolved to break a Treaty, which his Subjects had proteſted againſt. He knew the Romans were not in condition to aſſiſt Britain, and the Opportunity appeared too favourable to be neglected. Purſuant to this Reſolution, he ſends Ambaſſadors to the Britons, and haughtily demands all the Lands poſſeſſed by the Scots before the late Treaty. The Chief of the Britons, ſurprized at this unexpected Demand, convene a general Aſſembly to conſider of an Anſwer to the King of Scotland. The Majority of the Aſſembly, provoked at the Haughtineſs of their Neighbours, and knowing they only wanted an Excuſe to renew the War, were of opinion to reject their Demand. "It is eaſy (ſay they) to perceive the Scots "will not be ſatisfied hereafter with their preſent Demands. "Their Aim is only to have an Entrance into the Coun- "try, that they may with leſs Difficulty become Maſters "of the whole; and it will be an eaſier Taſk to prevent "them from entering, than to drive them out when once "they are ſettled. In ſhort, ſince a War is unavoidable, "it will be very imprudent to grant what they demand, "under colour of preſerving a Peace which cannot laſt "long." Others not ſo warm, knowing the extreme Weakneſs of the Nation, were of another Mind. They were for finding ſome Expedient to ſatisfy the Scots, and avoid, if poſſible, a War which muſt prove fatal to the Britons. "They deſire the Aſſembly to conſider what pro- "digious Number of Soldiers were drawn out of the "Iſland by the Romans to ſupply their Armies abroad; "how many Maximus carried with him that were ſettled "in Gaul; and laſtly how the Country was drain'd of all "that could bear Arms by Conſtantine. To this they add, "the Weakneſs of the Nation was but too viſible in their "late War with the Scots, when their frequent Defeats "obliged them to abandon the very Lands now demanded, "the Poſſeſſion of which was entirely owing to the Ge- "neroſity of Greham; it is therefore better for the Britons "to give up freely what they cannot keep, than for the "ſake of that, to run the Riſk of loſing their All."

Diſſentions among the Britons.

Tho' theſe Reaſons were very weighty, they were overruled by the violent Party, and Conan one of the wiſeſt and moſt powerful of the Nation, for dwelling too long upon the Advantages of Peace, was deemed a Traitor, and torn in pieces by them. After that none daring to oppoſe it, the Ambaſſadors were ſent back with an inſulting Anſwer. This haſty Reſolution was followed with a War more deſtructive to the Britons than their former ones, and which entirely weakened them by the Loſs of fourteen or fifteen thouſand Men in one ſingle Battle. Reduc'd to Extremity, they have no courſe left but to ſue in a ſuppliant Manner for that Peace they ſo haughtily refuſed. They obtain it indeed, but upon very hard Terms. By the new Treaty, they are obliged to give up all the Country north

Cauſe of the Britons Weakneſs.

The extreme Weakneſs of the Britons will not be thought ſtrange, if it be conſidered in the firſt Place, they were not uſed to War. The Romans, who had long been Maſters of the Iſland, never ſuffered them to exerciſe their Arms; it being their Cuſtom always to employ foreign Troops in their Conqueſts. For this reaſon the Soldiers levied in Britain were ſent into other Provinces, from whence they never returned. Theſe Levies were ſo numerous that there were twelve conſiderable Bodies of Britons in the Roman Armies diſperſed in the ſeveral Provinces of the Empire, and always recruited from Britain. In the next place, Maximus and Conſtantine led ſuch great Armies from thence, as almoſt drained the Iſland of Men fit to bear Arms. In fine, if to this be added the late Loſſes ſuſtained by the Britons after the Departure of the Romans, it is no Wonder they became ſo eaſy a Prey to their Enemies.

Confuſion in the Hiſtory of thoſe Days.

From this Time to the coming in of the Saxons, the Hiſtory of Britain is very confuſed, by reaſon of the Diſagreement of the Writers, which makes it very difficult to diſcover the Truth, and much more ſo to fix all the Dates. What can be gathered with any certainty is, that the Britons elected ſeveral Kings, whoſe Actions are unknown; and that theſe Kings were eſtabliſhed, and afterwards killed or dethroned, according to the Humour and Intereſt of the leading Men. Probably too, ſeveral Kings reigned at the ſame time in different Provinces, and by their Diſcord and Wars contributed to the weakening one another. To complete their Misfortunes, Britain was afflicted with a cruel Famine, which raged alſo in moſt Parts of the World. This terrible Scourge rendered the Country quite deſolate, People dying with Hunger by thouſands. In this extreme Diſtreſs, Multitudes of poor Wretches, to ſave their Lives, fly into Armorica, where great part of Maximus's Army was already ſettled. Others, rather than ſtarve with Hunger, threw themſelves upon the Picts and Scots. Amidſt theſe Deſolations, the northern People, their irreconcileable Enemies, taking Advantage of their Misfortunes, break the Treaty, and paſſing the Humber, ravage the Country in a mercileſs manner.

The Britons Letter to Ætius Gildas, n. 17.

The miſerable State of the Britons forces them to apply once more to the Romans for Aſſiſtance. They ſend, upon this Occaſion, a very moving Letter to Ætius then in Gaul (2): We know not (ſay they) which way to turn us. The Barbarians drive us to the Sea, and the Sea forces us back to the Barbarians; between which we have only the choice of two Deaths, either to be ſwallowed up by the Waves, or butchered by the Sword. Ætius was then preparing to repulſe Attila, who was entered Gaul with an Army of eighty thouſand Men, and therefore not being in condition to grant their Requeſt, ſent them word that the Affairs of the Empire would not ſuffer him to aſſiſt them, neither were they to depend upon him (3). So mortifying an Anſwer threw the miſerable Britons into the utmoſt Conſternation, not knowing what Meaſures to take, to free themſelves from their unfortunate Circumſtances. In this Diſtreſs, it is judged proper by the chief Men of the Nation to call a General Aſſembly, and conſider of ſome poſſible Remedy for their Calamities, which daily increaſe. They agreed at laſt to chuſe a Monarch (4) as the only Expedient to ſave them from Deſtruction, in expectation, that when united under one Head, their Diviſions would ceaſe, and their Enemies be more ſtrongly reſiſted. But the Diſcord that reigned among the principal Members of the State, prevented the good Effects of this Expedient. Several Great Men, having fortified themſelves in diverſe Parts, acted like Sovereigns. All theſe petty Tyrants, jealous of one another, far from owning the Monarch elect, fought only to deſtroy him, in order to be choſen in his room. It was therefore impoſſible for theſe Monarchs to ſubſiſt long, ſince not being agreeable to all, the Male-contents joined together for their Deſtruction: Thus the Britons, whilſt they endeavour to unite themſelves under one Head, are plunged the deeper into Anarchy and Confuſion.

They chuſe a Monarch.

Great Diſcord and Confuſion among the Britons.

We know not the Names of any of theſe Monarchs 'till Vortigern, Count or King of the Dunmonij (5), elected in the Year 445. This Prince, as he was the moſt powerful and ambitious, could never brook a Superior, and therefore was all along a profeſſed Enemy to the preceding Monarchs, and contributed to their Ruin. Nay, 'tis affirmed by Hiſtorians, that he aſſaſſinated his Predeceſſor to make room for himſelf. Thoſe that imagine Conſtans Son of Conſtantine killed at the Siege of Vienne, to be his immediate Predeceſſor, are certainly miſtaken, ſince there was at leaſt forty Years ſpace between the Death of Conſtans and the Election of Vortigern (6).

Vortigern is elected in 445.

The new Monarch was by no means qualified to reſtore the Affairs of the Britons. As he attained to the ſupreme Dignity by Artifice and Cabal, he wholly bent his Thoughts to maintain himſelf in the Throne by the ſame wicked Methods, regardleſs of the general Welfare of his Subjects. He was moreover of a cruel and avaritious Temper, addicted to many Vices; and ſo lewd, that he debauched his own Daughter, by flattering her with Hopes of being a Queen (7). Mean while there was a Neceſſity to think of repulſing the Enemies, and Vortigern knew himſelf incapable of ſuch an Undertaking, though he had been choſen for that very purpoſe. But what troubled and perplexed him moſt, was, his being ſo little beloved by the People, and the continual Fear of being dethroned. The Examples of the Monarchs his Predeceſſors being never out of his Mind, he was apprehenſive the ſame Courſe would be taken with him, ſince he was ſo little able to anſwer the good Opinion conceived of him when raiſed to the Throne. Living thus in equal Dread of the Enemies of the State and of his own Subjects, he fancied he had deviſed an Expedient to free himſelf from the Danger of the one, and Plots of the other. But as he could not put his Deſign in practiſe without the Conſent of the Britons, he calls a General-Aſſembly, and makes a long Speech, before he comes to the Point. " He deſcribes in a ſtrong and " lively Manner the extreme Miſery of the Nation: Ac- " cuſes the Romans of being the ſole Cauſe of the Miſ- " fortunes of the Britons, by draining the Iſland of all her " Youth fit to bear Arms, and then leaving her to the " Inſults of her Neighbours. He enlarges upon the great " Loſſes ſuſtained ſince by the Britons, and the manifeſt " Danger of being either driven out of their Country, or " utterly deſtroyed, by reaſon of their Weakneſs. For " his part, he is always ready to hazard his Life for the " Service of the Nation: but conſidering the few Troops " in his Power, and the little Union between the principal " Members of the State, he has no Hopes that his weak " Endeavours will be able to reſcue his Subjects from their " preſent Calamities. In this melancholy State of Affairs,

Not. on Poly-Olb. p. 84.

(3) As this is the laſt mention of the Romans, it may not be amiſs to give a brief Account of the Legions that came into the Iſland. Julius Cæſar brought with him the firſt time the ſeventh, and tenth his favorite Legion. In his ſecond Deſcent he brought five Legions, but which they were, except the ſeventh, is unknown. All theſe return'd the ſame Year they came. Under Claudius came four Legions, (with their proper Auxiliaries, making an Army of about Fifty Thouſand Men) namely the ſecond, the ninth, the fourteenth and the twentieth. The ſecond called Legio ſecunda Auguſta, came hither under the Command of Veſpaſian, and continued here to the very laſt. They were concern'd in building the Roman Wall in Scotland, as appears from the Inſcriptions. Their uſual Quarters were at Caerleon, though they were removed from thence at laſt, being plac'd at Rutupæ in the Notitia, where they are called Legio ſecunda Britannica ſive Secunda, i. e. Thoſe of the ſecond Legion, as the Quintani, Quarta-decumani, &c. are thoſe of the fifth and fourteenth in Tacitus. Ptolemy places this Legion at Iſca Dumnoniorum, or Exeter, which might be miſtaken for Iſca Silurum or Caer-leon. The ninth was cut in pieces by Boadicea; it was recruited with two thouſand Soldiers, and eight auxiliary Cohorts, but attacked again, as being the weakeſt, by the Caledonians. After which, being no more heard of, it was either broke or incorporated with the fifth Legion brought over by Hadrian. It is ſuppoſed to have been ſtationed at York, where an Inſcription was found with theſe Words, Legio nona Victrix. The fourteenth was the only Legion, ſays Tacitus, that together with the Vexillarii of the twentieth (that is, ſix hundred ſelect Men of a Legion) was entirely engaged in the Battle with Boadicea's Army. This Legion was recalled by Nero, ordered back by Vitellius, and ſent for again by Veſpaſian; after which they ſeemed never to have returned to Britain any more. As they left Britain, before the Humour of erecting Inſcriptions, it is no Wonder they are not mentioned in any. The twentieth is thus expreſſed in the Roman Inſcriptions, L E G. XX. V. V. That is, Legio Viceſima Valens (or Valeria) Victrix. The ſtated Quarters of this Legion was Deva or Weſt-Cheſter, which probably was therefore honoured with the Name of a Colony, as in one of Geta's Coins with this Legend, COLONIA DIVANA LEGIO XX VICTRIX. This Legion was with the ſecond employed in building the Roman Forts and Walls. It does not appear when they left Britain. Beſides theſe four Legions, there came with Hadrian the ſixth, uſually thus expreſſed, L E G. VI. V. P. F. that is, Legio Sexta Victrix Pia Fidelis. This Legion was a long time in Britain. They are frequently mentioned in the Inſcriptions on Severus's Wall. Their ſtated Quarters were at York. From what has been ſaid it appears, that for twenty five Years from Claudius's Invaſion, till the fourteenth was recalled by Nero, and afterwards by Veſpaſian) there were four Legions in Britain. From the firſt Year of Veſpaſian to Hadrian's Reign, only three; and from Hadrian's time (when the ſixth came over) to the loweſt Empire, there were ſtill but three; the ninth being broken or incorporated with the ſixth. The Reader may ſee a large Account of theſe Things in Horſley, B I. c. 6.

(4) By Monarch here is to be underſtood, one ſuperior to the other Heads, or Kings, on whom they were in ſome Meaſure dependent. See Selden and Malmſbury Rapin.

(5) Inhabitants of Devon and Cornwal. Rowland thinks Dannonium is the true Word for Cornwal, and Dunmoniam for Devonſhire, or the Britiſh Dyfuctint. The Corniſh write and pronounce (d) as (2). He derives both theſe Words from Mŏn, ſignifying the utmoſt or fartheſt.

(6) Alford and others place Vortigern's Election between 430 and 436. The common Opinion is followed here, which appears to be moſt probable. Rapin.

(7) This Story of Vortigern's Inceſt ſeems altogether unlikely. At leaſt, the Dialogue between Vortigern and St. Germain, and his being condemned in a great Council of Clergy and Laity, in which St. Germain preſided, is certainly falſe, that Saint being dead a Year before the Saxons arrived in Britain. And indeed, when is it that he ſhould commit this Crime? Not before he married Rowena, for Nennius places it afterwards; nor could it well be during the time of his Marriage with her, ſince, as the ſame Author relates, ſhe continued his Wife long after, when he was taken Priſoner by Hengiſt, and it is very ſtrange he ſhould fall in Love with his own Daughter, when he had another Wife, whom he is ſaid to love ſo well, that he was divorced from his firſt for her ſake. See Tyrrel, Vol. I. p. 127, 128.

" ple, being parted from Britain by a ſmall Arm of the " Sea only, can be as ſpeedy with their Aid as their preſ-
" ſing Occaſions require: They are already grown formi" dable to the northern Nations, and by the Arrival of
" ſome of their Troops the Britons will quickly be in con" dition to reſiſt their Enemies, and perhaps repay them
" in their own Coin." He concludes with repreſenting,
" The thing will hardly admit of Debate; the Britons
" cannot be without a foreign Aid, and none but the
" Saxons are in condition to give them Aſſiſtance."

His Propoſal is approved. Stillingfleet. Orig. Brit.

The Fears all were ſeized with, and the Hopes of ſtill enjoying their native Country, and recovering their loſt Eſtates, and no doubt the Deſire of Revenge, conſpired to a joyful Reception of Vortigern's Propoſal. But when they came to conſider of the Terms to be offered the Saxons, great Debates aroſe. The Monarch, whoſe ſecret Purpoſe was to ſtrengthen himſelf as well againſt his own Subjects as foreign Enemies, mov'd, the allotting them ſome Province, that their own Intereſt might induce them to wage War more heartily and vigorouſly. But as no Lands could be aſſigned them but what belonged to ſome of the Aſſembly, it was no eaſy Matter to agree on this Point. At length, after great Diſputes. it was reſolved that the Saxons ſhould have the Iſle of Thanet in Kent, as being a proper Place to land their Forces, and convenient for them whenever they wanted to return into their own Country. It was farther agreed, that the Saxon Soldiers ſhould be allowed Pay, which ſhould be ſettled by Agreement on both Sides. After this Reſolution, Ambaſſadors were appointed to negotiate the Affair in Germany. Vortigern, pleaſed with having carried his Point without incurring Suſpicion, imagined himſelf out of the Reach of all Danger. But ſee how blind and ſhort-ſighted is human Wiſdom! This very Expedient, by the direction of divine Providence, proved his own and the Nation's Ruin.

The Iſle of Thanet is to be given to the Saxons.

Ambaſſadors are named to go to the Saxons.

Vortigern's Policy proves fatal to the Country.

But before I proceed to the Effects of this pernicious Advice, it will be neceſſary to give a more particular Account of theſe Saxons, who are to be the chief Subject of our Hiſtory. They were ſo little known before their coming into Britain, and what is ſaid of their Original ſo uncertain, that it is no wonder this Subject is but very ſlightly touched upon by the Generality of the Engliſh Hiſtorians. Some barely ſay, the Saxons were called in to the Aſſiſtance of Britain, without any farther Addition concerning them. Others ſay only, the Saxons were a German People, without mentioning the Parts they inhabited. Some again add, they were Pyrates from the Cimbrian Cherſoneſus, that came and ſettled on the Coaſts of the German Ocean. But as theſe Coaſts are of a vaſt Extent, we are not much the wiſer for that. In ſhort, the moſt probable Account I can gather from the ſeveral Authors that have writ of this People, is as follows.

Origin of the Saxons and their Conqueſts in Germany. Sheringham.

About this Time the Romans began to extend their Conqueſts into Germany, the Inhabitants of the Cimbrian Cherſoneſus, now called Jutland, leaving ther Country, advanced towards the South. They poſſeſſed themſelves at firſt of the northern Parts of Germany, and doubtleſs ſpent ſome Years in ſettling themſelves in thoſe Quarters. But as the Romans had not yet penetrated ſo far, and we have no antient Hiſtories of the northern Countries, nor even of the weſtern, but what the Romans have left us, there is little known of the firſt Irruptions made by the northern People into Germany. The Cimbri continually puſhing their Conqueſts to the Southward, and the Romans advancing to the Northward, they at laſt approached one another. Then it was that the Romans had Opportunity to learn in ſome meaſure, the State of theſe hitherto unknown Nations.

Their Hiſtorians however ſpeak very confuſedly of them, giving ſometimes different Names to the ſame People, and ſometimes the ſame Name to different Nations. The Cimbri that came from the Cimbrian Cherſoneſus, were divided into three Bands, one taking the Name of Suevi, another of Francs, and a third of Saxons. Some will have the Francs to be a Branch of the Suevi. However that be, theſe three Nations, continually advancing Southwards, came at length to the Frontiers of the Roman Empire; the Suevi towards Italy, the Francs to the South-Weſt, towards the Coaſt of Belgic-Gaul, and the Saxons to the Weſt, towards the German Ocean. The Suevi eſpecially were ſo terrible to the antient Germans, that they looked upon them as a Match for the Immortal Gods, as Cæſar ſays in his Commentaries. As for the Francs, they are known to have over-run the whole Province of Gaul, and founded the noble and ancient Kingdom of France.

The Saxons poſſeſſed themſelves of thoſe Tracts of Land lying between the Rhine and the Elbe. Their Territories bounded on the Weſt by the German Ocean, extended Eaſtward to the Borders of Thuringen. Conſequently they were Maſters of Saxony, Weſtphalia, and all that part of the Low-Countries lying North of the Rhine. The Nations ſubdued by theſe Conquerors were in time called Saxons, in like manner as the Inhabitants of Gaul were named Francois or French, after their Subjection to the Francs. But however, whether the Saxons were not ſo rapid in their Conqueſts as the Suevi, or the Courſe they took made it longer before they approached the Romans, 'tis certain they were not ſo ſoon known. The firſt Roman Hiſtorians that mention them, at leaſt by the Name of Saxons, are Eutropius and Oroſius, who inform us that Carauſius (as I have elſewhere taken notice) was ſent to clear the Seas of the pyratical Francs and Saxons. From that time they became formidable to the Romans, and obliged them to keep ſtanding Forces to guard both the German and Britiſh Coaſts, with a General Officer ſtiled the Præfect, or Count of the Saxon Coaſts. Upon the Decline of the Roman Empire, after the Death of Theodoſius, the Saxons taking Advantage of its Weakneſs, made themſelves Maſters of the whole Country along the Coaſt of the German Ocean, and even extended their Conqueſts as far as the Iſles of Zealand. Hence the Friſons, Batavians, and the neighbouring Nations were hardly known by any other Name but that of the Saxons.

Tho' ſeveral Authors have writ of the Saxons, we are ſtill in the Dark as to their Original, or how to diſtinguiſh the Nations called by that general Name. And therefore the beginning of their Hiſtory remains very confuſed and intricate, it being almoſt impoſſible it ſhould be otherwiſe, conſidering, Authors for the moſt part have made no Diſtinction of Times or Places. One while, they are conſidered juſt as they left their own Country, and then are confounded with the Francs and Suevi, under the Name of Cimbri. Another while, they are viewed as beginning their Conqueſts towards the North-weſt of the Continent, and then they are repreſented as ſeated North of the Friſons, Batavians, Marſians, and other Nations of thoſe Parts ſubject to the Romans. Some have placed them at once along the Coaſt of the German Ocean, and Banks of the Rhine, and even in the Iſles of Zealand, as if they had from the very firſt inhabited theſe Regions. Others again, not conſidering that all their Conqueſts were termed Saxony, and finding Saxons in the eaſtern Parts of Weſtphalia, have imagined they were a different People from thoſe inhabiting on the Rhine. Juſt as if ſpeaking of the Francs, I ſhould make different Nations of Thoſe that conquered Gaul and Thoſe that ſettled in the Narbonnoiſe. However this be, it is certain when the Britons ſent to deſire their Aſſiſtance, the Saxons were in Poſſeſſion of Weſtphalia, Saxony, Eaſt and Weſt-Frizeland, Holland and Zealand.

Stillingfleet, Orig. Brit. Sheringham. de Orig. Ang.

Eyndius, Chron. zel.

I could wiſh the Origin of the Saxons were as well known as their Conqueſts: it would be a Pleaſure to give here an Abſtract of their Hiſtory to the Time of their ſettling in Great-Britain. But the thing is impoſſible, ſuch Obſcurity do we meet with in the Authors that have ſtudied this Subject. Some take up the Saxons at the Tower of Babel, and leading them from Country to Country, ſettle them at laſt in Saxony, ſo called from them. Others derive them from the Sacæ or Saſſones of Aſia, mentioned by Pliny. There are who will have them to be originally from Perſia, becauſe of the Affinity between ſeveral Saxon and Perſian Words (1). But they that are willing to ſpare the Pains of ſo laborious a Search, are content to begin their Hiſtory from the time of their coming forth from the Cimbrian Cherſoneſus. It is not impoſſible, perhaps, to reconcile moſt of the Opinions concerning this Matter, tho' ſeemingly very different, if Regard be had to the Times of their ſeveral Migrations. But ſince, in the main, Conjectures only are to be had, it is better to proceed at once to what is more certain.

The Saxons had for ſome time been in poſſeſſion of the Cimbrian Cherſoneſus, when driven thence by the Goths, (from whom that Peninſula was called Gothland or Jutland) they came and ſettled in Germany, in the Parts now called Lower-Saxony. Between that Country and the Cherſoneſus, were a People known by the Name of Angles, inhabiting about Sleſwick in Holſtein. Probably the little Country of Anglen in thoſe Parts was ſo named from them,

The Angles.

(1) Joſeph Scaliger ſays, that Fader, Muder, Broder, Tutchter, Band, and the like, are ſtill uſed in the Perſian Language, in the ſame Senſe as Father, Mother, Brother, Daughter, Bond, are with us.

or they from the Country (1). However this be, the Angles joining with the Saxons when they came out of the Cherſoneſus to make Conqueſts in Germany, became in a manner but one Nation with them. Though, doubtleſs from the major Part, they were generally called Saxons, yet they had ſometimes the compound Name of Anglo-Saxons given them. Great Numbers of Goths mixed likewiſe with them to ſhare in their Conqueſts. Theſe are called Wites (2) by Bede, and commonly known by the Name of Jutes, or (which is the ſame) Goths. It can hardly be doubted that theſe three Nations were united before their coming into Britain, when we conſider the good Underſtanding between them all the while they were employed in eſtabliſhing themſelves in the Iſland, as will be ſeen in the Courſe of this Hiſtory. It will be found that they acted always in concert; that their Intereſts were never different, and that the Government ſettled by them, is a clear Evidence, they looked upon themſelves as one and the ſame People.

Etymology of the Name of the Saxons. The true Etymology of the Name Saxon is as difficult to be diſcovered as their Origin. They that derive them from the Sacæ of Aſia, are indeed at no great loſs in this Point. But the moſt common Opinion is, that the Word Saxon comes from Seax, which in their Language ſignifies a kind of Weapon or Sword. They had two ſorts, a long one worn by their Side or at their Back; and another ſhorter, ſerving for a Bayonet or Dagger, They were both in the Shape of a Cutlace (3).

Manners and Government of the Saxons. Not to dwell too long upon Conjectures, I ſhall briefly ſpeak of their Manners, Government and Religion. It ſuffices to obſerve, that in their Cuſtoms and Manners, they very much reſemble the antient Germans, as deſcribed by Tacitus. They were naturally brave and warlike both by Land and Sea, witneſs their many Conqueſts. But to their Enemies they were ſevere and cruel, eſpecially to their Priſoners of War, whom they ſacrificed to their Gods.

Their Government. Verſtegan. Their Dominions were divided into twelve Governments or Provinces, each of which had a Chief or Head accountable to the General-Aſſembly of the Nation. In time of War they choſe a General who commanded their Armies, and was inveſted with almoſt Sovereign Power: but at the End of the War, his Authority, like that of the Roman Dictator, ceaſed. The Center of their Empire was at Brunſwick.

Their Religion. As for their Religion, it was the ſame with that of the other northern Nations, and ſome Part of Germany. The Britiſh Saxons embraced Chriſtianity about the End of the ſixth, or Beginning of the ſeventh Century. But thoſe that remained in Germany were not converted 'till the ninth, by the Care or rather Violence of Charlemain, by whom they were ſubdued. Their principal Gods before their Converſion were the Sun, Moon, Tuiſco, Woden, Thor, Friga or Fræa, and Seater. To theſe were conſecrated the ſeven Days of the Week, as appears by the preſent names of theſe Days among the Germans, Flemings, and Engliſh. Tuiſco is ſaid to be the Grandſon of Japhet, and to have peopled firſt the North of Europe. Teutch, as the Germans call themſelves, is probably derived from Tuiſco. The God Thor, from whence comes the Word Thunder or Dunder, was the ſame among the Saxons as Jupiter among the Romans, that is to ſay, the Thunderer. Woden was the God of War, becauſe under his Conduct the firſt Saxons came forth from their Country, and made large Conqueſts. Their chief Families conſidered him as their Founder, and gloried in being deſcended from him. Probably however there were two of this Name, that are often confounded; one more antient, worſhipped as a God, another not ſo old, from whom ſprung the Families of the Saxon Leaders. There are ſtill in England ſome Footſteps of the Name of Woden in Thoſe of ſeveral Places, as Wanſdike, Wansborough, &c. which are Contractions of Wodens-dike and Wodens-borough. Fræa the Wife of Woden was the Venus of the Saxons. She was worſhipped in the Shape of an Hermaphrodite, as being Goddeſs of both Sexes. Ermenſwol, the ſame as Mercury, was another of their Gods, with others common to them with all the northern Nations. This is the beſt and cleareſt Account I could meet with of the Saxons, whom the Britons, by Vortigern's Advice, called in to their Aſſiſtance.

THE STATE of the BRITISH-CHURCH, FROM The Converſion of the BRITONS, to the Calling in of the SAXONS.

State of the Church. AFTER Chriſtianity was eſtabliſhed in the World, the Civil and Eccleſiaſtical Affairs of Kingdoms were ſo interwoven, that there was no knowing the one, without being acquainted with the other. It is neceſſary therefore to add to our Hiſtory, a general Knowledge of the Progreſs of the Chriſtian Religion in Great-Britain. I intend to do this from time to time, by ſhort Abſtracts, ſhewing the Situation of the Affairs of the Church in every Century, and withal their Relation to thoſe of the State. But as I ſhall not have occaſion to ſpeak of the Engliſh Church before the Converſion of the Anglo-Saxons, it will not be improper to repreſent firſt the State of the Britiſh Church under the Romans.

The State of the Britiſh Church. Gildas, n. 2. Before the Birth of our Saviour, the Britons, like the reſt of the World, the Jews only excepted, were groſs Idolaters. They not only worſhipped falſe Gods, but, if their own Hiſtorians are to be credited, had as many and as extravagant ones as the Ægyptians themſelves. Andate the Goddeſs of Victory, was one of their principal

(1) This Country (Camden obſerves) reaching into the more inland Parts of Germany, at ſo great a Diſtance from the Sea, we muſt ſeek ſome other Place where to ſeat our Angles; and Bede has directed us to look for them between the Saxons and Jutes. "The Angles (ſays he) come out of that Country, "which is called Angulus, and is ſaid from that time to lie waſte, between the Countries of the Jutes and Saxons." Seeing between Jutland and Holſatia (the ancient Seat of the Saxons) there is a ſmall Province in the Kingdom of Denmark under the City of Flemſburg called at this Day Angel, which Lindebergius in his Epiſtles terms Little-England. I am pretty well aſſured, ſays Camden, that I have found the ancient Seat of our Forefathers; and that from this very Place the Angles came into our Iſland. "Old Anglia (ſays Ethelwerd an ancient Author) is ſituated between the Saxons and Giots, the Capital "Town whereof is called in Saxon, Sleſtwick, but by the Danes, Haithby." In the very ſame place, Ptolemy ſeems to ſeat the Saxons. So that the middle-age Poet is probably in the right.

——Saxonia protulit Anglos;	Their Riſe to Saxony the Angles owe
Hoc patet in linguâ, niveoque colore——	Their Language, this; and native Whiteneſs ſhow.

(2) So it is in the old Edition of Bede; but in Mr. *Wheloc*k's, inſtead of Vitis there is Jutis.

(3) This Etymology gave occaſion to theſe Verſes in Engelbuſius:

Quippe brevis gladius apud illos Saxa vocatur,	The Saxon People did, as moſt believe,
Unde ſibi Saxo nomen traxiſſe putatur.	Their Names from Saxa, a ſhort Sword, receive.

Camden approves of the Conjecture of thoſe learned Germans, who imagine that the Saxons are deſcended from the Sacæ, the moſt conſiderable People in Aſia, that they are ſo called, as if one ſhould ſay, Sacaſones, that is, Sons of the Sacæ; and that out of Scythia or Sarmatia Aſiatica, they came by little and little into Europe along with the Getes, the Suevi and the Daci, this in my Judgment (ſays Camden) deſerves credit the beſt of any other. But his Annotator obſerves, This Original of the Saxons from the Sacæ of Aſia may be thought too far fetched, unleſs there were ſome fair hiſtorical Account, how the Saxons came to be propagated by thoſe Sacæ, and no ſuch Account being given, it may ſeem to be little more than a poſſibility. Nor may that other Original from the ſhort Swords called Sachs, ſeem altogether vain, when it is conſidered, that the Quirities had their Name from Quiris, a ſhort Spear; and the Scythian from Scytton, to ſhoot with a Bow. Tacitus alſo ſpeaking of ſome of the Northern Germans, ſays, "That the common Badges they wear, are round "Shields and ſhort Swords;" and the Arms of Saxony to this Day, as Pontanus obſerves, are two ſhort Swords a-croſs. See Camd. Vol. I. p. CLVI.

Deities.

Deities (1). They had alſo Gods, to whom they attributed the ſame Powers the Greeks and Romans did to their Apollo and Diana. But ſeeing the Druids, who had the ſole Management of Religious Affairs, never committed any of their Myſteries to Writing, it is no wonder we know nothing more concerning their Worſhip and Ceremonies, than what has already been taken notice of in the Introduction.

The Converſion of the Britons. Uſher. Brit. Eccl. Antiq. Stillingfleet. Orig. Brit.

Though it be difficult to know the preciſe time, yet all agree the Goſpel was preached in Great-Britain ſoon after our Saviour's Death. But thoſe who place this Event in the Reign of Tiberius, don't conſider the firſt Gentile, Cornelius, was not converted 'till the year of our Lord 40, that is, three Years after the Death of that Emperor. Baronius, upon the queſtionable Authority of Simeon Metaphraſtes (2), which he himſelf juſtly rejects on ſeveral other Occaſions, ſays, St. Peter firſt preached to the Britons. This Opinion is the more improbable, beauſe it is certain St. Peter performed the Office of an Apoſtle chiefly in the Eaſtern Countries. Others affirm, that Simon Zelotes, one of the twelve Apoſtles, undertook the Converſion of the Britons. Nicephorus Calliſtus (3), Dorotheus, in his Synopſis, and the Greek Kalendar (4) ſay, this Apoſtle was crucified and buried in Britain. At the ſame time we find in the Roman Martyrology, and in thoſe of Bede, Adon, and Uſuard, that St. Simon ſuffered Martyrdom in Perſia.

Whether the Britons were converted by Joſeph of Arimathea. Malm. de Antiqui. Glaſton. Eccleſ.

The moſt current Opinion for ſome time was, that Joſeph of Arimathea firſt preached to the Britons. Tho' this Tradition, ſupported by the ſole Teſtimony of William of Malmsbury, a Writer of the XIIth Century, ſtands upon no better Foundation than thoſe above-mentioned, it has however been deemed inconteſtable. Malmsbury, in proof of the Antiquity of the Church of Glaſton or Glaſſenbury, ſays, after Freculphus, that upon the Martyrdom of St. Stephen, the Apoſtles were diſperſed throughout the whole World. St. Philip (continues the Hiſtorian) at his coming among the Francs, ſent twelve of his Diſciples, with Joſeph of Arimathea as their Head, to propagate the Goſpel in Great-Britain, where they arrived in the Year of our Lord 61. After ſome Oppoſition, from the Inhabitants, a certain King gave them a little Spot of Ground, ſurrounded with Fens and Buſhes to dwell in. Not long after, two other neighbouring Kings having allowed them twelve Hides of Land for their Subſiſtence, the Angel Gabriel commanded them from God, to build a Church in a Place now called Glaſton, but at that time Inſwitrin (5). This Church was finiſhed in the Year 63, and as the Hiſtorian adds, was dedicated by our Saviour himſelf, as a Mark of Diſtinction, to the Virgin Mary. In proof of this Relation in the firſt Place, is produced a Manuſcript Chronicle in the Abbey of Glaſſenbury, in which it appears that the King's Name, who made the firſt Preſent to Joſeph, was Arviragus. To this may be anſwered, that indeed Juvenal mentions a Britiſh King by that Name in the Reign of Domitian. But this is nothing to the purpoſe, unleſs it can be proved that Arviragus lived in the time of Nero, ſince it is ſuppoſed the Land the Church ſtood upon was given to Joſeph in the Year 61. In the next place is alledged St. Patrick's Charter, wherein it is ſaid, that Glaſton Church was founded by twelve Diſciples of St. James and St. Philip the Apoſtles. But beſides ſeveral Marks of Forgery, there is no mention in this Charter of Joſeph of Arimathea. In the third place is produced a Charter of Ina King of the Weſt-Saxons, who lived in the VIIIth Century, which makes the Church of Glaſton the moſt antient of all the Britiſh Churches. But neither in this Charter, whoſe authenticknes is ſtill more queſtionable, is there any mention of Joſeph. To ſtrengthen all theſe Proofs, a Charter of Henry II, King of England is produced, wherein King Henry aſſures us, that upon Examination he found it well atteſted, that the Church of Glaſſenbury was founded by the Diſciples of the Apoſtles, and conſecrated to the Virgin Mary by Jeſus Chriſt himſelf. But this Aſſertion of King Henry, being grounded unly upon the foregoing Proofs, is not to be regarded. Moreover it is certain, that the Francs were unknown, at the time St. Philip is ſaid to come into their Country. Beſides, Euſebius and ſeveral others affirm, that this Apoſtle went and preached in Phrygia, and ſuffered Martyrdom at Hierapolis. Then for the Hydelands given to the Diſciples of the Apoſtles, the Word Hyde alone is a ſufficient Refutation of that Story, ſince it is a Saxon Term; and every one knows the Saxons came not to Britain 'till the Year 449. I think it needleſs to dwell any longer upon this Subject. Whoever has a Mind to ſee the Reaſons more at large againſt this Tradition of Joſeph of Arimathea, will find them in Collier's Eccleſiaſtical Hiſtory.

The Britons were converted ſoon after the Death of Chriſt. Stillingfleet. Grig. Brit.

Though the exact time of the Converſion of the Britons be uncertain, it is very probable the Goſpel was preached in the Iſland not long after the Death of Chriſt. Theodoret aſſures us, the Britons were converted by the Apoſtles. Euſebius ſpeaking of the Dangers the Apoſtles were expoſed to in propagating the Goſpel in the moſt remote Countries, mentions among the reſt, the Britiſh Iſles. Now the likelieſt time to be aſſigned for the Converſion of the Britons, if it was in the Apoſtles Days, is that between the Victory of Claudius and the Defeat of Boadicea. For at the time of the General Revolt, there were in the Iſland above 80,000 Romans, among whom very probably were ſome Chriſtians; the Goſpel having now got footing in many places, particularly at Rome. Upon this Suppoſition, there is no Abſurdity in aſſerting with ſeveral modern Authors, that St. Paul firſt preached the Goſpel in Britain. It is certain this Apoſtle, in the eight Years between his firſt Impriſonment at Rome, and his Return to Jeruſalem, propagated the Chriſtian Religion in ſeveral Places, eſpecially in the Weſtern Countries. He informs us of his Deſign of going to Spain; and it is not unlikely but his Deſire of converting the Britons might carry him into their Iſland. This Opinion may be ſupported by the Teſtimony of Venutius Fortunatus in his Poem upon the Life of St. Martin, where he ſpeaks of the Travels of St. Paul (6). But after all, theſe are only Conjectures, and of no other uſe but to make it more credible that the Goſpel was planted in Britain ſoon after the Death of our Lord.

The Converſion of King Lucius, Bede, l. 1. c. 4.

But ſuppoſing this Opinion were proved beyond all Diſpute, it may be preſumed the Chriſtian Faith had taken no deep Root in the Iſland; ſince, according to ſeveral Authors, Lucius a Britiſh King, ſent Ambaſſadors to Pope Eleutherius to deſire him to ſend over ſome Miſſionaries to inſtruct him in the Chriſtian Religion. Now is it likely that Lucius ſhould ſend ſo far for what he might have had in his own Country, had there been at that time any Churches, or even any conſiderable number of Chriſtians in Britain? However this be, Lucius having ſome Knowledge of the Chriſtian Religion, and deſiring to be more fully inſtructed, ſends Elwan and Medwin to Eleutherius the twelfth Biſhop of Rome, to crave the wanted Aſſiſtance. Eleutherius very joyfully embraces the Opportunity of replanting Chriſtianity in Great-Britain, where probably it had been rooted out by the Violence of Perſecutions. He immediately ſets about inſtructing Elwan and Medwin the two Ambaſſadors; and after baptizing and conſecrating them Biſhops, ſends them back to their own Country. By their Means the Goſpel flouriſhed again in Britain, where it afterwards ſpread far and wide. I omit the many things that are ſaid of this Lucius, particularly his building great Numbers of Churches in London, becauſe it is not likely the Romans would ſuffer it. Neither ſhall I ſay any thing of his Travels, wherein he is ſaid to convert ſeveral Nations, eſpecially the Griſons, in whoſe Country he was martyred, there being no Grounds for theſe Things. It is poſſible however, ſome Chriſtian named Lucius might preach the Goſpel to the Griſons, and ſuffer Martyrdom at Coire.

From the Converſion of Lucius to the Dioclefian Perſecution, the Eccleſiaſtical Hiſtory of Britain is intirely unknown. It is very probable however, that during that Interval of eight Years, the Chriſtian Religion made great Progreſs in the Iſland, as appears from Tertullian, Origen, Bede, and Gildas. But what puts the thing out of all diſpute, is, the Multitude of Britiſh Martyrs that ſuffered during the dreadful Perſecution under Dioclefian and Maximinian his Collegue. Among theſe Martyrs St. Alban converted at Verulam (7) by a Prieſt, whom he had harboured in his Houſe, is reckoned the firſt. He was followed by a great many more, as Hiſtory informs us. How well inclined ſoever Conſtantius Chlorus might be to favour the Chriſtians, he could not, whilſt Governor of Britain, diſpenſe with Edicts of the Emperors, having then the Title of Cæſar only, which gave him no Power to oppoſe their Laws. But as ſoon as he came to the Empire, he put a ſtop to this violent Perſecution, and gave the Chriſtians ſome reſpite. Conſtantine his Son did yet more, for under him the Chriſtian Religion flouriſhed throughout the Roman Empire, particularly in Great-Britain, where ſome pretend he was born.

After

Progreſs of the Chriſtian Religion in Britain. Spelman. Conc. Vol. I.

After this happy Change the Chriſtians multiplied exceedingly, and the Iſland abounded with Churches. Some affirm there were Britiſh Biſhops at the Council of Nice in 325. But though this cannot be ſufficiently proved, it is not at all unlikely, ſince twenty two Years after there were for certain three Britiſh Biſhops at the Council of Arles (1); as there were alſo ſome at the Council of Ariminum in 359, but ſo poor that their Charges were born by their Brethren (2). Their ſigning at this Council the Confeſſion of Faith, wherein the Term Conſubſtantial was omitted, gave Occaſion to ſome to imagine that Arianiſm was ſpread in Britain. But a modern Author has made it appear that the Faith of the Britiſh Church was the ſame in this Reſpect both before and after this Council, which had not the Effect the Hereticks promiſed themſelves.

The Britiſh falſly charged with. Arianiſm. Stillingfleet.

The Britiſh Church was much more juſtly accuſed of Pelagianiſm. Certain it is, ſeveral Biſhops were ſeduced, not by Pelagius himſelf, who, though a Native of Britain, never returned to propagate his Errors, but by Agricola one of his Diſciples. The Orthodox Biſhops perceiving the Infection to ſpread, ſent to deſire their Brethren in Gaul to aſſiſt them in confuting this Hereſy. The Gauliſh Prelates touch'd with the Danger of the Britiſh Church, met in Council, and deputed Germanus Biſhop of Auxerre, and Lupus Biſhop of Troye to go and aſſiſt their Brethren in Britain. At Verulam, in a Conference with the Pelagians, they defended the Truth with ſuch Strength and Evidence, that they turned many from their Errors. But after their Departure, the Hereticks gaining Ground again, Germanus was deſired once more to come over. Though he was now very old, he undertook a ſecond Voyage into Britain, in Company with Severus Biſhop of Troye. Germanus deſpairing to convince the Hereticks by Arguments, becauſe of their Obſtinacy, cauſed the Edict of Valentinian III, that condemns all Hereticks to Baniſhment, to be put in Execution againſt them. Before he left Britain, he erected Schools, which produced afterwards many Biſhops famous for their Learning and Piety.

Id. c. 21.

From this time to the Arrival of the Saxons we know but little of the Affairs of the Britiſh Church. No doubt the frequent Wars with the Picts and Scots, by deſtroying their Churches, and what is worſe, by introducing a Corruption of Manners among the Clergy as well as Laity, were very prejudicial to the Chriſtians. However, if we may believe Gildas and Bede, it was not ſo much the Wars as the exceſſive Plenty immediately after the Famine, that corrupted the Manners of the Britons. The People, ſay theſe Hiſtorians, from a State of extreme Want, being on a ſudden ſurrounded with Plenty, abandoned themſelves to all manner of Wickedneſs. The quiet they enjoyed by their Peace with the northern Nations, was ſpent only in ſinking deeper into Exceſs and Debauchery. The Clergy outdoing even the Laity, became exceeding vicious. Gluttony, Drunkenneſs, Avarice, Luxury, reigning among the Eccleſiaſticks, they no longer preached to their Flocks the Precepts of the Goſpel, which they themſelves ſo little regarded. To this general Corruption, according to theſe two Hiſtorians, are to be aſcribed the Calamities which fell upon the Britiſh Nation, and which are the Subject of the following Book.

Gildas, n. 19. Bede, l. 1. c. 14.

(1) The Council of Arles was in 314, about twelve Years before the Council of Nice. The three Biſhops are ſuppoſed to be Thoſe of London, York, and probably Caerleon. They had with them a Prieſt and a Deacon.

(2) Du Pin ſays, the Biſhops of France and Britain choſe rather to bear their own Expences than accept of the Emperor's Allowance, which they thought was beneath them. But it is more likely they accepted of the Emperor's Allowance, ſince they were but poorly endow'd under the Roman Emperors. And this perhaps may be the Reaſon why we find ſo few of them at any of thoſe Councils that were held beyond the Seas.

THE HISTORY of ENGLAND.

BOOK II.

From the Arrival of the SAXONS to the Retreat of the BRITONS into Wales. Containing about the Space of a Hundred and Thirty Years.

The Britons unadviſedly call in the Saxons to their Aid.

IN a deſperate Diſeaſe, a deſperate Remedy is us'd without ſcruple, becauſe the Benefit only is conſider'd that may be receiv'd by it. The Britons, tho' frequent Sufferers by the Incurſions of the Saxons, fix'd their Thoughts ſolely on the Valour of that Nation, believing them alone capable of freeing them from their preſent Calamities. Had there been a Choice to make, perhaps they would have weighed the Inconveniences as well as Conveniences of calling in the Saxons to their Aid. But as they had no other Courſe to take, they never attended to what a juſt Fear might have ſuggeſted to them. Beſides, Vortigern ſtrove to divert them from the Conſiderations that might have induc'd them to alter their Reſolution, by carefully diſplaying the Advantages that would be procur'd by the Aſſiſtance of the Saxons. By feeding their Hopes with his flattering Speeches, he prevented them from maturely reflecting on the Conſequences of their Proceedings. Every Man therefore being wholly intent upon freeing himſelf from the preſent Evils, the Ambaſſadors were ſent away in all haſte, and the Negotiation ſtrongly recommended to their Care, on the Succeſs whereof entirely depended, as they imagin'd, the Safety of their Country. The Dominion of the Saxons reach'd then to the German Ocean, and their Conqueſts had been carried even into Zealand. Upon the Arrival of the Britiſh Ambaſſadors, Witigiſil, General of the Saxons, having called an Aſſembly to hear what they had to propoſe, the Head of the Ambaſſy made the following Speech:

The Ambaſſadors are ſent away.

Their Speech to the Saxons.

" Illuſtrious and Generous Saxons, the Britons, harraſs'd " and oppreſs'd by the continual Inroads of the Picts and " Scots, their Neighbours and Enemies, ſent us to you to " implore your Aſſiſtance. The Fame of your Victories " has reach'd our Ears. We are ſenſible your Arms are " irreſiſtible, and therefore are come to ſue for your Pro- " tection. Britain for many Years made a conſiderable " Part of the Roman Empire; but our Maſters having " abandon'd us, we know no Nation more powerful than " your ſelves, or better able to protect us. Grant but " our Requeſt, and in return we offer all that a rich " and fertile Country, ſuch as ours is, can afford. Put " what Price you pleaſe on our Protection: We ſhall " ſubmit to what Terms you yourſelves ſhall judge rea- " ſonable, provided by your Aid we are enabled to drive " the Enemy out of our Country." (1)

The Britons having thus declared the Cauſe of their coming, the Saxon General return'd this ſhort Anſwer; " Be aſſured the Saxons will ſtand by you in your preſſing " Neceſſities." So favorable an Anſwer inſpiring the Ambaſſadors with hopes of Succeſs in their Negotiation, they us'd their utmoſt Endeavours to bring it to a ſpeedy Concluſion. At laſt they had the Satisfaction to obtain an Aid of nine thouſand Men, on certain Terms, the principal whereof was, That the Saxons ſhould be put in Poſſeſſion of the Iſle of Thanet, adjacent to Kent, where they were to land, and their Troops paid and maintain'd by the Britons.

The Saxons form the Project of ſettling in Britain. Geoff. Mon. Malm.

Britain was not unknown to the Saxons. They had long before begun to render themſelves formidable to the Eaſtern Coaſts of the Iſland, where they had even made ſeveral Deſcents. If they had not yet attempted any Conqueſts there, it was becauſe Thoſe they had undertaken on the Continent were thought to be of more Importance. It may be too, as they were hitherto ignorant of the Weakneſs of the Britons, they were afraid of ingaging in any great Enterprize. However this be, the preſent Ambaſſy, at ſuch a Juncture, was extremely proper to raiſe a Deſire to ſettle in their Country. The Britons were themſelves the Diſcoverers of their Weakneſs. On the other Hand, the Saxons were now ſeated along the Coaſts of the German Ocean, from whence they might always have an Eye to what paſs'd in Britain. It is no wonder therefore, if without much Deliberation, they promis'd their Aſſiſtance to the Britons, ſince they intended to improve ſo fair an Opportunity of ſettling in the Iſland. Hengiſt and Horſa (2), both Sons of Witigiſil, were appointed to command the Troops deſigned for the Aid of the Britons.

Hengiſt and Horſa command the Saxon Troops.

(1) Witechind, a Saxon Hiſtorian, puts theſe Words in the Mouth of the Britiſh Ambaſſadors, and it can't be denied that they are very natural, conſidering the deplorable Condition of the Britons. Rapin. Witechind liv'd in the IXth Century. The abſolute Subjection in this Speech is thought to be more than the Britons promis'd, it not being mention'd by Bede or Ethelwerd, both Saxons. Their quarrelling with the Britons afterwards about their Pay, as Gildas expreſly ſays, ſhews they came over as Mercenary Soldiers. See Note below from Geoffrey of Monmouth, p. 19.

(2) Hengiſt ſignifies a Stone-Horſe, and Horſa a Horſe. It was uſual with the Saxons to give their Children the Names of Animals. Rapin. Hence among us at this Day, the Names Lamb, Bear, Fox, Buck, &c. The Romans had the ſame Cuſtom, witneſs Catulus, Aper, &c.

Hengiſt's Character. Verſteg.

Hengiſt was about thirty Years old. He firſt bore Arms under his Father Witigiſil; after which, for his Improvement in the Art of War, he went and ſerved in the Roman Armies, where the Emperors generally kept ſome Saxon Troops in their Pay. This young Warrior was endowed with all the neceſſary Qualifications for accompliſhing the Undertaking committed to his Management. His Valour and Experience, the Solidity of his Judgment, his Addreſs, his eaſy and engaging Behaviour, warranted in ſome Meaſure his Succeſs. All theſe excellent Qualities determined the Saxon General to procure for his Son ſo fair an occaſion to diſplay his Talents. As for his Brother Horſa, nothing particular is ſaid of him.

The Saxons, notwithſtanding their Promiſe, did not think proper to ſend over at once ſo conſiderable a Body of Forces as nine thouſand men, into a Country but imperfectly known to them. Wherefore, pretending the reſt were not ready by reaſon of their great Diſtance from the Place of Imbarkation, they cauſed only a Part to be put on board three Veſſels (1) The very Name of theſe Veſſels plainly enough demonſtrates they could hold but a very inconſiderable Number (2). The Hiſtorians have not expreſly marked the Place of this firſt Imbarkation. It may very probably be conjectured to have been in Zealand, as that Country was then in the Poſſeſſion of the Saxons. Beſides it would have been difficult to chuſe a more convenient Place, or one nearer the Iſle of Thanet, where theſe Forces were to land.

Eyndius. Chron. Zel.

Vortigern, having his own, much more than the Nation's Intereſt at Heart, was highly delighted with the Succeſs of his Ambaſſy. He was not ignorant how his Subjects ſtood affected towards him. And this no leſs than the Deſire of repulſing the common Enemy had moved him to ſue for the Aſſiſtance of the Saxons, flattering himſelf that he ſhould eaſily engage theſe Foreigners to grant him a particular Protection. With this View and Expectation he goes to the Sea-ſide, and waits their coming, to prepoſſeſs them in his Favour, by his Civility and Reſpect.

449. The Saxons arrive in Britain. Sax. Ann. Huntingd. p. 309.

Mean while Hengiſt and Horſa ſetting ſail, arrive at Ebbesfleet in the Iſle of Thanet. Theſe firſt Saxon Troops are ſaid by moſt Hiſtorians to land in the Year 449, though by ſome this Event is placed a few Years ſooner or later. Vortigern receives his new Friends with extraordinary Careſſes, putting them immediately in poſſeſſion of the Iſle according to Agreement. When they had refreſhed themſelves a little, he led them againſt the Picts and Scots that were advanced as far as Stamford in Lincolnſhire. In the firſt Battle, the Iſlanders, according to Cuſtom, began with throwing their Darts, which made but little Impreſſion on warlike Troops that deſpiſed that way of fighting. The Saxons having ſtood this firſt Charge without the leaſt Motion, advanced in good Order, and coming to cloſe fight, quickly routed Enemies already terrified by their very Looks. The northern Men frighted at the Sight of theſe Foreigners, and forc'd to engage in a different Manner from what they were uſed to, made but a faint Reſiſtance, and ſoon left their new Enemies in poſſeſſion of the Field of Battle. Their future Attempts had no better Succeſs, and in all their Encounters with the Saxons, they were continually worſted. Being quite diſcouraged by theſe frequent Defeats, they abandon their Conqueſts by degrees, and retire into their own Country, dreading nothing ſo much as engaging with the Saxons.

Vortigern gives Hengiſt ſome Lands near Lincoln. Nenn. C. Monm. l. 3. c. 2. Langh. Chron. Reg.

Vortigern was overjoyed to ſee his Projects ſucceed thus far ſo happily. But his main Point, the winning the Saxons to his particular Intereſt, was yet unexecuted. To that end, he preſents the two Saxon Brothers with ſome Lands in Lincolnſhire, where they gave the Enemies the firſt repulſe (3). But if Vortigern was purſuing his Ends, Hengiſt was no leſs mindful of his own Intereſt. The Moment he perceives the Weakneſs of the Britons, he entertains Hopes of procuring a Settlement in Britain, and begins to lay his Meaſures accordingly. But he muſt proceed by degrees, and find means to execute his Deſign, without diſcovering his Intentions. The Lands given him by Vortigern, furniſh him with an Opportunity to cauſe the Britons to fall into the Snare he intends to lay for them. He repreſents to the King, that the Service he was doing the Britons in the North, keeping him at a Diſtance from the Iſle of Thanet, he had no place to ſecure the Booty taken from the Enemies, and therefore had reaſon to fear that whilſt he was employed in the northern Wars, he might be deprived of the Fruits of his Labours. For this Cauſe, he deſires leave to build a little Fort ſomewhere on the Lands lately given him. Vortigern, who ſought all Occaſions to pleaſe him, readily complies with his Requeſt. If moſt of the Hiſtorians may be credited, he only deſired to wall in as much Land as an Ox-hide could ſurround, which being granted, he cut the Hide into ſmall Thongs, and encloſing with them a Space large enough for his purpoſe, haſtily ran up a Fort, before the Britons had time to oppoſe it. This Circumſtance ſeems to be confirmed by the Name of the Fort itſelf, Thong-caſter (4), that is, the Caſtle of Thongs (5). It may indeed be objected, that the Name of this Caſtle gave occaſion to apply it to the Story Juſtin relates of Dido when going to build Carthage. But on the other hand, Hengiſt whilſt he ſerved in the Roman Armies, might, very poſſibly, be informed of this Artifice of Dido's, and practiſe it in Britain.

Hengiſt builds Thong-caſter.

The Britons complain of Vortigern.

The Britons ſeeing a Caſtle built in the Heart of their Country, begin to murmur againſt their King, and ſuſpect him of ſecretly favouring the Saxons. Theſe Murmurs gave Hengiſt Opportunity, who had now div'd into Vortigern's private Intentions, to make an Advantage of that Prince's Circumſtances. He repreſents to him, Hengiſt offers him Aſſiſtance. Nenn. c. 37.

" That the Britons are grown ſo inſolent ſince their Deli-
" verance from their Enemies, that they only wait an Op" portunity to rob him of his Crown, and give it to ano" ther. That this Intimation, coming from good Hands,
" ought to make him ſenſible that the Rebellion of his " Subjects is no leſs to be feared, than the Invaſion of the
" Picts and Scots; and therefore adviſes him to ſecure
" himſelf from the approaching Storm, by ſending for more
" Saxons, and ſtrengthning himſelf with their Aid againſt
" the ill Practices of his Subjects. The reſt of the Saxons,
" (continues he) deſign'd for the Aſſiſtance of Britain, are
" all ready, and only wait your Orders." Vortigern glad ly embraces this Advice, which ſuits ſo well with his Projects. Inſtead of raiſing Objections, he himſelf preſſes the Saxon General to execute a Deſign which to him ſeems ſo advantagious. Hengiſt having thus obtain'd Vortigern's Conſent, deſires his Father Witigiſil to ſend over the reſt of the Forces out of Hand. He acquaints him with the Fruitfulneſs of the Country, and Effeminacy of the Inhabitants, aſſuring him, if the Saxons wiſely improved this Opportunity, they might hope for a Settlement in Britain, no leſs advantagious and glorious than what they enjoy'd in Germany. Witigiſil, who had great Expectations from his Son's Expedition, ſends the deſired Supplies without Delay. He equips ſixteen large Veſſels to tranſport the Forces, and with them ſends Eſcus and Rowena, eldeſt Son and Niece (6) of Hengiſt. This ſecond Body of Saxons arriv'd in Britain in 450, about a Year after the firſt.

As ſoon as the Britiſh Monarch and the Saxon General ſaw themſelves thus ſtrengthen'd, they behav'd in a very different Manner to the Britons from what they had done before. Vortigern grown more powerful, renders himſelf more abſolute. He treats his Subjects with great Haughtineſs, and thereby more ſtrongly confirms their Suſpicions of him. He even makes no ſcruple to aſſign Habitations for the New-comers, without ever adviſing with his Subjects. From that time a ſtrict Union is form'd between Vortigern and Hengiſt. They had need of each other for their mutual Defence againſt the Britons, who publickly expreſs'd their Diſcontent.

Mean while, Hengiſt forgot nothing that could promote his Deſigns. Above all, he ſtudies to know the Humour and Character of Vortigern, and eaſily perceives Love and Pleaſure to be his predominant Paſſion. Accordingly he lays a Snare, which he thinks, the Monarch can hardly eſcape falling into. Having expreſs'd on ſeveral Occaſions, his Acknowledgments for the many Favours receiv'd at his Hands, he intreats him to honour him with his Company at Thong-caſter, where he earneſtly deſires to entertain him, and ſhew him ſome Marks of his Reſpect and Gratitude. Vortigern readily accepts of this Invitation, conſidering it as a freſh Means to ſtrengthen the Friendſhip contracted with the Heads of the Saxons, and which is ſo expedient for him. Hengiſt receives him with all the Reſpect due to a great King, his Friend and Benefactor. A ſplendid and exquiſite Entertainment is prepared for him, but nothing pleaſes the Royal Gueſt ſo much as the young Rowena, the greateſt Beauty of her time. Hengiſt her Uncle, under colour of doing Honor to Vortigern, but in reality that he might, during the Feaſt, feed his Eyes with ſo lovely an Object, ordered her to place herſelf juſt before the King. and falls in Love with Rowena. The Contrivance ſucceeded as Hengiſt expected. Vortigern keeps his Eyes continually fix'd on Rowena, who by her Looks gives him to underſtand, ſhe is not inſenſible of the Honor he does her. Hengiſt perceiving with Joy the ſudden Effect of Rowena's Charms on the King, is unwilling to give his growing Paſſion time to cool. He makes a Sign to his Niece, who immediately going to the Side-Board, fills a Gold Cup with Wine, and preſents it on her Knees to the King, ſaying in her Language, Liever Kyning, waſs heil, that is, Lord King, your Health. Vortigern agreeably ſurprized, turns to his Interpreter and asks what ſhe ſaid, and how he muſt anſwer her after the Saxon manner. Being informed, he looks very amorouſly on Rowena, and anſwers in Saxon, Drinck Heil, that is Do you your ſelf drink the Health. Whereupon, Rowena juſt putting the Cup to her Lips, preſents it to the King, who taking it, riſes up immediately and gives her a Salute. Rowena receives it in a very reſpectful manner, as ſenſible of the great Honour done her, and making a profound Reverence, withdraws, leaving the Monarch full of Love and Deſire. This may be called a very fatal Moment for Britain, as will be ſeen hereafter. So true it is, the greateſt Events ſpring ſometimes from Things that appear at firſt of very little Conſequence.

Geoff. Mon. l. 6. c. 12.

He demands her in Marriage. From that time Vortigern's Thoughts are wholly employed how to ſecure the Poſſeſſion of Rowena. Tho' he has a Wife, his Paſſion cauſing him to overlook all Obſtacles, he demands her in Marriage. But Hengiſt, willing by Difficulties to inflame the King's Deſires, anſwers, he cannot, contrary to the Cuſtom of the Saxons, give his Niece to a Prince already married, adding, Rowena was not entirely in his diſpoſal; and the Princes of his Nation, and particularly his Father, would not perhaps ever conſent ſhe ſhould be married to a Chriſtian Prince, how honorable ſoever the Alliance might be. But the amorous Vortigern, who burns with exceſſive Deſire to enjoy Rowena, finds Expedients to overcome all theſe Difficulties. He begins with divorcing his Wife, by whom he had ſeveral Children. Then he promiſes Rowena the free Exerciſe of her Religion, and to ſtop the Mouths of the Saxon Princes, whoſe Reproaches Hengiſt ſeems to fear, deviſes an Expedient, (or perhaps it is ſuggeſted to him) by which, as he imagines, he may reconcile Love and Policy. And this was to inveſt Hengiſt and Horſa with the Sovereignty of Kent, and give them leave to people it with Saxons. The Moment he came to this Reſolution, all Obſtacles began to vaniſh, and the politick Saxon, who had ſeem'd backward only to make the better Bargain, thought it time to give his Conſent. He delivers therefore his Niece to the amorous Monarch, and takes Poſſeſſion of Kent, magnifying this Proof of his Reſpect and Gratitude, as if the King were highly obliged to him. Vortigern was ſo blinded by his Paſſion, that he thought himſelf a great Gainer by the Exchange (1). This Agreement was made ſo privately, that Gerongus (2), Prince or Governor of Kent, was diſpoſſeſſed before he could take any Meaſures to oppoſe it. So impatient was Vortigern to conclude this fatal Bargain!

Hengiſt ſtarts Difficulties.

Vortigern finds means to remove them all.

He promiſes Hengiſt the Province of Kent.

Whereupon the Marriage is concluded, and Hengiſt takes Poſſeſſion. Nenn. Geoff. Mon. l. 3. c. 1.

The Britons murmur againſt Vortigern. In vain did the Britons murmur againſt this Marriage, and complain of the King's Bounty. Hengiſt, regardleſs of their Murmurs, ſtrengthened himſelf as much as poſſible in his new Sovereignty, conſidering withal of freſh means to aggrandize himſelf. But before he diſcovered his Intention, he wanted to be out of danger from the Britons, who plainly ſhewed how they ſtood affected towards him. Ever ſince it was known he intended to ſettle in the Iſland they could no longer rely on him, or rather, look'd upon him as a profeſſed Enemy.

Hengiſt forms new Projects. G. Mon. l. 4. Malm.

Whilſt the Britons were venting their fruitleſs Complaints againſt their Monarch and the Saxons, Hengiſt was ſeriouſly thinking of his Concerns. Tho' he had a good Body of Troops under his Command, that was not ſufficient to enable him to execute his vaſt Projects. He thought it properer therefore to conceal them till he was in condition to declare his Intentions. The Situation Vortigern was in, made him hope it was not impoſſible to make that Prince ſubſervient to his Deſigns, whilſt he ſhould imagine he was labouring only for himſelf. To that end, he pretended to be more attach'd than ever to his Perſon and Intereſt, and endeavoured by ſundry means to perſuade him he was entirely devoted to his Service. His Aim was to induce him gradually by theſe Marks of Affection, to be wholly guided by his Counſels. When he thought he had ſufficiently gained his Confidence, he repreſented to him, "That his Subjects were diſpleaſed "with him, and in all appearance waited only for a favorable Opportunity to execute the ill Deſigns they had "form'd: That an Opportunity would infallibly offer "when the Saxon Troops ſhould be employed in the "northern Wars; and then being deſtitute of the Aſſiſt-"ance of his Friends, he would be in danger of being ex-"poſ'd to the Inſults of thoſe that hated him: That he "thought himſelf obliged to acquaint him, his Subjects "held Intelligence with Ambroſius Aurelianus, who was at "the Court of Aldroen King of Armorica, and probably "had conſpired to ſet that Prince on the Throne." There was ſome ground for Hengiſt's thus artfully hinting the Danger Vortigern was in from Ambroſius. That Prince was of Roman Extraction, and according to the general Opinion, Son of one of the Monarchs elected by the Britons after the Departure of the Romans (3). As he was very young when his Father died, his Youth ſcreened him from the Jealouſy of thoſe that aſcended the Throne immediately or ſhortly after. But it was otherwiſe when Vortigern came to the Crown. A ſtrong Party being form'd in favour of Ambroſius, the new Monarch was ſo filled with Suſpicions, that he ſought means to deſtroy the young Prince. The Danger Ambroſius was expoſed to obliging him to quit Britain, he retired to Aldroen his Relation, where he was waiting for a favourable opportunity to come and head his Party. This being the Caſe between Vortigern and Ambroſius, what the Saxon Prince ſaid could not but make deep Impreſſion on his Mind.

Ambroſius, who he was. Stillingfleet. Orig. p. 319. Gild. p. 9.

By theſe continual Marks of a ſeemingly diſintereſted Friendſhip, Hengiſt led the Britiſh Monarch by degrees to ſeek of his own accord, the means he deſign'd to furniſh him with, namely, the ſending for a greater Number of Saxon Troops. His Aim was to put himſelf in condition to have nothing to fear from the Britons, and withal to be independent of the King; which he could not attain to but by the means he intended. Vortigern, deſpairing ever to regain the Affection of his Subjects, and conſidering Ambroſius, though abſent, as a very dangerous Rival, ſaw his whole Refuge lay in the Saxon Prince, whom he deemed his beſt Friend, and accordingly to him it was he applied for Advice and Aſſiſtance. Hengiſt tells him, "All the "Saxons in Britain are at his Devotion, but their Num-"ber is too inconſiderable to protect him." Adding, "The Britons, in all likelihood, will not fail to ſhew "their Diſcontent, whilſt the Saxons are in the North, "and therefore he ſees but one way to ſecure the King "from their Plots, which is, to ſend for more Saxons to "be commanded by truſty Leaders, who will implicitly "follow his Orders." This Advice being agreeable to Vortigern's Intentions, he immediately cloſes with it. Hengiſt promiſes to ſend the new Troops into the North, againſt the Picts and Scots, whilſt he ſtays himſelf in Kent to have an Eye upon the Male-contents. This Precaution ſeem'd very proper to prevent the Inſurrection of the Britons, who by that means would be hemm'd in by the Saxon Forces.

Brit. Hiſt. l. 3. c. 1.

Hengiſt having obtained the King's Conſent, ſent for a Fleet of forty Ships, conducted by Octa his Brother, who brought with him his Son Ebuſa, and a great Number of Saxon Troops. Theſe New-Comers begin with raviſhing the Orcades, then making a Deſcent on the Coaſts of the Picts, oblige the Inhabitants to retire Northwards. As ſoon as the Picts had thus deſerted part of their Country, the Saxons ſeated themſelves there ſo ſtrongly, that it was not poſſible to diſpoſſeſs them. At firſt they ſettled on the North-ſide of the Tine towards the Eaſt. Afterwards they advanced towards the South, and drove the Britons beyond the Humber; but this was done by degrees. This third Body of Saxons arriv'd in 452, three Years after the Firſt. With theſe freſh Supplies, Hengiſt found himſelf ſtrong enough to be in no great fear of any Attempt from the Britons: Nay, he began to ſhew leſs Reſpect for Vortigern, and under colour of wanting frequent Recruits to keep up the Number of his Forces, ſent for continual Supplies from Germany without asking his Leave. At length he throws away the Mask, and making bitter Complaints that the Saxons were not duly paid according to Agreement, boldly demands the Arrears, threatening, without prompt and full payment, to do himſelf Juſtice.

The Britons, ſurprized at theſe Menaces, and greatly mortified to ſee Hengiſt in a condition to do as he proudly threatned, began to rouſe themſelves, and think of means to free themſelves from theſe Foreigners. Vortimer, eldeſt Son of Vortigern, had beheld hitherto with extreme Regret, how the Saxons, by his Father's Fault, ſtrengthened themſelves daily, and had very much dreaded the Conſequences thereof. As ſoon as he ſaw the Britons in Emotion, he improv'd the Opportunity, and repreſented to the leading Men that it was time to apply an effectual Remedy to the Evils they lay under. He told them, his Father's Cowardice, or perhaps Treachery, had been the Occaſion of the Saxons becoming ſo powerful; that it was neceſſary therefore to prevent Vortigern from heaping any more Favours on theſe Foreigners, to the Prejudice of the Britiſh Nation, which was in danger of being over-run, if Meaſures were not taken to put a Stop to their growing Power. The Britons, convinc'd by theſe Reaſons, awak'd at laſt out of their Lethargy, and by Vortimer's Inſtigations, the moſt powerful of them having entered into a private Confederacy, of which Vortigern had not the leaſt Notice, ſuddenly compell'd him to make his Son Partner with him in the Government, and to leave the Adminiſtration of Affairs to his Care. The Plot was ſo well laid, that in an Inſtant Vortigern ſaw himſelf without either Fortreſs, or Troops, or Credit, and conſtrain'd to do whatever was deſir'd, he not having time to call the Saxons to his Aid. As he had not miſtruſted his own Son, he had taken no care to guard againſt him. Thus Vortimer was inveſted with the whole royal Authority, leaving his Father only the empty Title of King without any Power (1).

The War againſt the Saxons reſolv'd upon.

The new Monarch found no great Difficulty to perſuade the Britons, that nothing but Force could drive the Saxons out of their Country. It was but too plain, from their Proceedings, that they did not deſign to go away voluntarily. The War therefore being reſolv'd, the Britons made Preparations to rid themſelves of their Gueſts, whom they look'd upon as their mortal Enemies. Hengiſt, for his part, finding he was like to have a fierce War upon his Hands, made haſte and concluded a Peace with the Picts, who were proud of having for Allies Men ſo formidable for their Arms. This Precaution enabled him to make a powerful Diverſion in the North by the Help of the Picts, aſſiſted by the Saxons lately ſettled in thoſe Parts. As for Kent, Hengiſt look'd upon himſelf to be ſtrong enough there to make head againſt Vortimer, who was preparing to attack him.

I am now going to enter upon the Recital of a War, which, after numberleſs Engagements, render'd the Saxons Maſters of Britain. An Event ſo remote from the Expectations of the Britons when they ſent for the Saxons to aſſiſt them, affords Matter of Wonder and Admiration at the Short-ſightedneſs of Men, and the Uncertainty of their Counſels! But before I relate the Iſſue of this War, it will be proper to acquaint the Reader that he is not to expect a full and particular Account of Matters. Hiſtorians have been contented with relating ſome certain Facts, which juſt ſerve to carry on the Thread of the Hiſtory, but hardly give us a general Idea of that Revolution which peopled Britain with new Inhabitants, and introduced a new Face of Things over the whole Iſland.

455. The Battle of Egleſford. Aſſer. Menev. Gab. Athelwendus. Flor. Wigorn. Annal. Sax. Ranulph. Ceſtr. Polychron. G. Malmſb. l. 1. c. 1.

The Britons and Saxons being prepared for War were not long before they came to an Ingagement. In the firſt Campaign, the two Armies met at Egleſford (2) in Kent, the Saxons being commanded by Hengiſt and Horſa, and the Britons by Vortimer. The firſt Battle, according to the Hiſtorians, was very bloody. Hengiſt loſt Horſa, (3) his Brother, and with his own Hand ſlew Catigern (4), youngeſt Brother of Vortimer. If we may believe the Britiſh Hiſtorians, Vortimer not only obtain'd a compleat Victory over the Saxons, but driving Hengiſt as far as the Iſle of Thanet, compell'd him to imbark and fly into Germany. But by what follow'd after this Battle, it is evident, if the Saxons were not victorious, at leaſt they were not vanquiſh'd (5), ſince all their Hiſtorians unanimouſly affirm, that this very Year 455, immediately after the Battle, Hengiſt firſt took upon him the Title of King of Kent, which doubtleſs he would not have done, had he been defeated and obliged to fly into Germany.

Hengiſt takes the Title of King of Kent. Bede. Ann. Sax.

One muſt not be ſurprized to find ſo great Contrariety among the Hiſtorians concerning Events ſo remote from our Time; when even the Authors that write of what has paſs'd in our Days, very rarely agree in Facts, which by their late Date, might eaſily be known.

457. The Battle of Crecanford. Gildas. Bede, l. 1. Hen. Huntingd. l. 2. Sax. Ann.

Two Years after, another Battle was fought near Crecanford (6) in Kent, wherein Vortimer was entirely defeated with the Loſs of more than 4000 Men and his beſt Officers. Not being able to keep the Field, he was forced to ſhut himſelf up in London, till he could draw another Army together. In the mean while Hengiſt, to ſtrike the greater Terror into the Britons, ravaged the Country in a mercileſs manner. They that were moſt expos'd to the Fury of the Saxons, quitted their Houſes, and fled to the Woods for Refuge. Some abandon'd their Country, and retir'd into Armorica, where they were civilly receiv'd by King Aldroen. During theſe Devaſtations, the very Churches were not ſpared, but all that were in the Neighbourhood of the Saxons were reduc'd to Aſhes. Theſe barbarous Pagans, joining to their natural Fierceneſs a Religious Zeal, thought they honoured their Gods, by inhumanly treating the Chriſtians, eſpecially the Eccleſiaſtics, who were moſt cruelly dealt with.

The Britons deſire the Aſſiſtance of the King of Armorica, by the Advice of the Biſhop of London. G. Monm. Mat. Weſt. Hunting.

The Britons being reduc'd to this Extremity, their Chiefs aſſembled themſelves to conſider of Means to prevent their total Ruin. Guithelin, Archbiſhop of London, and Head of Ambroſius's Party, adviſed them to apply to the King of Armorica for Aſſiſtance. He repreſented to them, "That as "Aldroen had always ſhewn great civilities to the Britons, "there was Room to hope he would not abandon them in "this their preſſing Neceſſity." Adding, "that ſince Vorti-"gern and Vortimer were no longer to be depended upon, he "thought it neceſſary to invite over Ambroſius Aurelianus, "who being ſprung from illuſtrious Anceſtors, and having all "the Qualifications to be deſir'd in a General, would, in all "Probability, by his Valour and Conduct, free them from "their preſent Danger." As they had always hated Vortigern, and, ſince his laſt Defeat, were diſſatisfied with Vortimer, the common, though unjuſt Fate of vanquiſh'd Generals, they readily embrac'd the Archbiſhop's Advice, and deſired him to go himſelf and negotiate the Affair; which he gladly undertook, as enabling him to accompliſh a Deſign he had long been forming. He ſets out immediately for Armorica, and laying before Aldroen the deplorable Condition of the Britons, obtain'd with eaſe the Aid he demanded. Aldroen, who had ſo generouſly receiv'd all the fugitive Britons, was willing to give the Nation a farther Proof of his Friendſhip, by granting them an Aid of ten thouſand Men. He plac'd Ambroſius at their Head, who conducted them ſafely to Totneſs. This General was receiv'd with great Demonſtrations of Joy, being look'd upon as the only Support of the ſinking Britons. But this Joy was not univerſal: Vortimer's Party, ſtill powerful, conſider'd Ambroſius as one come to uſurp the Crown, under colour of defending it. And Vortimer himſelf threatned to puniſh ſeverely thoſe that ſhould join him. Thus the miſerable Britons, always a Prey to their inteſtine Diviſions, inſtead of uniting againſt the common Enemy, prepared to deſtroy one another.

Ambroſius and Guithelin conſpire the Ruin of the two Britiſh Kings.

Mean while, Ambroſius and Guithelin perceiving the Conjuncture to be favorable, conſpir'd the Ruin of Vortigern and Vortimer. They began with repreſenting to their Party, "that vain were the Hopes of driving out the Saxons, under "the Conduct of theſe two Kings, the Son being a Prince "without Courage or Experience, and the Father an Ene-"my to the Nation, as appear'd by his ſtrict Union with "the Enemies of the State; not to mention his exceſſive "Liberalities, which obliged his Subjects to take the Ad-"miniſtration out of his Hands. That in vain therefore "were their Preparations to drive out the Foreigners, if "theſe two domeſtick Enemies were not firſt deſtroy'd; "who were in Arms only to favour and aſſiſt them." On the other hand, Vortigern and Vortimer told their Friends, "that Ambroſius, under pretence of aſſiſting, was come to "ſubdue them: That the Archbiſhop was an ambitious "Man, who ſought to put the Crown on the Head of Am-"broſius, only to get the Adminiſtration of the Govern-"ment into his own Hands; than which, ſuch was his Arro-"gance, nothing ſhould more be dreaded by the Britons: "That they muſt wilfully ſhut their Eyes not to ſee, that "the Deſigns of theſe two Heads of their Party, were "directly oppoſite to the Good of the Kingdom: That "inſtead of marching their freſh Troops againſt the Saxons, "they had done nothing ſince their Arrival, but caball'd "with the People, and taken Meaſures to oppreſs thoſe "who were in Arms for the Defence of the Country.

Civil Wars among the Britons.

The mutual Animoſity of the two Parties was ſo violent, that they ſoon came to Blows, each preferring his private to the public Intereſt. The firſt Battle was fought near Catgwaloph (7) in Carmarthenſhire. As it is difficult from the confus'd Accounts of Hiſtorians, to know on which ſide Victory inclin'd in this and ſeveral other Engagements, I ſhall only obſerve that the civil Wars laſted till the Year 465, to the great weakening of the Britons, whilſt the Saxons had time to ſtrengthen themſelves both in Kent and beyond the Humber. To ſo wretched a State were the Britons at laſt reduc'd, that numbers of them, harraſs'd one while by the Civil War, another while by the Saxons, abandon'd their native Country, where they could no longer ſubſiſt.

The Saxons, upon the Union of the two Parties, join'd their Forces alſo. In the firſt Engagement, Hengiſt loſt Wipped, one of his principal Officers, from whom the Field of Battle was called Wipped's-Fleet (2). Here the Britiſh and Saxon Hiſtorians, according to Cuſtom, give us contradictory Accounts. The laſt ſay, their Countrymen obtained that Day a ſignal Victory. Whereas the others affirm, that Vortimer, who commanded the Army, routed the Saxons, and compelled Hengiſt a ſecond time to fly into Germany. But it appears by what followed, that the Advantage was on the Side of the Saxons. I will even venture to ſay, contrary to the Opinion of ſome noted Hiſtorians, that in all likelihood Hengiſt never returned to Germany. Not ſo much as one Author marks either the Time or Place of his ſecond Landing, tho' they were no leſs neceſſary to be obſerv'd than Thoſe of his firſt.

Arthur firſt appears. Langh. Chron. Reg. Ang.

In this War it was, that the famous Arthur, at fourteen Years of Age, made his firſt Appearance in the Britiſh Armies, under Ambroſius. His Inclination for War made him take upon him betimes the Profeſſion of a Soldier, which he never quitted during his Life. He ſucceeded Gorlous his Father in the Kingdom of Danmonium (3) in 467. He was no ſooner on the Throne, but he had a War to maintain againſt Howel King of Areclute (4), in the Neighbourhood of Scotland. This Prince is ſaid, out of Envy to the Glory Arthur had acquired, to enter into an Alliance againſt him with the Saxons in the North. But inſtead of leſſening his Reputation, he ſerved to increaſe it conſiderably. Arthur beating him back to the Iſle of Mona, gave him Battle, and ſlew him with his own Hand. He gain'd this Victory in 470, being then about eighteen Years old. We ſhall ſee him hereafter ſignalizing himſelf by Actions more glorious, as well as more beneficial to his Country.

473. The fourth Battle between the Saxons and Britons. Flor. Wigorn. Vortimer. dies. Sax. Ann.

The War continuing between the two Nations, a Battle loſt by the Britons in 473, put their Affairs in extreme Diſorder, and gave the Saxon Prince Opportunity of enlarging his Territories. At length Vortimer, the principal Promoter of the War, died in 475, poiſon'd, as ſome ſay, by Rowena his Mother-in-law, thro' the Suggeſtion of Hengiſt (5). The Britiſh Hiſtorians would fain make, at any rate, a Hero of Vortimer, by attributing to him many ſignal Victories over the Saxons. But the Growth of theſe laſt in Power and Dominion, notwithſtanding their pretended Defeats, is a clear Evidence, that the Advantages of Vortimer were neither conſiderable, nor even real. His Death brought ſome Quiet to Britain, if a deceitful Calm, that prov'd the Ruin of the Britons, may be ſo call'd.

Treaty of Peace between the Saxons and Britons.

After a twenty Years War, both Sides began to ſhew an Inclination for Peace, which Vortimer had always ſtrenuouſly oppoſed, fearing when the War was over with the Saxons, he ſhould be obliged to begin another with Ambroſius, who had the Hearts of the People, and could hardly bear to ſee Vortigern, and his Son on the Throne, though deprived of half their Dominions. The Peace was concluded, on condition each Party ſhould keep what he poſſeſſed. Hengiſt, who had entertain'd Hopes of conquering all Britain, was not a little concerned to find himſelf ſo much diſappointed. He comforted himſelf however with the Thoughts of doing by Policy, what he could not effect by Force.

Reflections on the Reſiſtance of the Britons.

When we reflect on the Weakneſs and Diſpiritedneſs of the Britons before the arrival of Hengiſt, it muſt be ſurprizing to ſee them able to ſtand againſt the Saxons in the firſt War, which laſted ſo long. Thoſe very Britons, who after the Departure of the Romans, ſcarce dared to look the Picts and Scots in the Face, ſucceſsfully defended themſelves againſt both Saxons and Picts: Nay, they even frequently ventur'd to attack the Saxons in the Height of their Strength, and put them in fear of loſing the Country of Kent, delivered to them by Vortigern. And if they could not wreſt it from them, at leaſt they prevented them from enlarging their Conqueſts. A long War teaches at length the moſt unwarlike Nation the Uſe of Arms, and very often enables them to repair in the End the Loſſes they ſuſtain'd in the Beginning.

Had the Saxons invaded Britain at firſt with a numerous Army, in all Appearance they would have conquered the Whole in a very little Time. But ſending over only a ſmall Number of Supplies, they ſpun the War out to a great Length, and by that Means taught the Britons a Trade, which the Romans had done all they could to make them forget. Of This, there have been many other Inſtances. It may be ſaid perhaps, that whilſt they defended themſelves in the South, they loſt Ground in the North. But it muſt be conſidered, the Country beyond the Humber was loſt to them, before the Coming of Hengiſt, and that the Saxons took it from the Picts and Scots, and not from the Britons. We are ignorant of what Octa and Ebuſa did during this long War. It is to be ſuppoſed they aſſiſted Hengiſt by frequent Diverſions, and even ſent him Supplies by Sea, which they could not do by Land, becauſe of marching through the Enemy's Country.

Hengiſt barbarouſly murders 300 Britons. G. Monm. Nennius Malm. M. Weſtm.

Hengiſt, after all his Hopes of becoming Maſter of Britain, ſaw himſelf with extreme Regret reduc'd to the Kingdom of Kent. He had acquainted the Saxon Princes in Germany, that, provided they ſent him Supplies, he could eaſily procure them a laſting Settlement in the Iſland. And yet after twenty Years War, he found there was but little Appearance of his being as good as his Word. The falling off of Vortigern, and the Valour of Ambroſius, join'd to a Conduct which equalled him to the moſt famous Generals, ſeemed to lay invincible Obſtacles in his Way. However, he was reſolv'd not to give over his Deſign, but endeavour to do that by Fraud which he could not accompliſh by Force. To this end he contrived a Plot, that by its Blackneſs ſullied the Glory of all his former Actions. As ſoon as the Peace was concluded, he pretended to be mighty well pleaſed with it, and behaved in ſuch a manner as ſhowed he had no Deſign of enlarging his Conqueſts. The Britons, charm'd with this ſeeming Moderation, were eaſily comforted for the Loſs of Kent, imagining they knew the worſt, and, perhaps, hoping one Day to meet with a favourable Juncture to recover it again. In the mean Time, not to provoke a Prince whoſe Valour they had ſo often experienced, they lived in an amicable manner with him. In ſhort, their Animoſity againſt the Saxons by degrees entirely vaniſhed. Hengiſt omitted nothing to keep them in a Security, which would lead them into the Snare he was preparing for them. He let them know, his Intention being to live in perfect Union with them, he ſhould be glad from Time to Time to keep up the good Underſtanding between the two Nations by Parties of Pleaſure. Vortigern, a paſſionate Lover of ſuch Diverſions, joyfully accepted his Propoſal, and went ſo far as to pay him the firſt Viſit, accompanied with 300 of his principal Subjects. Hengiſt receiv'd them ſeemingly in a very reſpectful and cordial Manner, which charmed the Britiſh Lords. His Entertainment was ſplendid, and nothing was wanting to divert them. But towards the End of the Feaſt, the Scene was changed. Hengiſt had ordered Matters ſo, that having artfully raiſed ſome ſubject of Diſpute, at a certain Signal given, the Britiſh Lords were all murther'd (6). Vortigern, becauſe Hengiſt had need of him, was only made Priſoner. In vain did he complain of this baſe Treachery; he could not obtain his Liberty without delivering up to the Saxons a great Tract of Land bordering upon Kent, with which Hengiſt enlarged his narrow Territories. This was afterwards divided into three Provinces, called by the Saxons, Suſſex, Eſſex, and Middleſex, which Names they retain to this Day. Moreover, not content with this Acquiſition, Hengiſt ravaged the neighbouring Country in a mercileſs Manner, and became Maſter of London, Lincoln, and Wincheſter.

His Subjects abandon him, and go over to Ambroſius.

The Indignation of the Britons at this barbarous Action was ſo great, that they could not look upon a Saxon without Horror. But this fatal Event was attended with farther Conſequences. Vortigern, as he had given his Subjects, more than once, cauſe to think him a Friend to the Saxons, was reckoned an Accomplice in the Maſſacre, ſince he alone was ſpared. And therefore they all deſerted him, and acknowledged Ambroſius (7) for their Sovereign, except a few Friends, who were of little Service to him in his ſinking Condition.

Could Britain have been saved, it would doubtless have been so by these two great Princes, who had all the Qualities of the most celebrated Heroes in an eminent Degree. But its Fate was determin'd. This noble Country, was destin'd to undergo an extraordinary Revolution, and become a Prey to the Saxons. All that Ambrosius and Arthur could do was to put off its Ruin for a Time.

He landed his Troops at Whitering in Sussex, but not without Opposition. The Inhabitants of the Country rising to prevent his Entrance, he became not Master of the Shore till after a long Battle. At length he drove the Britons as far as the Forest of Andredswald (2), at that Time 65 Miles in Length, and 30 in Breadth. The Retreat of the Britons gave the Saxons Opportunity to settle by degrees along the Coast and towards the Thames. During the nine Years they were employ'd in extending their Conquests in those Parts, they had continual Wars with the Britons, the Particulars whereof are unknown. We are told, that the Saxons settled all along the southern Coast, were call'd Sud or South Saxons, and their Country which is ascrib'd to Hengist himself by a Dutch Poet, as well as by several others, who were of Opinion that he went back into Germany (3).

Nine Years rest from War.

The Britons were not then in a condition to think of recovering the Provinces usurp'd by the Saxons. Harrass'd by almost continual Wars for 60 Years together, it was time to breathe a while. However, they were griev'd to see the Saxons so firmly settled in the Country, and in a Capacity of strengthening themselves, by the Conveniency of sending, whenever they pleas'd, for fresh supplies from Germany. But they were forced to be patient, 'till their almost quite exhausted Forces were repair'd. Accordingly, without any previous Truce or Treaty of Peace, both Sides lay quiet for nine Years. Hengist, no less than the Britons, had need of some Respite, to put the Affairs of his Kingdom in order. During this Interval, Ella gain'd Ground, the Britons not daring to oppose him, for fear of giving Hengist a Pretence to renew the War, which it was their Design to avoid.

The Britons sollicit Ambrosius to take up Arms. G. Monm.

The Britons having had time to recover their Strength, began to sollicit Ambrosius to take up Arms. They represented to him, "That the longer the Saxons were left in "quiet, the stronger they grew: That since the War "ceas'd, Britain abounded with young Soldiers, fit to "fight for their Country; if this opportunity therefore "was let slip, they might perhaps expect another in vain." Ambrosius told them, "he was convinced, as well as "they, of the Necessity to exert their utmost to expel the "Foreigners, but there was no hopes of succeeding as long "as Vortigern was alive; That although he was old, and "in appearance incapable of acting, he had a powerful "Party, that would not fail of raising new Disturbances "as soon as the war broke out: That they had found by "fatal Experience, ever since the Arrival of the Saxons, "he had always favour'd them." In fine, "he put them "in mind, that all their Losses were owing to their Divi-"sions, and as these Divisions still prevail'd, it was to no "purpose to expect any better Success." He concluded with saying, "they had but one of these two Ways to "take, either to let the Saxons remain in quiet till Vor-"tigern's Death, or to rid themselves of that domestick "Enemy, and unite their Forces against the Foreigners."

The Arms of the Britons are turn'd against Vortigern.

Such was the Hatred of the Generality of the Britons against Vortigern, that they resolved immediately upon the latter of the two Methods, and with one Consent, prepared to put their Resolution in practice with all possible Secrecy and Expedition. Vortigern so little expected to be attack'd, that he was like to have fallen into the Hands of Ambrosius. He had but just time to throw himself into a Castle in Wales, where he was not very secure. Ambrosius willing to complete his Work, instantly went and besieged him, being resolved not to let him escape. During the Siege, the Castle, whether by Accident, or the Engines of the Besiegers, taking Fire, was burnt to Ashes, and the unfortunate Vortigern perished in the Flames. This was the End of that Prince, advanced to a great Age, after a troublesome Reign of forty Years. He had, besides a Daughter, three Sons by his first Wife, Vortimer, Catigern slain in a Battle with the Saxons, and Pascentius, of whom I shall speak hereafter. By his Daughter, whom he debauch'd, he had a Son named Faustus, who passed his Life in a Monastery, where he was distinguished for his Piety.

Ambrosius renews the War, and defeats Ella in 487. Sax. Ann. Hunting.

Ambrosius being thus rid of a very formidable, as he ever thought, and hated Rival, renewed the War against the Saxons, which had been interrupted by the Weakness of both Parties, and the Divisions of the Britons. The Particulars of this War, after its renewal, are very imperfectly known: But considering the Valour and Activity of the two Generals, it may be supposed to have been very sharp. Historians relate but one remarkable Event, namely, the signal Victory obtained by Ambrosius, in the Year 487, over Ella and his two eldest Sons. This is properly the first Victory the Britons could indisputably boast of, whatever their Historians say to the contrary. This Defeat obliged the Saxon General to retire to his strong Holds, in expectation of fresh Supplies, sent for from Germany.

Hengist dies 488. Nennius. Flor. Wigorn. W. Malm. H. Huntingd. Ran. Cestrensis.

Hengist lived not to see the End of this War. He died in 488, aged about 69, of which he had passed 39 in Britain, and 33 on the Throne of Kent, (4). He cannot be denied the Glory of being one of the bravest and most prudent Generals of his Time. It were to be wished for the English, that the Founder of their Monarchy had not, as I may say, cemented his Throne with the Blood of so many British Lords, whom he treacherously murdered. An Action that must leave an indeliable Stain on his Memory. Had it not been for this, his Reputation would have been uncommon, since by his Conduct and Valour he happily accomplished a Design, the Execution whereof was extremely difficult. Besides Kent, given him by Vortigern, and considerably enlarged by the Acquisition of Essex and Middlesex, he was in possession of some Lands in Lincolnshire, where he built Thong Castor. The Saxons beyond the Humber acknowledg'd him for their Sovereign. He left two Sons, Escus who succeeded him in the Kingdom of Kent, and Andoacer who staid in Germany.

After the Defeat of Ella, about a Year before the Death of Hengist, Escus had sent him into the North, to assist Octa and Ebusa against the Britons. But as soon as he had Notice of his Father's Death he hasten'd to Kent to take Possession of the Kingdom. In the mean Time Ambrosius improving his Victory, retook London, Winchester and Lincoln, seiz'd by the Saxons, after the Massacre of the British Nobles. Escus, wanting the Qualities of his Father, never endeavour'd to recover these Places, but preferr'd his Ease before the Fatigues of War. In all Probability he obtain'd a Truce, since in the three following Years, there is no mention of any Hostilities on either Side.

made him loſe a great deal of Time. But at length, after a vigorous Defence, the Town was carried by Storm, and entirely deſtroy'd. Immediately after this, Ella aſſumed the Title of King of Suſſex or of the South-Saxons, which he durſt not do whilſt Hengiſt was alive. This Second Saxon Kingdom contain'd the preſent Counties of Suſſex and Surrey. Ella was alſo elected Monarch or General of the Saxons in the room of Hengiſt. For it muſt be obſerv'd, altho' Hengiſt was only King of Kent, yet was he conſider'd alſo as Head of all the Saxons, according to the Cuſtom of that Nation in Germany, where, in time of War, they had always their General in Chief, accountable only to the States. This ſame Cuſtom the Saxons continued in Britain, and always elected a General, whom ſome Writers ſtile Monarch, becauſe, as we ſhall ſee hereafter, he was Head over ſeveral Kings. In all appearance, Hengiſt's Son thought himſelf incapable to diſcharge this High Office, ſince he ſuffer'd Ella to be inveſted with it.

494. About two Years after, Arthur defeated the Northumbrian Saxons again, on the Banks of the River Dugles (1), where he had routed them three Years before.

495. The Year 495 was very remarkable for the Arrival of Cerdic, a Saxon General, not only upon the Account of his Conqueſts, but chiefly becauſe from him the Kings of England are deſcended, in the Male Line, down to Edward the Confeſſor, and in the Female, down to the illuſtrious Prince, who now ſits on the Thone. If we trace him higher, we find, by the Saxon Annals, that he ſprung from Woden, the Root of all the principal Families of the Saxons. He was famous alſo for founding a Kingdom to which all the reſt in the end became ſubject, and conſequently, he is to be look'd upon, if not as the firſt, at leaſt as one of the principal Founders of the Engliſh Monarchy. This warlike Prince having acquired great Reputation in Germany, and finding no farther Employment there, reſolv'd to ſeek his Fortune in Britain, where he knew many Families of his Nation had already eſtabliſh'd themſelves. To that purpoſe he equipp'd five Veſſels, and taking his Son Cenric, advanced to Man's Eſtate, with him, now ſail'd for Britain.

Cerdic arrives in Britain. Flor. Wigorn. Polychron. l. 5. c. 4. G. Malmſb. Huntingd. Sax. Ann.

Ella, as I ſaid, brought with him his three Sons Baldulph, Colgrin, and Ciſſa who was very young; and the two Eldeſt treading in their Father's Steps, bravely aſſiſted him. They are called by ſome Ciſmenius and Plentigus (2). Octa, Commander of the Saxons in the North, having been frequently defeated by Arthur, and perceiving himſelf too weak to guard all his Conqueſts, had divided them into two Parts, of which the Southern was called Deïra, and the Northern, Bernicia. He had committed the Care of the Firſt to Baldulphus and Colgrin, reſerving Bernicia to himſelf to defend it againſt the continual Attacks of the Northern Nations. Colgrin, after the laſt Defeat of the Northumbrians by Arthur, had ſhut himſelf up in York, where Arthur immediately went and beſieged him. Nevertheleſs Baldulphus having been inform'd of Cerdic's Deſign of coming to Britain, was gone into Norfolk to expect his Arrival, and favour his Landing. But Cerdic's Arrival being delay'd by ſome Accident, Baldulphus marched back towards York, with intent to relieve it. He was met upon the Way by Cador, Nephew to Arthur who defeated him, and diſpers'd his Army in ſuch a manner, that he was forced to make his Eſcape all alone, diſguiſed like a Peaſant (3). In that Dreſs he ſafely reach'd the Walls of York, and making himſelf known, was drawn up with a Rope. The News he brought of Cerdic's being about to arrive from Germany with powerful Supplies, inſtilling new Life into the Beſieged, they continued to make a vigorous Defence. Arthur puſh'd the Siege briſkly, in Expectation of taking the Town before the Arrival of the Saxon Prince. All this while Cador was in Norfolk, ready to oppoſe the Landing of the Saxons. But before Arthur had made any conſiderable Progreſs in the Siege, he receiv'd the ill News of Cerdic's landing at Yarmouth (4), and beating the Forces ſent againſt him. Upon which he raiſes the Siege, and retires to a Place of Security, till he could learn the exact Number of the Saxons, which Fame had exceedingly multiplied. Baldulph and Colgrin marching out of York, committed great Devaſtations in Lancaſhire, whilſt the Britons were diſmay'd and terrify'd at the Arrival of Cerdic. So great was their Terror, that Arthur thought fit to keep at a Diſtance from the Saxons for ſome Time, for fear of not being able to inſpire his Troops with Reſolution enough to look theſe formidable Enemies in the Face. But this was not All that followed upon the Arrival of Cerdic.

Paſcentius, Son of Vortigern, having long concealed his ſecret Diſguſt at not having any of his Father's Dominions aſſign'd him, laid hold of this Juncture to obtain what he thought his Due. With the Aſſiſtance of thoſe that, like him, were diſpleaſed with the Advancement of Ambroſius, he drew ſome Forces together, and being joined by Baldulph and Colgrin, was reinforced by many of his Friends in Wales. Ambroſius being grown ſick and old, Arthur took upon him to chaſtiſe the Rebel, and marching againſt him, gave him Battle, and entirely routed him near the little River Dugles (5).

The next Year, Arthur in the ſame Place gained another Victory, and ſo warmly purſued the Britiſh Prince, that he forced him to ſubmit and ſue for Pardon. Paſcentius got more by his Submiſſion, than by his Arms. For beſides his Pardon, it procured him the poſſeſſion of Brecknock and Radnor (6) in Wales, which being erected into a Kingdom, his Poſterity enjoy'd it for many Years. I imagine that his Father Vortigern's private Demeſns lay in thoſe Parts, and that Ambroſius did but give him the Lands belonging to his Family before Vortigern was King. If he inveſted him with Sovereignty, it was only to give him ſome Satisfaction concerning his Pretenſions to the Crown of Britain.

About this Time the Saxons in the North conquered the little Kingdom of Galway (7) from Galvan, Nephew of Arthur. This Country, now part of Scotland, had remained in the Hands of the Britons, and withſtood the continual Attacks, as well of the Saxons as Picts. Galvan having loſt his Dominions, retired to his Uncle Arthur, to whom he was very ſerviceable in his Wars.

Shortly after, Porta lands at Portland (8), ſo call'd from him with freſh Supplies of Saxons from Germany. This at a Time the Saxons began to be ſuperior, obliged Arthur to quit the Field and retire to London. Tho' he had generally the better of the Saxons in all the Encounters, yet his Troops were conſiderably diminiſhed; whereas the Enemy's Forces were continually increaſing by freſh Recruits from Germany. Nay, whole Bodies, under the Conduct of famous Leaders, came over to Britain, in order to procure a Settlement, or for the ſake of Plunder only. Arthur, who had not the ſame Supplies, would have been reduced to Extremity, without the Aſſiſtance of Hoel, King of Armorica, his Nephew. This young Prince, greedy of Glory and glad of an Occaſion to ſignalize himſelf in the Service of his Uncle, put himſelf at the Head of 15000 Men, and landed at Southampton. With this Aid, Arthur went and attacked the Northumbrians, grown formidable by the Valour of Baldulph and Colgrin, their Leaders, and meeting them in Deïra, obtained a compleat Victory over them. The two Saxon Brothers not being in condition to withſtand him after their Defeat, had no other Courſe to take, but with the Remains of their Army to join Cerdic, then beſieging Lincoln. But Arthur, fearing the Loſs of that Place, followed them with Speed, and ſurprized Cerdic in ſo ſudden a manner, that not being able to continue the Siege, or raiſe it, without Danger, he was conſtrained to hazard a Battle (9), which proved fatal to the Saxons. Cerdic being defeated, was forced to betake himſelf to the Foreſt of Celidon, where having ſuffered great Hardſhips, he at length found Means, tho' with great Difficulty, to retire towards the Weſtern Coaſts. Some Hiſtorians aſſure us, that ſeeing he muſt inevitably periſh if he ſtaid in a Place where he could neither have Proviſions, nor hope for Aſſiſtance, obliged himſelf by a Treaty with Arthur to return into Germany with the Remains of his Troops. They add, that being embark'd with Intent to perform his Promiſe, he altered his Mind at Sea, and came and landed at Toſton (10) in the Weſt. However this be, Cerdic certainly remained in the Iſland, and lay quiet for ſome Time, having loſt in the Battle above 6000 Men.

After Cerdic's Defeat, all the Saxons were equally concern'd to oppoſe the Progreſs of Arthur, who, like an able General, wiſely improved his Victories to the utmoſt. The Dread he ſtruck them with, made them reſolve to unite all their Forces, and endeavour to retrieve their Affairs. They were ſenſible that by diſperſing their Forces in ſeveral Parts, they endangered in one Place what they had got in another, which was never the Way to procure a laſting Settlement. Wherefore Eſcus King of Kent, Ella King of Suſſex, Cerdic, Porta, the Northern Saxons aſſembled all their Troops, and conferr'd the Command in Chief on Cerdic. time. Cerdic having divided his Troops into two Bodies, gave the Command of the leaſt to Baldulph and Colgrin, and headed the other himſelf with his Son Cenric. While and Britons. the Saxons were employed in making Preparations, the Britons were exerting their utmoſt to raiſe an Army capable of Nennius. H. Hunt. withſtanding ſo powerful Enemies. In this ſo preſſing an Occaſion, where they had need of all their Forces, thoſe that could bear Arms came in Crouds, and liſted themſelves under Ambroſius heads the Britons. their Generals. So that it was thought on both Sides a deciſive Battle would quickly enſue. Ambroſius called here by Hiſtorians Nazaleod, though very old, and almoſt paſt the Time of Action, could not ſee all theſe Preparations without having his Courage rouz'd, which Age ſeem'd to have lain aſleep. He put himſelf at the Head of his Army, and detaching Arthur to follow Baldulph and Colgrin, who were marching towards the Weſt, reſolv'd to go in queſt of Cerdic. Arthur, every where victorious, coming to an Engagement with the Saxon Brothers in Cornwal, obtain'd a ſignal Victory over them (1).

Whilſt this great General was cauſing the Arms of the The Britons Britons to triumph in thoſe Parts, Ambroſius advanced to- are defeated, and Ambro- wards Cerdic, who had no thought of retiring. The two ſius ſlain. Armies being engag'd, Ambroſius broke through the right H. Hunt. l. 2. Wing of the Saxons, commanded by Cerdic, and put them to rout. But whilſt he was eagerly purſuing his Victory againſt a Body that made but a faint Reſiſtance, Cenric had the ſame Advantage over the right Wing of the Britons, which he more wiſely improv'd. Inſtead of loſing Time in purſuing the Run aways, he flies to the Aſſiſtance of his Father, and falling upon Ambroſius in Flank, puts him in irreparable Diſorder. By this prudent Conduct, he gave Cerdic Time to rally his Troops, and complete the Victory by an entire Defeat of the Britons.

Ambroſius, vex'd to ſee the Victory ſnatch'd out of his Hands, did all he could to renew the Fight. In ſpite of Age and Infirmities, he threw himſelf among his Enemies in order to animate his Troops by his Example. But all his Efforts ſerv'd only to crown his glorious Life with an honourable Death. The fall of Ambroſius cauſed an univerſal Rout among the Britons, who precipitately abandon'd the Field of Battle to their Enemies. The Succeſs of that Day was, by the publick Acknowledgment of his Father, attributed to Cenric. This Battle was fought in 508, near a Place call'd by the Saxons, Cerdic's-Ford (2).

Nazaleod and Ambro- ſius the ſame Perſon. Camden. H. Hunt. Before I proceed any farther, it will be proper to obſerve, that the Name of Nazaleod, given by Hiſtorians to the Britiſh Monarch ſlain in this Battle, has made ſome imagine it was not Ambroſius. But the Opinion of Camden and ſeveral other good Writers, who aſſert the contrary, is doubtleſs to be preferr'd. All the Hiſtorians agree that Ambroſius fell in Battle. Now after the beginning of this Prince's Reign, there was no other Battle except this, wherein a Britiſh Monarch was ſlain. Beſides, Hiſtorians would not have omitted to mark the Time of the Death of ſo famous a Prince, had it happen'd in ſome other Action.

Arthur elected Monarch. Arthur was elected Monarch in the Room of Ambroſius. He was doubtleſs the fitteſt Perſon to command the Army, his very Name being terrible to the Saxons (3). Between Uſher de Prim. c. 13. G. Monm. Ambroſius and Arthur, ſome Writers place Uther Pendragon, who, they affirm, was Arthur's eldeſt Brother, and both of them Sons of Ambroſius. But they that are moſt vers'd in the Engliſh Hiſtory, maintain that Uther was only a Sirname given to the great Arthur on account of his Victories, the Word being capable of that Senſe in the old Britiſh Language.

Camden. Arthur, after his Coronation at Caerleon, which he had retaken from the Saxons, march'd againſt the Northumbrians, and defeated them on the Banks of the little River Ribroyt that runs through Lancaſhire. This is reckon'd his Tenth Victory over the Saxons. In the mean time Baldulph and Colgrin, invading the Weſtern Parts, made ſuch Devaſtations, that he was oblig'd to leave Northumberland, and march againſt the two Brothers. However, he left Hoel his Nephew in Bernicia, to oppoſe the Saxons there, who, though often beaten, were ſtill formidable. His uſual Succeſs attended him. Mean while, Cerdic having receiv'd freſh ſupplies from the Saxon Princes in Britain, as well as from Germany, laid Siege to Bath. Baldulph and Colgrin having joined him alſo, with what Troops they could draw together, his Army was ſo ſtrong, that he wiſh'd the Britons would attempt to raiſe the Siege. His Wiſhes were accompliſh'd. Arthur, re- Bede. Langhorn. ſolving to hazard All to ſave that Place, came and gave him Battle, which proved the bloodieſt that had ever been fought between the two Nations. It laſted from Noon till Night, without any viſible Advantage to either Side. Both Armies kept the Field, waiting for the Day, to renew the Fight. The Saxons, during the Night, poſted themſelves on a little Hill, call'd Banneſdown, which was of great Importance, tho' it had been neglected by both Sides the Day before. As ſoon as it was light, Arthur, perceiving the Advantage the Saxons had gain'd by ſeizing that Poſt, was reſolv'd to diſlodge them, which he effected after a long and obſtinate Fight. The Britons, animated by the Preſence and Valour of their King, perceiving, the Saxons in retreating down the Hill had put themſelves in ſome Diſorder, preſs'd them ſtill more vigorouſly, and at laſt entirely routed them (5). They gained, on this Occaſion, a moſt complete Victory. Baldulph and Colgrin were both ſlain, and Cerdic, with the Remains of his Army, retired to an inacceſſible Poſt.

An unexpected Event gave the Saxons time to breathe, The Picts, make a Diverſion in the North and prevented Arthur from improving his Victory. The G. Monm. l. 7. H. Hunt. l. 2. But Arthur was too quick for them. Inſtead of purſuing his Advantage upon Cerdic, he flew to the Aſſiſtance of the King of Armorica, and compell'd the Picts to raiſe the Siege. The Britiſh Arthur ravages their Country. G. Monm. l. 7. Monarch was ſo provok'd with the Picts for this Diverſion, which came ſo opportunely for the Saxons, that he ravaged their Country from one End to the other, and would have entirely deſtroy'd it, had not the Biſhops by their Interceſſion diverted him from his Purpoſe.

As ſhe had no Children, the Women of the Country fancied, All that walked over her Grave, would, like her, be barren. For which Reaſon great Care was taken to hinder the young Damſels from approaching it. Hoel, after this Expedition, return'd to his own Country, the Victory of Badon having ſecur'd Arthur, for ſome time, from any Attempts of the Saxons. Arthur, in his return from the Country of the Picts, made ſome Stay at York, which the Saxons had juſt abandon'd ſince the Battle of Badon. His chief Intent was to regulate the Affairs of the Church, which were, from the time the Saxons had been Maſters of that City, in great Confuſion.

512. Octa King of Kent. G. Malm. l. 1. Eſcus King of Kent died in 512, memorable only for leaving his Name to all his Succeſſors, Kings of Kent, who from him were call'd Eſcingians. He was ſucceeded by his Son Octa.

514. The Death of Ella. M. Weſt. Bede, l. 2. H. Hunt. Two Years after died Ella King of Suſſex, and Monarch of the Saxons, having enlarg'd his narrow Territories at the Expence of the Britons, during a Reign of twenty three Years. His two eldeſt Sons having been ſlain at Badon, Ciſſa the youngeſt ſucceeded him in the Kingdom of Suſſex; but the Monarchy of the Saxons was conferr'd on Cerdic.

514. Hunt. Cerdic, ever ſince the Battle of Badon, had lain quiet in his own Country, expecting a Supply from Germany, which arrived in 514, under the Conduct of Stuff and Withgar his Nephews (7). Upon this he took the Field again, and committed great Devaſtations in the Country of the Britons (8). Arthur, tho' weaken'd by his own Victories, not having the ſame Recruits as the Saxons, made however powerful Struggles to oppoſe the Progreſs of this formidable Enemy. The many and bloody Battles between the two Nations did not decide the Quarrel, ſince Victory inclin'd ſometimes on one Side, and ſometimes on the other. But at length in 519, 519. Cerdic gains a great Victory. Cerdic defeated the Britons in ſuch a manner, as made them deſpair of ever driving out the Saxons (9). Wherefore, Arthur ſaw himſelf under a neceſſity of taking other Meaſures. As he found his Army irreparably deſtroy'd, he thought it more prudent to conclude a Peace with Cerdic, and grant him a Part, rather than hazard the Whole of his Dominions, by endeavouring to deprive him of All. This Conſideration moved him to ſurrender by Treaty a certain Tract of Land, containing the preſent Counties of Hampſhire and Somertſhire. Higden. The Saxon Prince was pleas'd with theſe Terms, being deſirous after ſo long a War, of enjoying ſome Repoſe in his declining Age. As ſoon as he was in Poſſeſſion of his new Territories, he founded the Kingdom of Weſſex, or of the Weſt-Saxons, ſo call'd becauſe it lay Weſt of Kent and Suſſex.

From the time Hengiſt had peopled Eſſex and Middleſex with Saxons and Jutes, they had been govern'd by a Deputy under the King of Kent. But in 527 Erchenwin, deſcended from Woden, aſſum'd the Title of King of Eſſex, or of the Eaſt-Saxons. This Kingdom lying Eaſtward of the other three, contain'd the two Counties of Eſſex and Middleſex, of which London was the Capital. Who Erchenwin was, how long he had been in Britain, and what Right he had to this new Kingdom, Hiſtorians inform us not. I ſuppoſe he was Governor under Octa King of Kent, and taking advantage of his Weakneſs, engag'd the People to acknowledge him for King.

The Arrival of the Angles. Bede. G. Malm. M. Weſtm.

About this time Multitudes of Angles under the Conduct of twelve Chiefs, all of equal Authority, but whoſe Names, except Uffa, (of whom I ſhall have occaſion to ſpeak hereafter,) are unknown, landed at ſome Port on the Eaſtern Coaſt of Britain, where, without much difficulty, they poſſeſs'd themſelves of ſome Poſt; thoſe Parts being ill guarded by the Britons. In time, as they were continually enlarging their Conqueſts towards the Weſt, they compell'd the Britons at length to abandon the Country along the Eaſtern Shore. The Angles, thus ſituated, had an Opportunity of ſending from time to time for freſh Colonies from Germany, with which they founded a fifth Kingdom, by the Name of the Kingdom of Eaſt-Anglia, or of the Eaſt-Angles. But as their firſt Chiefs aſſum'd not the Title of King, the Beginning of this Kingdom is generally brought down to the Year 571.

During the eight Years Peace between Arthur and Cerdic, the King of Armorica being diſturb'd by the Rebellion of Frollon, one of his Subjects, ſent to his Uncle Arthur for Aid. As Britain was then in a State of Tranquillity, Arthur would go in Perſon, and aſſiſt the King his Nephew. To that end he paſſes into Armorica, where he revenges Hoel, by ſlaying Frollon with his own Hand in the firſt Battle they fought.

527. The Battle of Cherdſley. Huntingd. l. 2. Sax. Ann.

Arthur was ſtill with Hoel when the Angles arriv'd in Britain. His Abſence very probably gave them an Opportunity of making greater Progreſs than they would have done, had he been in the Country. Cerdic alſo taking Advantage of Arthur's Abſence, and of the Angles, broke the Peace, and made ſome farther Conqueſts. He was conſtantly attended by his Son Cenric, who bravely ſeconded him in all his Undertakings, and by his Valour and Conduct caus'd him to gain a ſignal Victory in Buckinghamſhire, at a Place call'd Cerdic's Lega, now Cherdſley (2).

528. Arthur renews the Treaty with Cerdic.

Arthur at his Return found his Affairs in extreme Diſorder, by reaſon of Cerdic's new Conqueſts, and the Arrival of the Angles. However, perceiving himſelf unable to renew the War with his Enemies, whoſe Number was continually encreaſing, he choſe to make a new Treaty with Cerdic. Immediately after this Treaty, Arthur is ſaid to aſſume the Title of Emperor, of which his Seal found at Weſtminſter is pretended to be a Proof. Leland ſays, he ſaw the Impreſſion of it on red Wax, with theſe Words round it: Patr. Arthurius. Britann. Gall. Germ. Dac. Imper. that is, Patricius Arthurius; Britannicus. Gallicus. Germanicus. Dacicus. Imperator. Theſe proud Titles perhaps were the Occaſion of aſcribing to him ſo many pretended Victories in foreign Countries, and of ſtyling him Conqueror of the Gauls, Germans, and Dacians. But whether this Seal be genuine or not (3), there is Foundation enough for theſe Titles from the Exploits now related of this Prince. He might be call'd Britannicus from his being Monarch of the Britons. The Title of Gallicus might be owing to his Expedition into Gaul. The Surname of Germanicus was no leſs proper, ſince he frequently defeated the Saxons, who came from Germany. Laſtly, his being ſtyled Dacicus might be founded on his Victory over the Jutes, who were mix'd with the Saxons, and by ſome have been confounded with the Danes and Dacians. Be this as it will, if he aſſum'd the Title of Emperor, as it is very likely, ſince Ambroſius did the ſame, the four different Times of his attaining to the four ſeveral Dignities, muſt be carefully diſtinguiſh'd. 1. He mounted the Throne of Danmonium 467, at fifteen Years of Age. 2. In 476, he was created Patrician by Ambroſius. 3. In 508, he was elected Monarch of Britain. 4. In 528, he aſſumed the Imperial Purple. Theſe Epocha's thus diſtinguiſh'd, remove, in great meaſure, the Confuſion in the Hiſtory of this great Prince, with reſpect to Chronology.

Aſſert. Arthuri.

Four Epocha's of the Reign of Arthur.

Hoel, King of Armorica, was enjoying the Repoſe procured him by Arthur, when he heard that the Wiſigoths, then in Poſſeſſion of Part of Gaul, were preparing to invade his Dominions: Wherefore he deſired Arthur to come, once more, in Perſon to aſſiſt him againſt ſo formidable Enemies, that were already Maſters of Part of Gaul. How neceſſary ſoever Arthur's Preſence might be in his own Kingdom, he readily gave Hoel this full Proof of his Affection and Gratitude. As he was like to be detain'd abroad ſome time by the Affairs of Armorica, he left Modred his Nephew, whom he deſign'd for his Succeſſor Regent in his Abſence, at the ſame time entruſting him with the Care of the Queen his Wife.

Arthur returns into Armorica. G. Monm. l. 7. Annal. Sax. Langhorn. p. 78.

530. Cerdic takes the Iſle of Wight.

Arthur was no ſooner gone, but Cerdic, taking advantage of his Abſence, attacks and ſubdues the Iſle of Wight, deſtroying almoſt all the Inhabitants in a cruel Manner. But this Loſs was nothing to Arthur, in compariſon of what ſhortly after follow'd by the Treachery of Modred, to whoſe Care he had committed what he held moſt dear. This Traitor, finding the Wife and Kingdom of Arthur in his Power, falls in Love with both, and not ſatisfied with debauching the Queen in private, publickly marries her. In order to avoid by a ſecond Crime, the Puniſhment of the firſt, he reſolves moreover to ſeize the Crown of his Uncle, his King, and Benefactor. The more eaſily to accompliſh his Deſign, he judges it neceſſary to make Cerdic his Friend, and by his Means to gain all the reſt of the Saxon Princes to his Intereſt. He was very ſenſible, it wou'd be very difficult to ſupport himſelf in his Uſurpation, if he were immediately forc'd to engage in a War with the Foreigners. Beſides, he could not find a readier or more powerful Protection. But the Saxon Prince not being of a Humour to neglect his own, for the ſake of another's Affairs, Modred could not poſſibly obtain this Protection, without paying dear for it. However, as he had no other way to ſupport himſelf, he reſigns to Cerdic one part of the Dominions, uſurp'd upon his Uncle, and enters into a League offenſive and defenſive with him. What the Saxon Prince got by this Treaty, lay extremely convenient for him, and vaſtly exceeded what was before given him by Arthur. It contain'd, beſides Part of Danmonium, or Cornwal, the preſent Counties of Berkſhire, Wiltſhire, Devonſhire, and Dorſetſhire. This, with Hampſhire and Somerſetſhire, which he was before poſſeſs'd of, render'd his Kingdom much larger and more conſiderable, than the three other Saxon Kingdoms already eſtabliſh'd. The Treaty being executed, Modred was crown'd at London; thoſe who privately abhorr'd his treacherous Doings not daring to oppoſe it, for fear of being oppreſs'd, before the Return of their lawful Prince.

He is crown'd at London.

In the mean time, Cerdic, after having much enlarg'd his Dominions, was incumbred with his Greatneſs. As moſt of his Subjects were Britons, on whoſe Loyalty he could not wholly rely, he believ'd it neceſſary, in order to preſerve his new Dominions, to people them with Saxon Colonies. To that end he ſent Word into Germany, that All who were willing to come and ſettle in his Kingdom, ſhould meet with great Encouragement. This Invitation induces a great many of the Saxons and Jutes to embrace the preſent Opportunity. Soon after, above eight hundred Veſſels are ſeen to arrive, freighted with Families in queſt of Settlements, in Cerdic's new Kingdom. Theſe Colonies were joyfully receiv'd and planted in Habitations, from whence Cerdic took care to drive ſuch Britons as he moſt ſuſpected, eſpecially upon the Frontiers. Thus Britain was fill'd by degrees, with new Inhabitants, and began to loſe the Superiority in Number ſhe had hitherto had above the Foreigners.

Cerdic having ſettled theſe New-Comers, was crown'd a ſecond time at Wincheſter, the Metropolis of his Dominions, by the ſame Title of King of Weſſex, or of the Weſt-Saxons, that he had before aſſum'd. This Ceremony was thought neceſſary, by reaſon of the great Number of his new Subjects, Saxons and Jutes, that were lately added to the old. This Kingdom was very advantagiouſly ſituated, being bounded on the North, by the Thames; on the Weſt, by the Severn; on the South, by the Sea; and on the Eaſt, by the Kingdom of Suſſex. As for the Britons that were ſtill in poſſeſſion of the greateſt Part of Danmonium, they cou'd not be very formidable to Cerdic, being divided from the reſt of their Nation by this new Kingdom and the Severn.

Cerdic provides againſt Arthur.

Cerdic was but too well acquainted with the Valour and Activity of Arthur, to imagine he would ſit ſtill at his Return; and therefore us'd all his Endeavours to put himſelf in a Poſture of Defence. To that end, he repairs all his ſtrong Holds, adds new Works, and takes all other Precautions his Prudence ſuggeſts to him, not to be ſurpriz'd when he comes to defend his Dominions. Every thing being put in order, he rewarded his Nephews Stuff and Withgar, who had faithfully ſerved him ever ſince their Arrival, with the Iſle of Wight. As in all likelihood they were Jutes, Cerdic, in the Diſtribution of his new Colonies, had taken care beforehand to people that little Iſland with their own Countrymen (1).

534. The Death of Cerdic. G. Malm. l. 1. c. 6. Sax. Ann. Thus Cerdic was prepared againſt the Attacks of Arthur, when Death took him out of the World in the Year 534, ſixteen Years after his firſt Coronation, and thirty-nine after his Arrival in Britain. He muſt have been of a great Age when he died, for thirty-nine Years before, Cenric his Son was able to aſſiſt him in his Wars. The Time this Prince paſſed in Britain was a continued Scene of good and bad Succeſs, which ſerv'd equally to ſhew his Ability to improve his Advantages, and to repair with a wonderful Readineſs, the Diſorder his Affairs were frequently thrown into by the Fortune of War. Cenric, his Son, the faithful Companion of all his Labours, ſucceeded him, both in the Kingdom of Weſſex, and alſo in the Monarchy or Generalſhip of the Saxons and Angles. Cerdic's Succeſſors were ſirnamed Gewiſhians, from Gewiſh one of their Anceſtors, famous no doubt in his Generation.

He is ſucceeded by Cenric.

Polychr. l. 5. c. 4. The ſame Year died Octa King of Kent, after a Reign of twenty-two Years; wherein nothing remarkable occurs but the diſmembring of the Kingdom of Eſſex, which he, for ſome unknown Reaſon, did not think fit to oppoſe. He was ſucceeded by his Son Hermenrick.

535. Arthur returns, Arthur, after a four Year's Abſence, at length quitted Armorica. We are ignorant of the Cauſe of his long Stay there, ſo very prejudicial to his Affairs, which at his Arrival were in a deſperate Condition. Modred was in poſſeſſion of his Throne, and moreover in ſtrict Alliance with the Saxons. On the other hand, theſe laſt being now Maſters of good part of the Iſland, were led by their own Intereſt to ſupport the Uſurper, and maintain him on the Thone. However, Arthur, tho' broken with Age, and almoſt deſtitute of Friends, reſolv'd to undertake the Recovery of his Kingdom, and to puniſh the treacherous Modred. This bold Reſolution rouz'd the Courage of thoſe that dar'd not at firſt to declare for him. A great Number of Officers and Soldiers, who could not bear the Thoughts of fighting againſt him that had taught them to conquer, deſerted the Uſurper, and came and liſted themſelves under the Banner of their lawful Prince. Thus Arthur ſaw himſelf on a ſudden at the Head of an Army capable of making Modred uneaſy, if not by the Number, at leaſt by the Bravery of the Troops, and the Valour and Experience of the Leader. Modred, on his part, omitted nothing for his Defence. As he was not ignorant of the People's Inclination to his Uncle, he had reaſon to apprehend a general Defection; and therefore had ſtrengthen'd himſelf with the Aſſiſtance of the Saxons; and upon the ſame Account made an Alliance with the Picts (2). He eaſily engaged the Picts to his Intereſt, ſince they paſſionately deſir'd to be revenged of Arthur, who had formerly carried Fire and Sword into their Country. Thus Arthur, with a handful of Friends was forced to ſtand againſt the Saxons and Picts, in conjunction with the Britons that ſided with Modred. But the want of Numbers was ſupplied by his Courage and Experience. Tho' his Troops were much inferior to thoſe of his Enemy, he found Means however to engage him in a very diſadvantageous Poſt, and obtain a ſignal Victory. In this Action he loſt Galvan and Anguſel, two Princes of his Blood, who had faithfully ſerv'd him both in Proſperity and Adverſity.

and defeats Modred.

Tho' Modred was defeated, the Supplies he receiv'd from the Picts and Saxons ſoon enabled him to give his Uncle a ſecond Battle, but with no better Succeſs. As the Particulars of this War are confuſedly deliver'd, and beſides contain nothing material, it will ſuffice, I believe, to relate the Iſſue. Modred, tho' conſtantly worſted, found means to prolong the War ſeven Years, without Arthur's being able to deſtroy the Uſurper, much leſs wreſt out of the Hands of the Saxons, what had been ſurrender'd to them. During this War, there happen'd two Eclipſes of the Sun, which credulous Hiſtorians have expreſly remark'd, fancying they were Preſages of the utter Ruin of the Britons, which fell out ſoon after.

537. Arthur gains a ſecond Victory over Modred.

542. The laſt Battle, wherein Arthur and Modred were both ſlain. G. Monm. H. Hunt. The Superiority of Modred's Forces being balanced by the Valour and Experience of Arthur, the War had now laſted ſeven Years without any thing deciſive. Modred, tho' ſeveral times vanquiſh'd, was ſtill at the Head of a very numerous Army. On the other hand, Arthur, tho' extreme old, and with an Army weaken'd by the ſeveral Battles he had given his Enemy, ſupported himſelf by his great Experience in the Art of War. At laſt the fatal Blow was given in the Year 542. Arthur purſuing his Enemy from place to place, drove him to the Extremity of Danmonium, where he could not avoid fighting. This laſt Battle was fought by the River Cambalon (3), near Camelford. It prov'd fatal to the two Leaders, as well as to all the Britons, who having loſt their beſt Troops, were never after able to ſtand againſt the Saxons. During this bloody Battle, the Uncle and Nephew happening to meet, ruſhed upon one another ſo furiouſly, that nothing but Death could part them. Modred was ſlain upon the Spot, and Arthur, mortally wounded, was carried to Glaſſenbury, where he died, aged 90 Years, 76 of which he had ſpent in the continual Exerciſe of Arms. Tho' he had reigned but 34 Years, yet before he mounted the Throne, he had long commanded the Britiſh Armies under Ambroſius. Some have put an Interval of ſeveral Years between Ambroſius and Arthur, becauſe they were at a loſs where to place their Uther Pendragon, whom they will have, at any rate, to be a King different from Arthur. But the beſt Authors are of Opinion, that the Name Uther, ſignifying in Britiſh a Club, was given to the great Arthur, for the ſame reaſon that Charlemain's Grandfather was call'd Martel, or Hammer. As to the Sirname of Pendragon, it owes its Origin, as 'tis pretended, to Arthur's wearing a Dragon on the Creſt of his Helmet.

Arthur was undoubtedly a great General. It is pity his Actions have ſerv'd for Foundation to numberleſs Fables, that have been publiſh'd concerning him: whereas his Life was worthy of being recorded by the graveſt and moſt able Pen. He is ſaid to have inſtituted the Order of the Knights of the Round Table, ſo famous in Romances. Tho' this Inſtitution has given occaſion for many fabulous Relations, it is not therefore to be deem'd altogether chimerical. For where is the Improbability that Arthur ſhould inſtitute an Order of Knighthood in Britain, when we learn from the Letters of Caſſidorus, that Theodoric, King of the Oſtrogoths, inſtituted one in Italy in the ſame Century?

Arthur's Encomium.

Such was the Love and Eſteem of the Britons for this Hero, that many would never believe he was dead. Nay, there were ſome for ſeveral Ages after, that imagining he was travell'd into foreign Parts, expected his Return (4). This would ſeem incredible, had there not been, in the 16th Century, an Inſtance of the like Folly with regard to Don Sebaſtian King of Portugal. It is this perhaps that gave occaſion to ſome Writers, deſirous of pleaſing the Britons, to invent Arthur's Travels and numberleſs Victories in foreign Countries. The Titles of Germanicus, Gallicus, Dacicus, aſſum'd by that Prince, might ſerve for Foundation to ſuch Fictions. Theſe pretended Voyages and imaginary Victories, have prov'd an inexhauſtible Fountain of abſurd and ridiculous Things, aſcrib'd to him by the Writers of Romances. Hence it is, that his Hiſtroy has been ſo diſfigur'd, as to cauſe many to doubt, whether there was ever ſuch a Man as Arthur in the World; and no wonder, for it is impoſſible to reconcile all the Contradictions that occur in his fabulous Hiſtory. But if we diſtinguiſh Truth from Falſhood, and reject what ſavours too much of the Romance, we meet with nothing in the Life of this Hero, unbecoming the Character of a great Prince. The Times of his Life and Reign are ſo confounded by theſe fabulous Writers, that they are very difficult to be clear'd, and therefore Recourſe muſt be had to the four ſeveral Epocha's before-mention'd. He was born at Tindagol in Cornwall in 452, or 453, and died in 542. He was buried in the Monaſtery at Glaſſenbury, by Gueniver his ſecond Wife. He had two others of the ſame Name, the firſt died in the Country of the Picts, and the third prov'd falſe to him. By this laſt he had a Son call'd Nocm, who died an Infant. Arthur when he was about to expire, ſent his Crown to Conſtantine his Couſin, Son of Cador, and Grandſon of Ambroſius, declaring him his Succeſſor; which muſt be underſtood only of Danmonium, for the Monarchy of Britain was extinct by his Death. It is pretended, that his Body was found whole and entire in Glaſſenbury Monaſtery in the the Reign of Henry II, with the viſible Marks of ten Wounds, one whereof only ſeemed mortal. But what is ſaid of his Stature is unqueſtionably fabulous, namely, that the Diſtance between his Eye-brows was a Span, and the reſt of his Body in Proportion. We have the particular Names of his Arms in the antient Romances. His Shield was called Pridwin, his Lance Ron, and his Sword Caliburn. This laſt was preſented in 1191 to Tancred King of Sicily, by Richard I. King of England.

Nay, they could not make uſe of all the Soldiers Britain might have ſupply'd them with; for many of their Countrymen, ſeeing no End to their Miſeries, were fled for Refuge to the Picts, or into Armorica. Such Numbers retired to Armorica, that by their Junction with the Britiſh Families long before ſettled there, they became more numerous at laſt than the Natives. Hence 'tis pretended, that this Province of Gaul, called Armorica, that is, Maritime, by reaſon of its Situation, took the Name of Bretagne from the great Number of Britons that fled thither. Argentre, who wrote the Hiſtory of that Country, pretends, Armorica was antiently called Bretagne, and that the Inhabitants ſending Colonies into Albion, gave that Iſland the Name of their own Country (1). It is probable indeed, the Armoricans peopled ſome part of Great-Britain; but in all that this Author alledges in proof of his Aſſertion, there is no ſufficient Reaſon to ſhew, that, before theſe Colonies, Armorica was called Bretagne, much leſs, that the Armoricans altered the old Name of the Iſland of Albion.

537. The Arrival of Ida. G. Monm. Ann. Sax. Flor. Wigor. H. Hunt. M. Weſtm.

As ſoon as it was rumoured in Germany that Arthur was dead, and the diſmay'd Britons had neither Power nor Courage to defend themſelves, great Numbers of People reſolv'd to go over and ſettle in Britain. Ida, by Nation an Angle, and deſcended from Woden, having embark'd on board forty Veſſels, abundance of Families of his own Countrymen, landed at Flamborough in Yorkſhire, then in Poſſeſſion of the Northumberland Saxons, who received them as Friends. The Northumbrians, ſo called from inhabiting North of the Humber, had maintained themſelves in that Country ever ſince the Time of Hengiſt, and had all along been in ſome Dependence on the Kings of Kent. They had often favour'd the Enterprizes of their Countrymen in the Southern Parts, by frequent Diverſions, which had ſeveral times drawn into the North the Arms of Ambroſius and Arthur: but tho' frequently defeated, they had however kept Poſſeſſion of theſe Northern Countries, without its appearing how they were governed from the Death of Octa and Ebuſa to the Year 547. Ida, when he firſt arrived in their Country, (whether he had made an Agreement with them before he left Germany, or they were tired with being in Subjection to the Kings of Kent, from whom, by reaſon of their Diſtance, they could expect no Aſſiſtance) found them ready and willing to obey him. It may be, they were not in condition to oppoſe Ida, who had brought with him a ſtrong Army. However this be, Ida was acknowledged for Sovereign of the Northumbrians, as well as of the Angles his Followers, under the Title of King of Northumberland (2). The Readineſs of the Saxons to mix with the Angles, and obey a King of that Nation, confirms what I have elſewhere obſerved, That the Saxons and Angles were in Germany but one and the ſame People. The Name of the Saxons ſtill remains in Germany, whilſt that of the Angles is entirely loſt; and on the contrary, this latter is perpetuated in Britain, where the former is almoſt forgotten. Northumberland was the fifth Kingdom founded by the Anglo-Saxons. Ida, the firſt King, was a Prince of great Fame; and yet, as he eſtabliſhed himſelf without any Obſtacle, there is but one particular recorded of him in Hiſtory, and that is, his building the City of Bebbanburgh, ſo called from his Queen Bebba. This City, after many Years, was deſtroy'd: however, there ſtill remains the Caſtle of Bamborough.

Ida firſt King of Northumberland. Sax. Ann. Huntingd. G. of Monm. Flor. Wigor. M. Weſtm.

The Memoirs concerning the Settlement of the Anglo-Saxons in Britain, are ſo ſhort and imperfect, that it is impoſſible to frame a regular Hiſtory of them. We muſt therefore be ſatisfied with a certain Number of Facts tranſmitted to us; by the Help whereof, the Thread of the Hiſtory may, in ſome meaſure, be purſued.

552. Cenric repulſes the Britains. Sax. Ann.

In the Year 552, notwithſtanding their weak Eſtate, the Britons made an Effort to recover part of their Lands from Cenric King of the Weſt Saxons, but were repuls'd with great Loſs near Salisbury.

555. G. Monm. l. 8. c. 1.

We find alſo in the Saxon Annals, (3) that three Years after two Sons of Modred, by the Aſſiſtance of the Saxons, attempted to dethrone Conſtantine, to whom Arthur had bequeath'd the Kingdom of Danmonium. But Conſtantine, being better prepared than they expected, not only put them to rout, but purſued them to Glaſſenbury, ſtabb'd them himſelf in the Arms of the Abbot, who interceded for them in vain (4).

559. Ida dies. Sax. Ann.

Ida, King of Northumberland, died in 559, having reigned twelve Years. Tho' the profound Peace he enjoyed during his whole Reign, gave him no Opportunity of ſhewing his Valour, yet all the Hiſtorians agree, he was a moſt accompliſhed Prince (5). 'Tis pity we have not a fuller Account of his Life. After his Death, Northumberland, for ſome unknown Reaſon, was divided into two Kingdoms. Adda, Son of Ida, was King of Bernicia, or the Northern Part, and Alla, deſcended from Woden, of Deïra or the Southern Part. Ida left twelve Sons, half by Wives and half by Concubines, who formed ſeveral Branches, as may be ſeen in the Genealogy of the Kings of Northumberland, which the Reader ſhould now and then take a View of, if he deſires to underſtand fully the Hiſtory of theſe Saxon Kingdoms.

560. Death of Cenric. Bede, l. 2. c. 5.

The next Year Cenric King of Weſſex, and Monarch of the Anglo-Saxons, died, after a Reign of twenty-ſix Years. The Reputation he had gained during his Father's Life, made it believed he would puſh his Conqueſts farther. But when he was on the Throne, he ſhewed no Signs of Ambition, and employed himſelf wholly in promoting Peace and good Order in his Dominions. He took up Arms but once to repel the Britons, who came and attack'd him. Of the four Sons he left, Ceaulin, the eldeſt, ſucceeded him both in the Kingdom of Weſſex, and the Dignity of Monarch of the Saxons.

Ceaulin ſucceeds him. He forms the Deſign of aggrandizing himſelf.

Ceaulin was no ſooner on the Throne, but he formed vaſt Projects to enlarge his Dominions by new Conqueſts. He was an ambitious Prince, who, not content with the Prerogatives he was veſted with as Monarch, conſidered the other Saxon Kings as his Vaſſals, pretending to keep them in a rigorous Dependence. As he was ſenſible it would be very difficult to obtain the Submiſſion he expected from them, he made extraordinary Preparations, which alarmed both the Saxon and Britiſh Princes. The laſt eſpecially could not but be in extreme Conſternation, by reaſon of their deplorable State. After the Death of Arthur, they lived in a ſort of Anarchy. What remained of their Country, was cantled out into little independent States, which weakened one another by the Diſcord that reigned among their reſpective Princes. The Britiſh Hiſtorians give ſuch a Character of theſe petty Sovereigns, that the Nation in general could have but ſmall Hopes of Aſſiſtance from any one, or all of them together. Conſtantine King of Cornwall was a cruel and bloody Prince, polluted alſo with abominable Luſts. Aurelius Conanus, whoſe Kingdom lay eaſtward of the Severn, was guilty of Parricide, and reigned with unheard of Tyranny. Vortipore King of Demetia [or South-Wales] was overgrown with Pride; he gloried alſo in having no Religion, and perſecuting the Clergy. Cuneglas, whoſe Dominions were North of Cambria (ſo the Country was called between the Severn and the weſtern ſea) was grown old in Vice, and famous for his wicked Deeds. Maglocun or Malgo (6) King of Mona or Angleſey, thought of nothing but pillaging his Neighbours and Subjects, and heaping up Riches by Rapine and Violence. In a word, Britain was in a terrible Confuſion. After Arthur's Deceaſe, every one lived as he pleaſed, and the Authority of the Tyrants was in Proportion to the Licenſe their Subjects were ſuffered to take. Theſe Sovereigns were divided among themſelves, and, as they had no Confidence in one another, could not agree upon proper Means to free themſelves from the impending Calamities. Each therefore purſuing only his own Intereſt, the Saxons were left at liberty to eſtabliſh themſelves upon their Ruins.

Gildas.

Ceaulin's Preparations, however, rous'd them a little out of their Lethargy, and obliged them to think of their Defence. To that end they choſe Malgo to command them, purely for the Sake of his Giant-like Stature. But what could this unexperienced General have done, if the Saxons had united their Forces againſt him? He would have loſt, perhaps, in a ſingle Battle, what the Great Arthur had taken ſo much Pains to preſerve. But happily for him and the Britons, the Saxon Monarch was poſſeſſed with the Project of ſubduing his Countrymen firſt, ſo turned againſt the Saxons the Arms that ſhould have been employed againſt the common Enemy. He could not diſcover his Deſigns, without incurring the Enmity and Jealouſy of the neighbouring Princes. But as no one of them in particular was able to withſtand him, his Kingdom being much ſtronger than any of the reſt, each dreaded being oppreſſed, ſhould he declare againſt him ſingly. They were therefore by degrees forced to ſubmit to a much greater Dependence on their Monarch or General, than their Laws and Cuſtoms required. Mean while, they grieved in private to be thus kept under, fearing withal that Ceaulin's Deſigns would extend farther.

564. Ethelbert becomes King of Kent. G. Malm. l. 1.

At length, Hermenric King of Kent, dying in 564, Ethelbert, his Son and Succeſſor, could not bear the proud and haughty Proceedings of the Weſt-Saxons, which were the more grievous to Ethelbert, as being a Deſcendant of Hengiſt, he thought he had a better Right to the Dignity of Monarch than any other Prince. Prepoſſeſs'd with this Notion, he re-

His Vexation at ſo unexpected a Diſappointment, was increaſed by the Jeſts of the other Princes, who rallied him for his Preſumption. He had occaſion for his Leſſon, to teach him that Courage alone is not ſufficient for War, but muſt be accompanied with Prudence and Strength. He improved ſo much by it, that he afterwards became one of the wiſeſt and moſt illuſtrious Princes of his Nation. This was the firſt Civil War among the Saxons, which was followed by many more, cauſed by the Reſtleſſneſs and Ambition of their Princes. As ſoon as they were out of Danger from the Britons, they quarrell'd among themſelves, with ſuch Animoſity, that if another Arthur had appeared, the Britons might have recovered all they had loſt. But Divine Providence had otherwiſe decreed.

571. Uffa firſt King of the Eaſt Angles.

Uffa, the only Survivor of the Twelve Chiefs of the Angles before-mentioned, aſſumed in 571 the Title of King of the Eaſt-Angles, and his Kingdom was called Eaſt-Anglia. As this was forty Years after his Arrival in Britain, he muſt have been of a great Age when crown'd. This was the ſixth Kingdom founded by the Anglo-Saxons (2).

The Ambition of Ceaulin.

Ceaulin was ſo elated with his Succeſs againſt Ethelbert, that he look'd upon the neighbouring Saxon Princes as his Subjects and Vaſſals. Indeed the King of Northumberland and Eaſt-Anglia, being ſeparated from him by a large Tract of Land poſſeſſed by the Britons, had not much to fear from his Ambition. But the Kings of Kent, Eſſex and Suſſex were forced to ſubmit to him, as ſuperior to each of them in Extent of Dominions. After this he turned his Arms againſt the Britons with deſign to make new Conqueſts. I can't poſſibly relate the Particulars of this War, being very ſlightly paſſed over by the Hiſtorians. They only tell us, that Cutha, Brother of Ceaulin, frequently defeated the Britons, and would, in all probability, have very much enlarged his Brother's Dominions, had not Death ſnatched him away in the midſt of his Victories (3).

Before this War was ended, Uffa, firſt King of the Eaſt-Angles died in 578, leaving his Crown to his Son Titilus.

The Britons ſend to the Scots for Aſſiſtance. Huntingd. Fordun.

Such was the deplorable Condition of the Britons, that the time of their utter Deſtruction ſeemed to approach. Preſſed on the South by the Saxons of Weſſex, Suſſex and Kent; on the Eaſt, by thoſe of Eſſex or Eaſt-Anglia; and on the North, by the Northumbrians; they were, in a manner, ſurrounded by their Enemies. There was, however, one Refuge left, which helpt to keep alive, for a while, their faint Expectation of being able to withſtand ſo many Misfortunes. As the Neceſſity of their Affairs had formerly obliged them to ſend for the Saxons to defend them againſt the Scots, a no leſs preſſing Occaſion compelled them at this time, to implore the Aſſiſtance of the Scots againſt the Saxons. This Reſolution being unanimouſly taken, Ambaſſadors were ſent to Aidan King of Scotland, to engage him in their Quarrel. "They "repreſented to him, that their Ruin would infallibly draw "on his; for the Saxons had in view no leſs than the Con- "queſt of the whole Iſland, great part whereof was now in "their poſſeſſion: That if theſe Foreigners ſhould at length "over-run what remained in the Hands of the Britons, the "Scots were to expect no better Quarter than the Picts, who "were already diſpoſſeſſed of part of their Country." To this they added, "That the Saxon Monarch was an active "and ambitious Prince, capable of forming Deſigns, the "Conſequences whereof were to be equally dreaded by all "his Neighbours, if care were not taken in time to put a "ſtop to his Progreſs." Aidan, prevailed upon by theſe Conſiderations, puts himſelf at the head of a powerful Army, and joins the Britons, in order to attack the common Enemy. Ceaulin having notice of his March, made all poſſible Speed to meet him, with what Troops he could aſſemble. But as the neighbouring Kings, his Countrymen, were not very forward to lend him Aſſiſtance, his Forces were far from being equal to thoſe of the Britons and Scots. How great ſoever the Superiority of his Enemies might be, he courageouſly attacks them: But, after long diſputing the Victory, his Army, overpower'd by Numbers, is cut in pieces, his Son Cuthwin ſlain, and himſelf narrowly eſcapes. The Britons were ſo elevated with their Succeſs, that they began now to form

Projects to drive the Saxons entirely out of the Iſland; but they were far from being able to put them in practice. The Saxon Princes, though well enough pleaſed to ſee Ceaulin humbled, thought it not for their Intereſt to let the Britons and Scots enjoy the Advantage they had gain'd by their Victory; and therefore ſoon put their Monarch at the head of a much more numerous Army than the former. Upon which impatient to be revenged, he goes in queſt of his Enemies, and meets them without delay. In a ſecond Battle, he repaired, by a ſignal Victory, his former Diſgrace, and convinced the Britons of the Vanity of their Projects. Aidan retiring into Scotland after his Defeat (4), the Britons, who ſaw all their meaſures broken, thought only of preſerving what they had left, content with dividing their Country with the Saxons, ſince they were unable to expel them. But Divine Juſtice that had long purſued them, was not yet ſatisfied. They were ſtill to be reduced to greater Diſtreſs, and behold the beſt and richeſt part of their Iſland taken from them by a Nation whom God had choſen for the Inſtrument of his Vengeance.

584. The Arrival of Crida, Huntingd. Fl. Wig.

Scarce were the unfortunate Britons recovered from their late Conſternation, when a great Fleet appearing on their Coaſts, quite ſunk their Courage. This Fleet, the moſt conſiderable of any that had come from Germany, brought great Numbers of Angles, conducted by Crida a Leader of the ſame Nation, of the Race of Woden. I have not been able to learn where they landed, but probably it was in Eaſt-Anglia, and having marched croſs that Kingdom, they advanced towards the middle of the Iſland, upon the Territories of the Britons, who were unable to oppoſe their Arms. As Crida advanced in their Country, Diſorder and Conſternation increaſed among the miſerable Britons. Some vainly projected to defend themſelves, whilſt others ſought only to ſave their Goods, their Wives and Children, abandoning their Lands to the Angles. Crida taking advantage of their Terror, ſpread himſelf far and wide, and becoming Maſter of the Field, drove his frighted Enemies before him. In vain did they fly to their wall'd Towns; the want of Proviſions for ſuch Multitudes, ſoon compelled them to ſurrender at Diſcretion.

who makes great Conqueſts.

The Britons retire into Wales.

The Britons being unable to defend themſelves againſt theſe new Invaders, ſupported by their Countrymen already ſettled in the Iſland, took the only courſe left them, and retired into Cambria beyond the Severn. They had no other Retreat, being preſſed on all other Sides by the Saxons and Angles. Their Flight put Crida in poſſeſſion of all the Country lying between the Humber, the Severn, and Thames, by which he was bounded on the North, Weſt, and South. To the Eaſt of him lay the Kingdoms of Eſſex and Eaſt-Anglia.

The founding of the Kingdom of Mercia.

Out of all theſe Conqueſts, Crida formed a Kingdom larger and more conſiderable than any of the other ſix, by the Name of the Kingdom of the middle-Angles. This Kingdom was afterwards more generally called Mercia. Crida the firſt King was crowned in 584.

The State of the Britons.

Cambria not being ſufficient to contain ſo many Families, Multitudes of miſerable Britons fled into Armorica, where great Numbers of their Countrymen were already ſettled. Others ſubmitted to the Saxons or Angles, content to become Hewers of Wood and Drawers of Water for a wretched Subſiſtence. Thoſe that remained in Cambria, a Country defended by Nature, kept their ground againſt all the Power of the Conquerors, who could not, till long after, extend their Conqueſts beyond the Mountains. This little corner of the Iſland, where the Britons were cooped up, was afterward divided into ſeveral petty Kingdoms, which were one while ſeparated, another while united, according to the Ambition or Power of their Kings (5). Here I ſhall leave the Britons for the future, as making a State by themſelves, and having no relation to the Hiſtory of England, but what is commonly found between two neighbouring Nations. It is true they made from time to time ſeveral Attempts to recover what they had loſt: But their Efforts proved ineffectual, as did the Endeavours of the Anglo-Saxons to force them in theſe Retreats.

The Saxons change the Name of Cambria into Wales.

The Saxons gave the Britons the Name of Gwalliſh, or Walliſh, that is, Gauls; taking them to be, as in all appearance they were, of Gauliſh Extraction. For this reaſon Cambria was by them termed Walliſh-Land; from whence came the Name of Wales, us'd by the Engliſh at this day, and chang'd by the French into Galles, upon account of their being deriv'd from the Gauls. The Walloons alſo, and Wallachians, have ſtill kept theſe Names, and in ſome Places in Germany, the Italian Tongue is called Welſh, becauſe of Gallia Ciſalpina

Anno 587, Ceaulin and Cutha defeated the three Britiſh Kings, Commail, Condidan, and Farinmail at Deerham in Gloceſterſhire, and took from them Gloceſter, Cirenceſter and Bath. Again, Anno 584, there was another Battle between the Britons and Saxons at Fethanleagh (Fretherne in Gloceſterſhire) wherein Cutha was ſlain; but however the Saxons got the Victory. Camd, p. 291, 238. inhabited by the Gauls. As for the Name of Cambria given by the native Britons to Wales, I ſuppoſe, that before the Arrival of the Saxons, the Britons, who called themſelves Cumri or Cumbri, named their Country Cambria; and that after their Retreat beyond the Severn, the ſame Name which before was common to all Britain, became peculiar to Wales.

and of Britain into England. Jo. Saliſb. in Polychr. l. 5. c. 17.

About the ſame time, the Anglo-Saxons unanimouſly agreed to call the ſeven Kingdoms in general by the Name of England, that is, the Country of the Angles. Whether this was done becauſe the Angles were more numerous than the Saxons and Jutes, and poſſeſſed the largeſt and moſt conſiderable of the ſeven Kingdoms, or for ſome other reaſon, is uncertain. Perhaps Engle-land is only a Contraction of Engle-Saxe-land, a name derived from the two principal Nations that were ſettled in Great-Britain. But the Picts, Scots, and Iriſh, were not fond of this change of Names. They continued to call the new Poſſeſſors of Britain, Saxenag or Saxons, and their Country Saxeneage. I ſuppoſe, as the Saxons were firſt known in Britain, the neighbouring Nations, accuſtom'd to that Name, did not think fit to receive the Alteration introduced by the Conquerors.

I am very ſenſible that the Changing of the Name of Britain into that of England is generally aſcribed to Egbert King of Weſſex, about two hundred and fifty Years after the time I am ſpeaking of. But this Opinion is founded on the Authority of an Hiſtorian that is far from being infallible (1). Others, who ſeem to go on much better Grounds, poſitively affirm, the Name of England was given to that Part of Britain conquered by the Saxons, a little after their Arrival in the Iſland; which may very well be underſtood of the Time immediately following the Arrival and Conqueſts of Cerdic. But how is it poſſible to extend this little after to the Reign of Egbert, which began not till the Year 800 (2)?

Succeſſion of the Kings of Bernicia. G. Malmſb. l. 1. c. 3.

After the Death of Ida, and the Diviſion of Northumberland before-mentioned, Alla reigned in Deira, and Adda, eldeſt Son of Ida, in Bernicia; who dying in 563, four Kings, all Sons or Brothers of Ida, ſucceſſively filled the Throne of Bernicia till the Year 586, when Athelric, Ida's youngeſt Brother, was placed thereon. But as he was very old, Adelfrid his Son held the Reins of the Government by his Father's Authority.

Sledda King of Eſſex.

In the Year 587, Ercenwin, firſt King of Eſſex, died, after a Reign of ſixty Years, and was ſucceeded by his Son Sledda.

Thus we have run through, in this Second Book, the moſt remarkable Events that happened in Great-Britain, from the Arrival of the Saxons to their Eſtabliſhment in the Iſland, during a War of 130 Years. We have ſeen the Efforts of the Britons, who, after a reſolute Defence, were forced at laſt to give up their Country to the very People they had called to their Aſſiſtance. In the following Book, we ſhall ſee what paſſed in the Heptarchy, the Name given to the Seven Kingdoms of the Anglo-Saxons, when conſidered as making but one Body under the ſame Government. The Saxons, Jutes, and Angles, that conquered the beſt part of Britain, looking upon themſelves as one and the ſame People, as they had been in Germany, eſtabliſhed a Form of Government, as like as poſſible to what they had lived under in their own Country. They formed their Wittena-Gemot, or Aſſembly of Wiſe-men, to ſettle the common Affairs of the Seven Kingdoms, and conferred the Command of their Armies upon one choſen out of the Seven Kings, to whom, for that reaſon, no doubt, ſome have given the Title of Monarch, on pretence of his having the Precedence and ſome Superiority over the reſt. But to me that Dignity ſeems rather to have been like that of Stadtholder of the United Provinces of the Low Countries. There was however ſome Difference between the Saxon Government in Britain, and that in Germany. For Inſtance, in Germany the Governor of each Province entirely depended on the General Aſſembly, where the ſupreme Power was lodg'd; whereas in Britain, each King was Sovereign in his own Dominions. But notwithſtanding this, all the Kingdoms together were, in ſome reſpects, conſider'd as the ſame State, and every one ſubmitted to the Reſolutions of the General Aſſembly of the Seven Kingdoms, to which he gave his Conſent by himſelf or Repreſentative. And therefore this Form of Government may be very juſtly compar'd to that of the United Provinces, each whereof is Sovereign and Independent, tho' they ſubmit to the Determination of the States-General. A Free Election, and ſometimes Force, gave the Heptarchy a Chief or Monarch, whoſe Authority was more or leſs, according to their Strength. For tho' the Perſon inveſted with this Office, had no Right to an unlimited Authority, there was ſcarce one of theſe Monarchs, as will be ſeen hereafter, but what aſpir'd to an abſolute Power.

Cauſes of the Revolution that happened in Great-Britain.

If we enquire into the Cauſes of the Revolution that happen'd in Great-Britain by the Conqueſts of the Saxons, it muſt be own'd, in the firſt Place, that God was pleas'd by a juſt Judgment to puniſh the Britons for their enormous Crimes, from which, according to their own Hiſtorians, neither People, nor Kings, nor Clergy were free. Tho' the Divine Juſtice does not always puniſh, in a viſible manner, every Nation guilty of the like Crimes, yet we muſt perceive the Hand of God, when it manifeſts itſelf upon a particular Nation, by ſuch terrible Effects. But as the Divine Juſtice generally makes uſe of natural Means to execute its Deſigns, it is theſe chiefly we may and ought to look after. And firſt, it is plain, that the Diſſention of the Britons was the principal Cauſe of their Deſtruction. Had they been more united, they would have better defended themſelves againſt the firſt Saxons, and thereby, no doubt, diſcourag'd others from attempting to ſettle in their Iſland. In the next Place, their long Subjection to the Romans had enervated their Courage, and extinguiſh'd their natural Inclination for War. Laſtly, they long wanted a General capable of conducting them and making them ſenſible they were no leſs Brave than other Nations. For how different a People did they ſeem to be under the Conduct of Ambroſius and the Great Arthur, from what they were when unable to defend themſelves againſt the Picts and Scots? So great an Influence has the Good or Bad Qualities of Princes upon the Publick Affairs, and the very Manners of their Subjects, as is evident from the Hiſtories of all Nations. We ſhall find in the Sequel, that the Civil Wars of the Anglo-Saxons were no leſs fatal to them, than Inteſtine Diviſions had been to the Britons. They gave occaſion to the Strong to oppreſs the Weak, and at length made way for One to ſubdue All the reſt.

THE

THE STATE of the BRITISH CHURCH, FROM The Arrival of the SAXONS, to the Retreat of the BRITONS into Wales.

The Hiſtory of the Britiſh Church little known.

AFTER having ſeen what Calamities Britain was expos'd to by the Saxon Wars of 130 Years, a regular Account of the Britiſh Church is not to be expected during that Space. It is eaſy to perceive that the Eccleſiaſtics, who were then the only Writers, were otherwiſe employ'd than in penning Hiſtories. And tho' ſome might have found Leiſure, it would have been difficult for their Writings to deſcend to us. We muſt therefore be ſatisfied with a few traditional Events, without Order or Connexion, ſince there is no exact Hiſtory of the Affairs of the Britiſh Church, whilſt ſhe was thus grievouſly afflicted.

Several Schools erected. Bede, l. 1. c. 17--21.

Before the Arrival of the Saxons, Germanus, Biſhop of Auxerre, came twice into Britain, as we have ſaid, to extirpate the Pelagian Hereſy, that had taken deep Root. This Prelate perceiv'd, in theſe his two Voyages, that the Clergy were no leſs ignorant than corrupted, and that their Corruption was chiefly owing to their Ignorance. To apply ſome Remedy to this Evil, he believ'd the moſt beneficial Thing he could do for Britain would be to erect Schools for the Inſtruction of Youth, and particularly for thoſe that were deſign'd for the Service of the Church. Purſuant to this pious Reſolution, he founded ſeveral, among which, thoſe of Dubricius and Iltutus were the moſt famous. Dubricius, Biſhop of Llandaff, was made Archbiſhop of Caerleon, and Metropolitan of all Cambria. He had two Schools, where he taught himſelf, one at Henſland, and another at Mockroſt. Iltutus taught at Llan-twit, that is, The Church of Iltutus. There was alſo at Bangor in Cambria a famous Monaſtery where Youth were educated. It is not to be doubted that theſe Schools of Germanus were of great Benefit to Britain ſince they afterwards produced many illuſtrious Men, that govern'd the Britiſh Churches in the moſt perilous Times. Amongſt the Advantages the Britons receiv'd from the Preſence of Germanus, ſome reckon alſo the Change he made in the Publick Service of the Church, by introducing the Gauliſh Rites and Ceremonies. This is almoſt all we know concerning the Britiſh Church, during the Time the Saxons were employ'd in their Conqueſts. I can only add a few Particulars relating to ſome Eccleſiaſtics famous for their Sanctity, who flouriſh'd then in the Iſland; with which I ſhall cloſe my Account of the Church of Britain, till the Converſion of the Saxons give me occaſion to ſpeak of the Church of England.

St. Patrick.

Patrick was one of the moſt remarkable for the Converſion of the Iriſh, which is generally aſcrib'd to him, tho' Anatolius and Palladius preach'd in Ireland before him. In all Probability Patrick made the greateſt Progreſs, and therefore the Iriſh did, and ſtill do, reverence him as their Apoſtle and Protector. It is proper to obſerve, that there were three noted Men of this Name: Patrick the Elder, who died in 449, and is mention'd in the Chronicle of Glaſſenbury Church: Patrick the Great, the Converter of the Iriſh, who died in 493, having govern'd the Church of Ireland 60 Years: Patrick the Younger, his Nephew, who ſurviv'd his Uncle ſome Years.

Dubricius.

Dubricius, Biſhop, or rather Archbiſhop of Caerleon, was illuſtrious for his Piety, Learning, and the abovemention'd Schools; and laſtly for his Synod at Brêvi in Cardiganſhire, againſt the Pelagians (1).

St. David.

David, Son of a Britiſh Prince, and Succeſſor of Dubricius, remov'd the Archiepiſcopal Seat from Caerleon to Menevia, from him call'd St. Davids. He was noted for his auſtere Life, and his Synod at Vittoria. where the Canons of Brêvi were confirm'd. Several Miracles are attributed to him, particularly his giving to the Bath-Waters the Virtues they ſtill retain. He is ſaid to have lived 146 Years.

Sampſon Elder and Younger.

Sampſon the Elder and Sampſon the Younger. The firſt being Biſhop of Dol in Armorica, was ſent for into Britain by Ambroſius, and made Archbiſhop of York. The ſecond, of Royal Race, was made an Archbiſhop, without any particular See aſſigned him, with Power to perform the Archiepiſcopal Functions where-ever he came. The Saxon Wars forced him to return Home, where he was made Archbiſhop of Dol. He is ſaid, when he left Great-Britain, to carry with him ſeveral Memoirs, that would have given us a more perfect Knowledge of the Affairs of the Britiſh Church, had they been carefully preſerv'd.

Cadoc.

Cadoc, Abbot of Lancarvan, ſpent his whole Income, which was very conſiderable, in maintaining 300 Prieſts. He lived to the Year 570.

Patern.

Patern, of a noble Family in Armorica, having ſtudied 20 Years in Ireland, came and ſettled in Cambria, where he uſefully employ'd his Time in promoting Peace among the ſeveral Princes. He generally reſided at Cardigan, where is ſtill to be ſeen Llan-Badarn-vawr, that is, The Church of of Great St. Patern, which for ſome time was a Biſhop's Seat. Patern died in his native Country, where he was ſo diſtinguiſh'd for Holineſs of Life, that no leſs than three Feſtival-days were dedicated to his Memory.

Petroc.

Petroc, a Native of Cornwal, was famous for his Piety, and gave Name to Petroc-ſtow or Padſtow in the ſame County (2).

Kentigern.

Kentigern, Son to a Princeſs of the Picts, was Abbot of Glaſcow, from whence he went into Cambria, and founding a Religious Society, return'd to his Monaſtery (3). His Auſterities are mightily extoll'd, and particularly his ſtrict Abſtinence from Fleſh.

Aſaph.

Aſaph, the Diſciple of Kentigern, wrote his Maſter's Life, by whom he was made Abbot of the Monaſtery, founded in Cambria; he lived to the Year 590, and left his Name to the City of St. Aſaph.

Columba.

Columba, nobly deſcended in Ireland, founded there a Monaſtery, call'd Dearmach, that is, The Field of Oaks, becauſe ſituated in a Foreſt, ſome time after he came into Britain, to preach the Goſpel in the Highland-Picts, of which they were yet ignorant. God was pleas'd ſo to bleſs his Labours, that he had the Satisfaction to ſee thoſe Savages converted to the Chriſtian Religion, with their King Bridius, who gave him the little Iſland of Jona or Hy, call'd ſince Colchil, where he founded another Monaſtery that afterwards became very famous (4). Theſe two Monaſteries for a long Time ſupplied the Scotch Churches both in Ireland and Great-Britain, with Biſhops and Prieſts. It is obſervable, that according to the Inſtitution of Columba, the Abbot of Jona retain'd a Juriſdiction not only over ſeveral Monaſteries which branch'd forth from that, but alſo over the Monks that went from thence to be Prieſts or Biſhops. Bede's reaſon for this, is, becauſe Columba the Founder was himſelf but a Prieſt. It might be added, that the Monks who had vowed Obedience to the Abbot of Jona, when they came to be Biſhops, did not think the Epiſcopal Character freed them from their Vow. This Inſtance ſomewhat perplexes the Sticklers for the Eccleſiaſtical Hierarchy, who endeavour to get off, by alledging it was an ill Cuſtom crept into that Country, againſt the general Practice of the Church throughout Chriſtendom (5).

Gildas.

Gildas of Badon, or Bath, was Scholar to Iltutus, and a Monk of Bangor Monaſtery. He was born in the Year of the Battle of Badon, according to Uſher, in 520, but according

"This Iſland was given by the "Picts to the Scotiſh Monks, becauſe they had received Chriſtianity through their Preaching, about A. D. 505. The Monarchy here, was for a "long time the Chief of almoſt all thoſe of the Northern Scots, and all thoſe of the Picts, and had the Direction of their People. (Bede, l. 3. c. 3, 4.) There were in it two Monaſteries, one of Monks, dedicated to St. Columba the Apoſtle of the Picts, (from whom this Iſland was called Columb-cylle) that was the See of the Biſhop of the Iſles; and the other of Nuns. (Camd. p. 1071. Buchan. l. 1.) This Iſland is famous for the Burial of the ancient Kings of Scotland, forty-four of whom are ſaid to have been buried there. (Buchan. ibid.) This Account ſeems more authentick than that given by Hector Boetius. According to him this Monaſtery was founded A. D. 379. when Maximus, or Maximin, having baniſhed the Scots out of Britain,——Exulabant Chriſti ſacerdotes ac Monachi, quicunque Scotici erant nominis, quorum magna pars in Hebrides delata, in Jona inſula ſacrum conſtituêre Cœnobium, &c.

The Saxon Chronicle is more expreſs, and ſays. "There muſt be always in Hy an Abbot, "and

From him chiefly it is, that we know what paſſed among the Britons about the Time he wrote, in 564. There is another Hiſtory, or rather Romance, under the Name of Gildas, who is by ſome call'd Albanian, and ſuppos'd to be different from him I am ſpeaking of. But the learned Stillingfleet aſſerts, they are Both the Works of one Author, and that there was no other Gildas but he of Badon.

Columbanus.

Columbanus, an Iriſhman, Diſciple of Congal, Abbot of Bangor in Ireland, paſs'd great Part of his Life in Britain (1). From thence going into Burgundy, he founded the Abbey of Luxeuil, of which he was the firſt Abbot. Twenty Years after, Thierri, King of Auſtraſia, and alſo of Burgundy, baniſh'd him his Dominions, for too freely cenſuring his Conduct, and forced him to fly to Agilulph King of the Lombards. At length he founded near Naples the Monaſtery of Cobio, where he died (2).

Fechet. Antiq. Gaul.

Theſe were the moſt noted Eccleſiaſtics in the Britiſh Church, from the Arrival of the Saxons to the Retreat of the Britains into Cambria. It is obvious we have the Names only of thoſe that flouriſh'd in Cambria, Ireland, or Scotland. As for the other Parts of Britain, we know nothing of what paſs'd, with reſpect to Church-Affairs. We have not ſo much as the Names of the Biſhops, except Theon and Thadiock, Archbiſhops of London and York, who were forced alſo in the end to fly into Cambria. It is very likely, all the Monuments of the Britiſh Churches were deſtroy'd, where-ever the Saxons became Maſters; and that it was not poſſible to preſerve any but thoſe of the Churches of Wales, where the Saxons could never penetrate. It is eaſy to imagine, that the Church was in a very mournful State, whilſt the Saxons were exerciſing their Fury. Theſe mercileſs Idolaters, as well out of Duty as Wantonneſs, not only trampled upon every thing relating to the Chriſtian Religion, but let looſe their Rage againſt the Chriſtians themſelves. Gildas and Bede have painted out their inhuman Proceedings in ſuch a manner, as ſhows, their Barbarities were carried to the higheſt Degree imaginable. From the Eaſt to the Weſt, ſays Gildas, nothing was to be ſeen but Churches burnt and deſtroy'd to their very Foundations. The Inhabitants were extirpated by the Sword, and buried under the Ruins of their own Houſes. The Altars were daily profan'd by the Blood of thoſe ſlain thereon. Bede, who was a Saxon, and therefore not to be ſuppos'd to aggravate the Cruelties of his Countrymen, expreſſes himſelf thus: By the Hands of the Saxons a Fire was lighted up in Britain, that ſerv'd to execute the juſt Vengeance of God upon the wicked Britons, as he had formerly burnt Jeruſalem by the Chaldeans. The Iſland was ſo ravaged by the Conquerors or rather by the Hand of God, making uſe of them as Inſtruments, that there ſeem'd to be a continued Flame from Sea to Sea, which burnt up the Cities, and cover'd the Surface of the whole Iſle. Publick and private Buildings fell in one common Ruin. The Prieſts were murdered on the Altars; the Biſhop with his Flock periſh'd by Fire and Sword, without any Diſtinction, no one daring to give their ſcatter'd Bodies an honourable Burial.

Gildas. §. 24.

Bede. l. 1. c. 15.

To theſe mournful Deſcriptions may be added, that the Britons, who eſcaped the Fury of their Enemies, not finding wherewithal to ſubſiſt in the Woods and Mountains, were forced at length to ſurrender to the Conquerors, deeming themſelves happy in being able to purchaſe their Lives with the Loſs of their Liberty. Some fled into foreign Parts, and thoſe whom the Love of their native Country kept at home, and the Dread of Slavery prevented from ſubmitting to the Saxons, dragg'd on a wretched Life, in miſerable Want and perpetual Fear. It is therefore no wonder that the Accounts of the Britiſh Church are ſo imperfect, ſince the Saxons uſed their utmoſt Endeavours to deſtroy all the Monuments, that might have been preſerv'd.

" and not a Biſhop, and that all the Biſhops of Scotland ought to be ſubject to him." Hence ſome have inferr'd, that Biſhops were not then thought ſo neceſſary, ſince the Abbot of Hy, without being ordain'd Biſhop, exercis'd Epiſcopal Authority over thoſe that were Biſhops. To this Uſher anſwers, " That this Authority of the Abbots of Hy, their exereiſing Juriſdiction over the Biſhops of Scotland, was a Superiority of mere Juriſdiction, and not of " Order; and cites the Annals of Ulſter to prove that a Biſhop always reſided in Hy." *De Brit. THE

THE HISTORY of ENGLAND.

BOOK III.

Concerning the moſt remarkable Events during the HEPTARCHY of the ANGLO-SAXONS, to its Diſſolution, and the Union of the Seven Kingdoms. Containing the Space of Two Hundred and Forty-Three Years.

THE Revolution caus'd by the Conqueſt of the Anglo-Saxons, introduced a new Face of Things in Great-Britain. The Country formerly inhabited by the Britons was now poſſeſs'd by Strangers. The very Names of the Towns and Provinces were changed, and the Country divided in a very different Manner from what it was by the Romans. It will therefore be requiſite, before we proceed to the Affairs of the Anglo-Saxons (which are to be the Subject of this Third Book) briefly to ſhow the State of Great-Britain after this Revolution.

The State of Great-Britain.

Great-Britain, cantled out into ſeveral Kingdoms, was ſhared among four different Nations, namely, the Britons or Welch, the Scots, the Picts, and the Anglo-Saxons. Under the Britons were compriz'd all thoſe Foreigners, Romans or others, ſettled in the Iſland ever ſince the Reign of Claudius, who being incorporated with the Natives, became one People with them. The Deſcendents of theſe Foreigners were undoubtedly very numerous, it being the conſtant Policy of the Romans to diminiſh, as far as lay in their Power, the Natives of a conquer'd Country, and to ſend thither large Colonies either of Veterans, or of People taken from their other Conqueſts. As Britain had been in their Poſſeſſion four hundred Years, very probably they had not neglected, with Regard to that Iſland, a Cuſtom they practis'd every where elſe. Before they left Britain, their Colonies were diſtinct from the Natives. But the War, carried by the Picts and Scots into the Roman Province, after Honorius had renounced his Right, and that of the Britons and Romans ſettled in the Iſland, with the Anglo-Saxons, ſo confounded them, that we don't find from thenceforward in any Hiſtory the leaſt Signs of Diſtinction between the Roman Colonies and Britiſh Natives. The Britons therefore, now retired beyond the Severn, are to be conſider'd as a People compoſed of the ancient Inhabitants of Great-Britain and the Roman Colonies. The Vandals ſettled about Cambridge, were alſo reckon'd as Britons, and involv'd in the ſame Ruin with them. After the Eſtabliſhment of the Seven Kingdoms of the Anglo-Saxons, the Britons had nothing left but Cambria, and the Weſtern Part of Danmonium. Cambria (the Name formerly of all Britain) was changed by the Saxons into Wales. As for Danmonium, it was, in all appearance, a Roman Name. The Britons call'd that Country Kernaw, from Kern, that is, in their Language, Horns, becauſe of the many Promontories that ſhoot out into the Sea like Horns. Hence doubtleſs the Saxons gave it the Name of Cornwall, that is to ſay, the Country of Kernaw, inhabited by Gauls or Britons. They ſeem'd to ſtudy to leave neither to the Inhabitants nor Countries, any Sign of the Roman Names, ſince they even ſtiled Welſh, a People the Romans had call'd Britons above four hundred Years. The Natives kept their Ground a good while in that Corner of the Iſland, as well as in Wales, till at length they were entirely ſubdu'd, as we ſhall ſee hereafter.

The North Part of Great-Britain was in Poſſeſſion of the Picts and Scots, ſeparated from the Engliſh by the Esk and Tweed, and the Mountains between theſe two Rivers. The Picts were on the Eaſt, and the Scots on the Weſt Side. The Grampian Mountains ſerv'd them for a common Boundary, from the Mouth of the Nid to the Lake of Lomond. Abernethy, now a ſmall Town in the Country of Strathern, was the Capital of the Picts, from whence the Biſhop's Seat was removed to St. Andrews. Edinburgh belong'd alſo to the Picts, and whatever the Engliſh poſſeſs'd beyond Severus's Wall was taken from the ſame Nation. The Territories of the Scots extended towards the North and Weſt, as far as the Sea that bounds the Iſland on theſe two Sides.

The Saxons, Angles, and Jutes, who are all to be conſider'd as one People, and comprehended under the Name of Engliſh, had conquer'd all the Southern Part of the Iſland, from the Channel to the Wall of Severus, and a little beyond, towards the Eaſt. This Part of Great-Britain, poſſeſs'd by theſe three Nations, was divided into Seven Kingdoms, whereof the Saxons and Jutes had four, namely, Kent, Eſſex, Suſſex, and Weſſex; the Angles alone had two, Mercia and Eaſt Anglia; but in Northumberland were mix'd with the Deſcendants of the Saxons that firſt took Poſſeſſion of the Country beyond the Humber, under Octa and Ebuſa.

The Hiſtory of theſe ſeven Kingdoms is what I am now to give a general Knowledge of. I ſay general, becauſe it is impoſſible to be very particular, by Reaſon of the Barrenneſs of the Authors that have writ on this Subject. As the greateſt Part intended only to write bare Annals, they have omitted what might contribute moſt to the compoſing a regular and coherent Hiſtory of each Kingdom, or of all together. Some, particularly intent upon the Hiſtory of one of the ſeven Kingdoms, ſcarce make any mention of what paſs'd in the reſt. Hence it is that hardly any thing is known of the Affairs of ſome of theſe Kingdoms, the Hiſtories whereof have been neglected, or, it may be, loſt by ſome Accident.

Another greater Difficulty occurs, in the Choice of a Method. If the Hiſtory of the ſeven Kingdoms be given at once, by placing the Events, that happened in each, according to the Order of Time, the Thread of the Narration muſt be continually broken, and Confuſion introduced, which will be farther increas'd by the Difficulty of remembring Names now grown barbarous. On the other hand, if the Hiſtory of each Kingdom be given apart by itſelf, it will be hardly poſſible to avoid a tedious Repetition of Facts common to two, and ſometimes three of the Kingdoms, by Reaſon of their Wars with one another. Beſides, in this Method, the Reader will loſe the Benefit of ſeeing a perpetual Synchroniſm of the Affairs of the ſeven Kingdoms, which is no little Help to the giving a diſtinct Idea of the State of England, during the Heptarchy.

After weighing the Conveniencies with the Inconveniencies of theſe two Methods, I am reſolved in ſome meaſure to follow both. To that End, I ſhall firſt make ſome Remarks on the Anglo-Saxons in general. In the next place, I ſhall give a brief Summary of the Hiſtory of each of the ſeven Kingdoms in particular. Laſtly, I ſhall repreſent, in Synchronical Tables, the principal Events which happen'd in each Kingdom, that the Hiſtory of all the Kingdoms together may be ſeen at one View. I hope by this Means to give a compleat Idea, if not of all the Affairs of the Heptarchy, at leaſt of what is moſt material.

Of the HEPTARCHY in General.

BY the Heptarchy is meant the Government of the ſeven Kingdoms of the Anglo-Saxons, conſider'd as making but one Body and one State. The Anglo-Saxons, as I ſaid before, eſtabliſh'd in England a Form of Government not unlike what they had lived under in Germany; that is, conſidering themſelves as Brethren and Countrymen, and being equally concern'd to ſupport themſelves in their Conqueſts, they conceiv'd it neceſſary to aſſiſt one another, and act in common for the good of All. To that end they judg'd it proper to appoint a General in Chief, or, if you pleaſe, a Monarch, inveſted with certain Prerogatives; the Nature and Number of which we are not fully inform'd of. Upon the Death of this General or Monarch, another was choſen by the unanimous Conſent of the ſeven Kingdoms: But there were ſometimes pretty long Interregnums, caus'd by the Wars or Diviſions between the Sovereigns, who could not meet or agree upon a Choice.

Beſides this Monarch, they had alſo, as the Center of the Heptarchical Government, an Aſſembly-General, conſiſting of the principal Members of the ſeven Kingdoms, or their Deputies. This is what was call'd the Wittenagemot, or general Parliament, where the Concerns of the whole Nation only were conſider'd. But each Kingdom had a particular Parliament, much after the manner practis'd in the United Provinces of the Low Countries. Each Kingdom was Sovereign, and yet they conſulted in common, upon the Affairs that concern'd the Heptarchy; and the Acts and Reſolutions of the Aſſembly-General were to be punctually obſerv'd ſince every King and Kingdom had aſſented thereto. Such was the Form of the Heptarchical Government, on which I ſhall no farther inſiſt, deſigning to ſpeak more fully of it in another Place.

But as Time and Circumſtances often cauſe Alteration in the beſt Conſtitutions, it happen'd that the Ambition or Reſtleſſneſs of their Kings did not ſuffer the Anglo-Saxons to remain long in that Union the Form of their Government ſuppos'd. The moſt Powerful often took Advantage of the Weakneſs of the reſt to aggrandize themſelves at their Coſt. Hence their frequent Wars with one another, which ended in the Deſtruction of ſome of the ſeven Kingdoms that were annex'd to others, and at laſt in the Union of All under the Government of a ſingle Prince. Herein chiefly conſiſts what is tranſmitted to us of the Hiſtory of the ſeven Kingdoms of the Anglo-Saxons, I mean their continual Wars from the Beginning to the End of the Heptarchy.

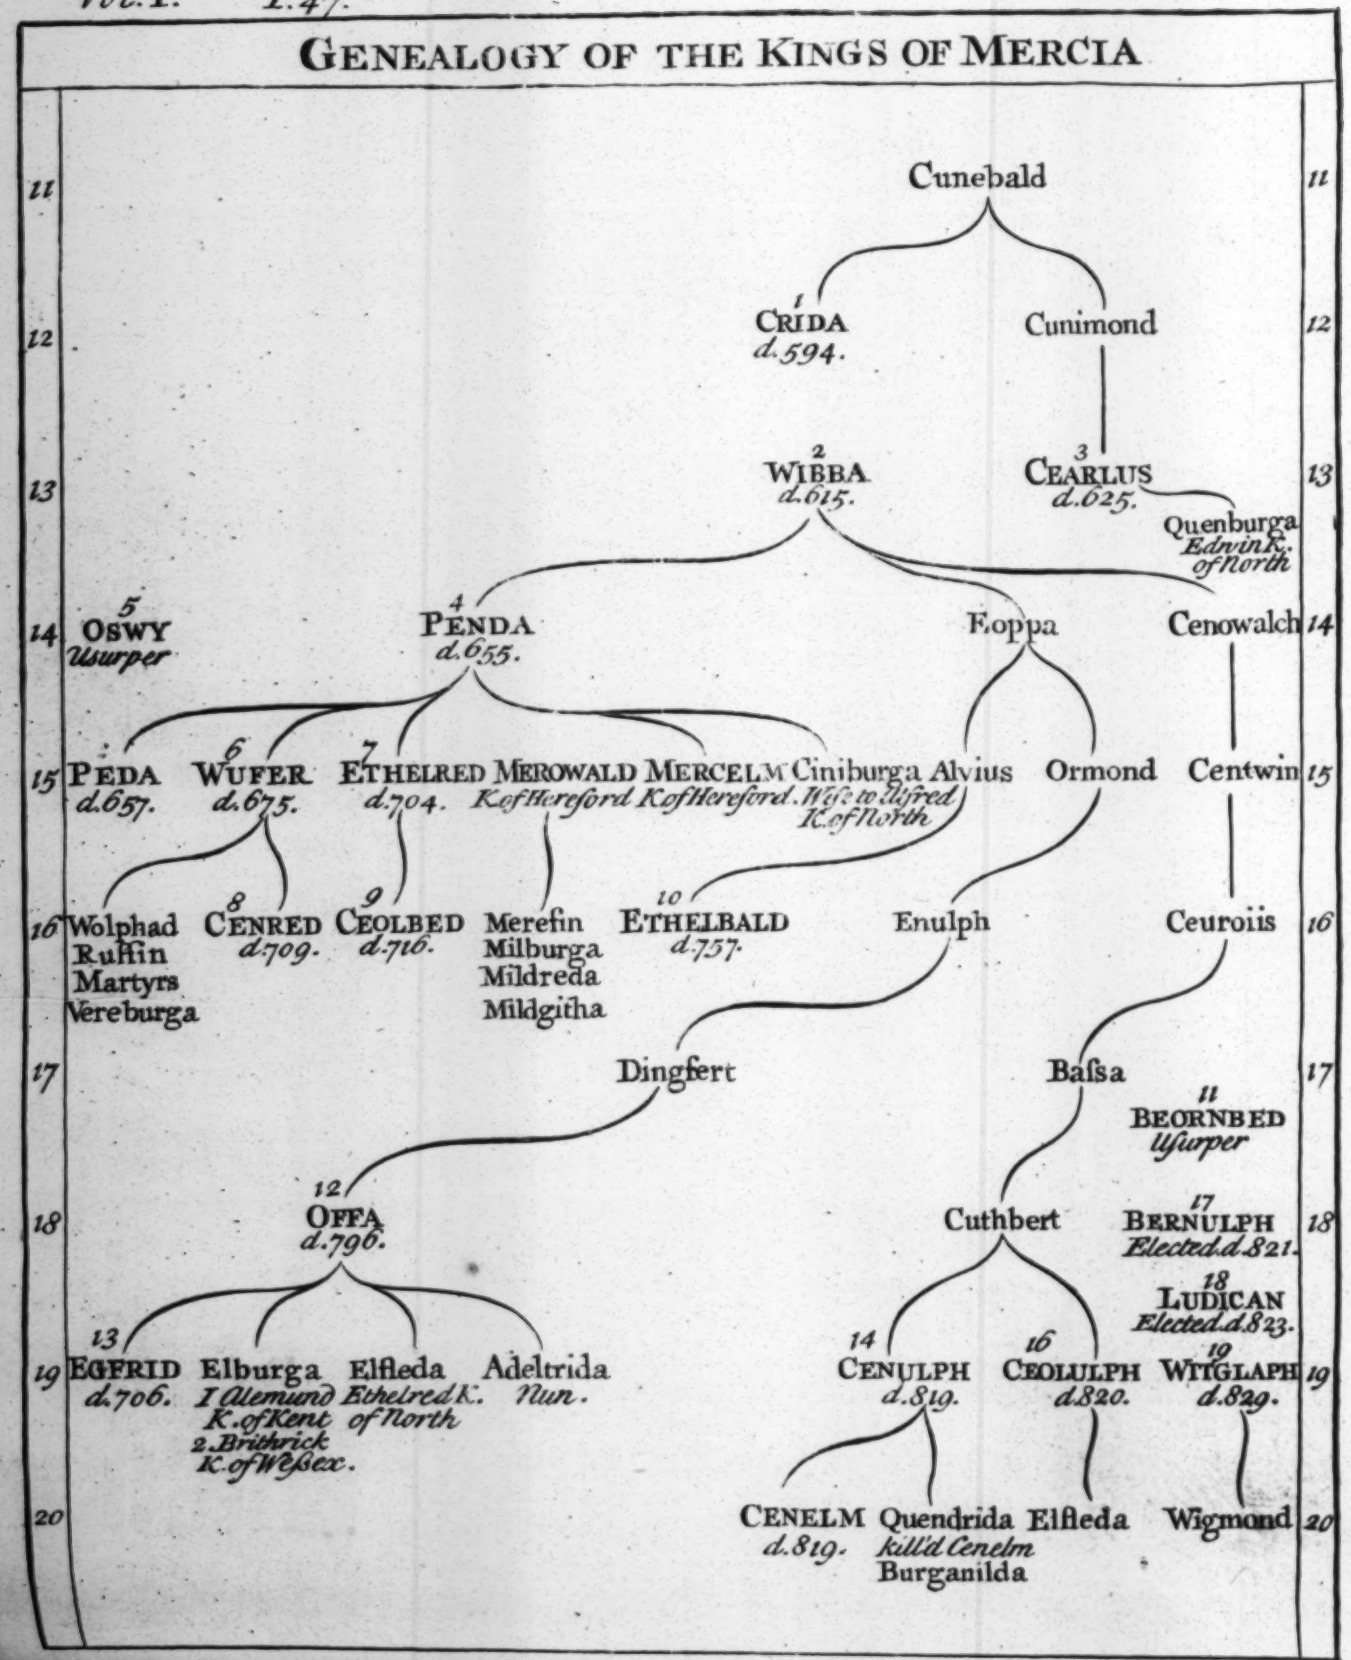
Another Cauſe of their Wars, was the Ambition of their Monarchs, who, not content with the Prerogatives annex'd to their Dignity, were for ſtretching their Rights. Had the Hiſtorians that writ of the Heptarchy been pleas'd to have given us an exact Account of the Prerogatives of the Monarch, we ſhould have been able to judge, in ſome meaſure, of the Cauſes of the Wars, ſo frequently occaſion'd by the Diſputes on that Head. But as they have only mark'd the Time and Succeſs of theſe Wars, without letting us know the Reaſons and Motives of them, the Hiſtory is render'd very imperfect, and incapable of being ſo coherent as one would wiſh, ſince the Annals give us only a bare Relation of Facts, without any manner of Connexion. All we can gather from them is, that the Anglo-Saxon Kings were naturally very reſtleſs, and Enemies to Peace. But this Character is not peculiar to them, ſince in the following Ages there has been no greater Union among the Princes of Europe.

Beſides theſe Wars, to which the Hiſtorians and Annaliſts have chiefly confined themſelves, there were, no doubt, many more agreeable and affecting Events, that would have embelliſh'd and enliven'd their Hiſtories. But unhappily theſe Writers being all Monks, had not Judgment enough to make Choice of ſuch Matters as would have render'd their Works entertaining. The Affairs of Religion, and eſpecially the Founding of the Monaſteries, and the Privileges of the Monks and Clergy, were the only Things they enlarged upon. As their ſole View was to ſhow the Origin of theſe Foundations, and the Endowments of Monaſteries; in doing this, they could not help informing Poſterity that there were in England ſeven different Kingdoms; whoſe Kings founded ſuch and ſuch Monaſteries, and granted them ſuch Revenues and Immunities. By this they were led to write a kind of Hiſtory of the Heptarchy, otherwiſe the Ground of their Rights would not have appear'd. But on the other hand, as their Deſign requir'd nothing more, they were ſatisfied with relating the Succeſſion of the Kings in the ſeveral Kingdoms, with ſome of their principal Actions. This is properly all the Aſſiſtance we have for the Hiſtory of the Heptarchy, the chief Subject whereof conſiſts of Religious Affairs. Of which therefore it will be neceſſary to ſay a few Words.

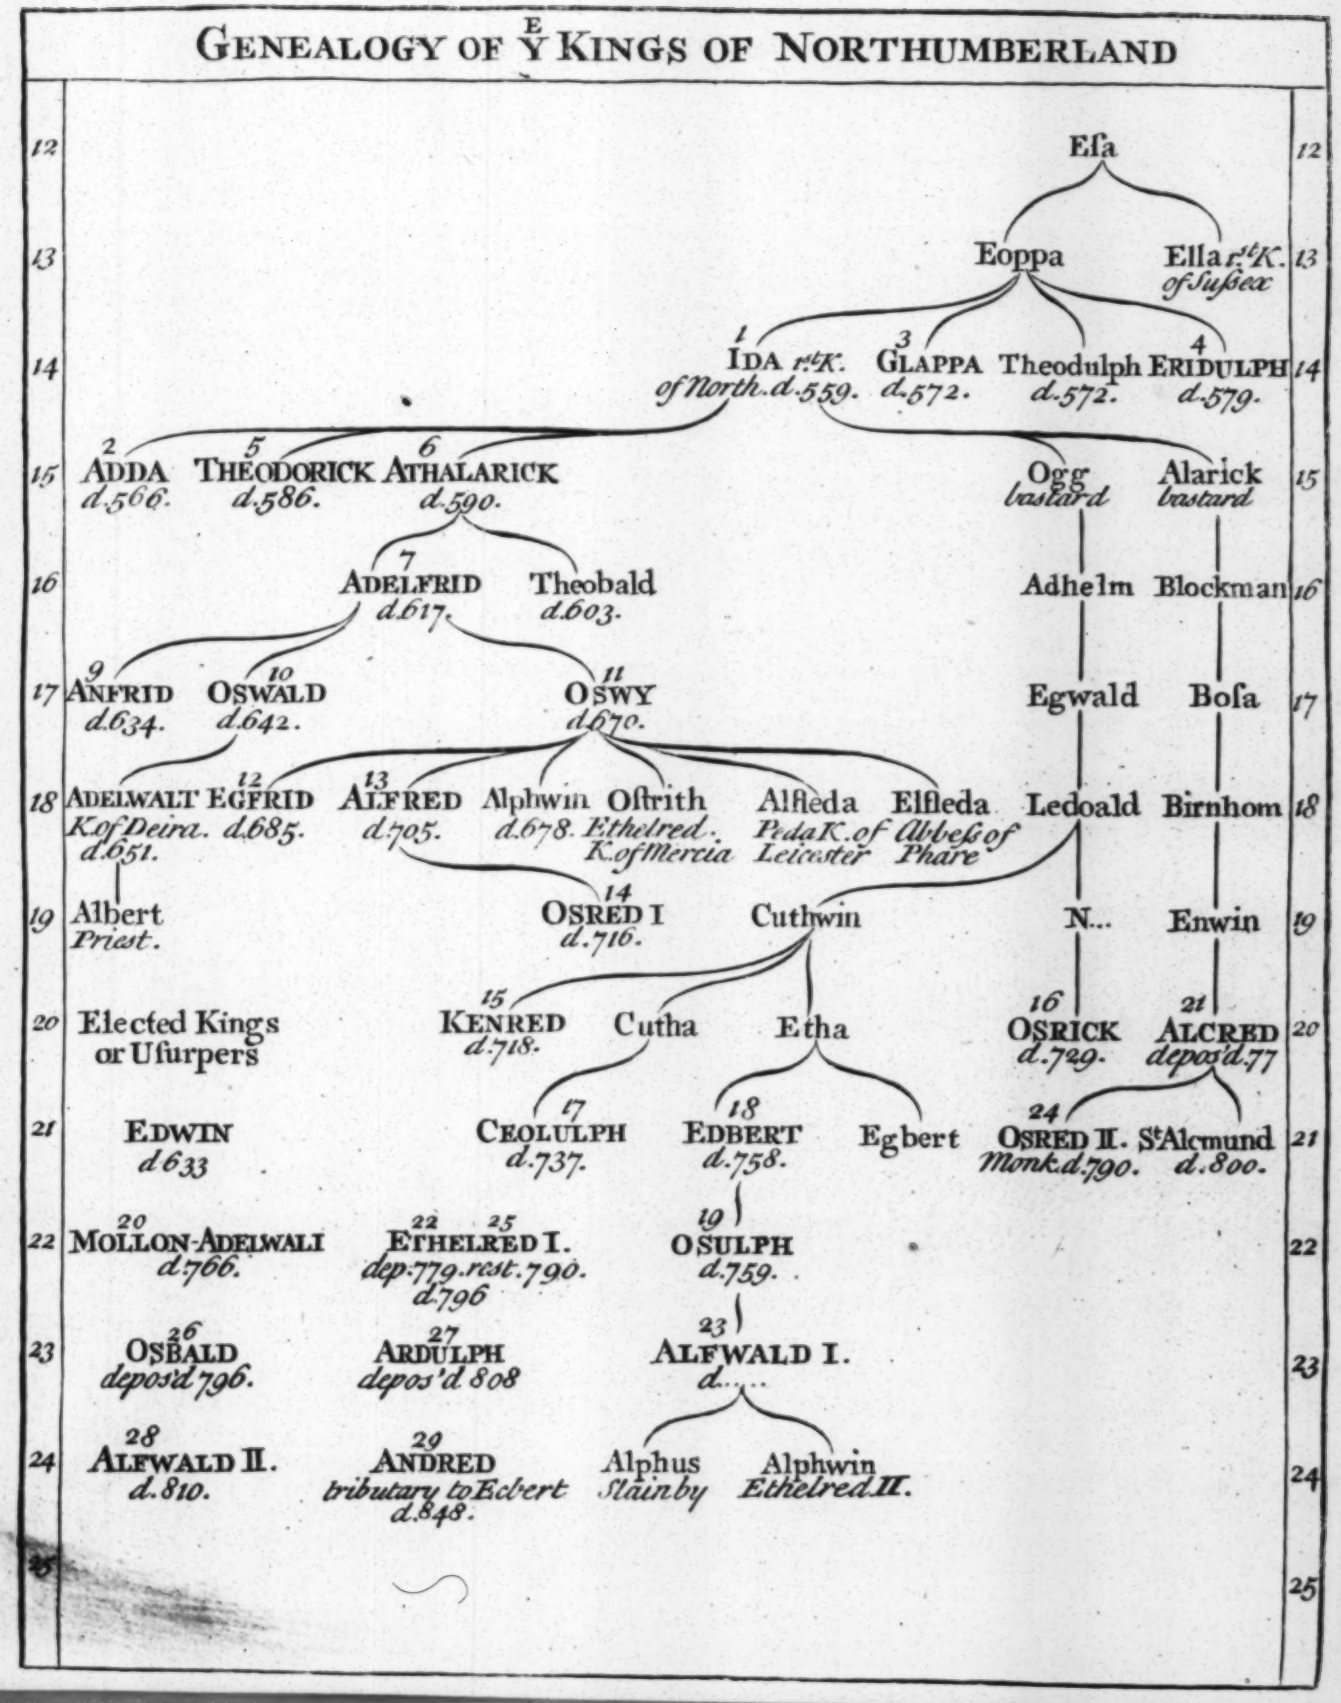
When the Saxons arriv'd in England, they were all Pagans and Idolaters. It was one Hundred and Fifty Years after their Arrival, before they were inſtructed in the Chriſtian Religion. Their Converſion began in 597, with the Kingdom of Kent, by Auſtin a Benedictine Monk, ſent by Pope Gregory I. and ended in 653 with the Kingdom of Mercia, by the Miniſtry of certain Miſſionaries from Northumberland. During theſe 56 Years ſpent in propagating the Goſpel, Revolutions happen'd in ſome of the ſeven Kingdoms, whereby Chriſtianity was ſo rooted out, that it was again to be planted, as if it had never been heard of. This was the Caſe of the Kingdom of Eſſex, Northumberland, and Eaſt-Anglia. So from the beginning of theſe Converſions to the end, there was in England a mixture of Chriſtians and Idolaters; ſome of the Kingdoms being converted, whilſt others remain'd in Paganiſm; neither were all of the ſame Kingdom converted at once.

Auſtin preach'd to the Saxons of Kent, Mellitus to the Eaſt-Saxons, Paulinus to the Northumbrians, Birinus to the Weſt-Saxons. Wilfrid to the South-Saxons, Felix to the Eaſt-Saxons, and the Northern Monks to the Mercians. But all theſe preach'd not with the ſame Succeſs, becauſe the Conjunctures were not every where alike favourable. However, in the Space of about 60 Years after the coming of Auſtin, all England was converted. But no more of this at preſent, as I intend to ſpeak more largely of the Church of each Kingdom.

GENEALOGY OF THE KINGS OF MERCIA



GENEALOGY OF YE KINGS OF NORTHUMBERLAND



I have another, and no inconſiderable Remark to make, and that is, the Monks, in converting the Anglo-Saxons, took care to inſpire them with Reverence for Monaſteries and the Monaſtick Life. They wrought ſo upon the Minds of the Kings and Great Men, that it is aſtoniſhing what Number of Monaſteries from the Converſion of the Engliſh to the Diſſolution of the Heptarchy, that is, in 200 Years, were founded in England, and what immenſe Riches the Monks had acquired in that Time. Religion ſeem'd to conſiſt in enriching the Monks, and the higheſt Perfection in embracing a Monaſtick Life. For this Cauſe Kings, and Queens, Princes and Princeſſes, ſtript themſelves of all their worldly Grandeur, to paſs the Reſidue of their Days in a Monaſtery; ſome to expiate their enormous Crimes, others as believing it the readieſt Way to Heaven. The Monks did not neglect to cheriſh the Fervour of this Sort of Devotion, extolling to the Skies thoſe that reſolv'd to offer ſuch Sacrifices to God, and Sainting all that died in theſe pious Diſpoſitions. Hence the great Number of Saints of both Sexes, recorded in the Eccleſiaſtical Hiſtory of England, among whom are ſeveral Kings, as being of all the others the beſt able to purchaſe a Saintſhip this way.

After theſe general Remarks, I proceed now to the particular Hiſtory of each of the ſeven Kingdoms, of which I ſhall relate only what is material, to avoid as much as poſſible, the Dryneſs which uſually attends ſuch kind of Summaries.

SUMMARY of the HISTORY OF NORTHUMBERLAND.

THE Kingdom of Northumberland was ſituated on the North of the Humber, as its Name imports. It was bounded on the South and parted from Mercia by that River, on the Weſt by the Iriſh Sea, on the North by the Country of the Picts and Scots, and on the Eaſt by the German Ocean. It contained the preſent Counties of Lancaſhire, Cumberland, Weſtmoreland, Northumberland, York and Durham. The principal Cities were York, Dunelm, (ſince called Durham,) Carliſle, (named by the Romans, Luguballia) Hexham or Hagulſtadt, Lancaſter, and ſome others of leſs Note. This Country was divided into two Parts, Deïra and Bernicia, each for ſome time, a diſtinct Kingdom of itſelf. Bernicia was partly ſituated on the North of Severus's Wall, and ended in a Point at the Mouth of the Tweed. Deïra contained the Southern Part of Northumberland, as far as the Humber. The greateſt Length of the whole Kingdom, including both Parts, was 160 Miles, and its greateſt Breadth 100.

IDA.

547. Sax. Ann. Ida, the firſt King, began his Reign in 547, and died in 559. After his Death Northumberland was divided into two Kingdoms, namely Bernicia and Deïra. Adda, Son of Ida, was King of Bernicia, and Alla of Deïra, but the Occaſion of this Diviſion is unknown.

Of all theſe Kings there is nothing known but the Time of their Death.

Athelric being very old when he came to the Crown, his Son Adelfrid governed the Kingdom in his Name, without the Title of King; and having eſpouſed Acca, Daughter of Alla King of Deïra, who died in 588, got poſſeſſion of that Kingdom, tho' Alla left a Son of three Years old, named Edwin.

ADELFRID.

Adelfrid (1), ſucceeding his Father in 590, became very powerful and formidable to his Neighbours, particularly to the Welſh, as well as to the Scots and Picts. But of his Wars, Hiſtorians have related only this remarkable Particular: Adelfrid preparing to lay Siege to Cheſter, then in the Hands of the Welſh, theſe laſt were bent to give him Battle; and to procure the Bleſſing of God on their Arms, twelve hundred and fifty Monks from the Monaſtery of Bangor were ordered to pray near the Field of Battle, during the Fight. The Monks making too much haſte to the Place appointed, were met by Adelfrid, who being told the Reaſon of their leaving their Monaſtery, put them all to the Sword. This Maſſacre was followed with a ſignal Victory over the Welſh; after which Adelfrid entered Wales, and entirely demoliſhed the Monaſtery of Bangor (2), where was ſtill above 1000 Monks, ſince Bede aſſures us they were divided into ſeven Claſſes, the leaſt of which conſiſted of above 300. Two of the Gates of this immenſe Edifice were above a Mile aſunder. As this was a very antient and famous Monaſtery, in all probability the Monks driven out of Britain by the Saxons had taken refuge there.

590. Ann. Sax. 613. Bede, l. 2. c. 2. Malmſb.

Whilſt Adelfrid was aggrandizing himſelf by his Conqueſts, and growing formidable to all his Neighbours, Edwin, Son of Alla King of Deïra, wandered from Place to Place, deſtitute of the neceſſary Aſſiſtance to recover his Father's Dominions. Nay, it was even difficult for him to find where to remain in Safety. Adelfrid his Enemy was ſo powerful and ſo dreaded, that not one of the Engliſh Princes cared to hazard his Dominions in Defence of a diſtreſſed Orphan. At length Redowald King of the Eaſt-Angles, pitying his Condition, afforded him a Retreat at his Court. He was then about 30 Years old, of a noble Preſence, and withal poſſeſſed of ſuch good Qualities, as gained him the Love and Eſteem of Redowald and his Queen. Scarce had he begun to enjoy the Sweets of his Retreat, when he ſaw himſelf on the brink of Deſtruction by Adelfrid's Enmity and Redowald's timorous Conduct. Adelfrid fearing the King of Eaſt-Anglia was forming ſome Project for the Reſtoration of Edwin to the Throne of Deïra, ſent Ambaſſadors to him, to deſire him to deliver up Edwin, or put him to Death; and in caſe of Refuſal, to proclaim War againſt him. Redowald, ſurpriſed at this Demand, was ſome time before he could reſolve what to do. As his Forces were not equal to the King of Northumberland's, he dreaded the expoſing his Dominions to the Ravages of that incenſed Prince, ſhou'd he afford him a Pretence for a War. On the other hand, Honour, Honeſty, the Laws of Hoſpitality, Edwin's Innocence pleaded againſt his being deliver'd to an Enemy that demanded him only to take away his Life. Redowald conſider'd likewiſe what a Diſparagement it would be to ſubmit to the Orders of one that had no Right to command him. Theſe various Reflections made him extremely uneaſy, and caus'd him to incline ſometimes to the Side of Generoſity, and ſometimes to that of political Intereſt.

Whilſt Redowald was thus in ſuſpence, Edwin, inform'd by the Queen of the King's Irreſolution, was in great perplexity. For twenty-ſeven Years he had wander'd thro' divers Kingdoms, without meeting with other Sanctuary than what the King of Eaſt-Anglia had generouſly granted him, but which now, by reaſon of the Neighbourhood of Northumberland, was like to prove fatal to him. He ſaw his Ruin unavoidable, if Redowald deliver'd him to his Enemy; but on the other hand, that Prince's Irreſolution made him hope for ſome advantagious Change in his Fortune. He conſider'd if Redowald reſolv'd to protect him, the War that wou'd infallibly attend his Refuſal, might prove a means to raiſe him to his Father's Throne. Beſides, he was not ſure of avoiding by flight the Danger that threatned him, or of finding another Retreat. He determin'd therefore to wait the Event, and truſt to the Generoſity of Redowald, who as yet, ſeem'd unreſolv'd. Redowald was naturally generous: but the fear of engaging in ſo dangerous a War, made him at laſt reſolve to ſacrifice Edwin to the Intereſt of the State. Edwin inform'd of this by the Queen, gave himſelf over for loſt; and the more, becauſe the very moment Redowald reſolv'd to make this Sacrifice to the King of Northumberland, he took all poſſible care to prevent the Victim's Eſcape.

Hitherto nothing but what is natural has been related of Edwin. But in the Days of Bede, who hath given us a large Account of this Prince's Adventures, Miracles were ſo much in vogue, that there was ſcarce any remarkable Event, in Hiſtory, but what was ſeaſon'd with ſome Prodigy or Apparition. Accordingly, that Writer, who ſeems a little too credulous in this Point, wou'd not neglect to embelliſh his Eccleſiaſtical Hiſtory with a miraculous Event told him, as he ſays, by ſome old Men of his time. Beſides, being himſelf a Saxon, and born in Northumberland, a Miracle wrought in favour of the firſt Chriſtian King of that Kingdom, cou'd not but redound to the Honour of his Country. He has related many more, which he was not ſo much concern'd in, and are no better ſupported than this on the preſent Occaſion. I would willingly have paſs'd it over in ſilence, as I have many others that occur in his Hiſtory, if I had not obſerv'd that later Hiſtorians have affected to copy it, ſo leaving the Reader to believe as he pleaſes, I ſhall continue the Hiſtory of Edwin, as related by Bede.

Edwin, after his melancholy News from the Queen, went and walk'd in the Palace-Garden during the Night, to conſider of his Affairs. Whilſt he was deeply buried in Thought, he ſaw a Man, in a very ſtrange Dreſs, coming towards him, who ask'd him, What kept him thus awake, when all the World was aſleep? The Prince anſwer'd, he was ſurpriſed to ſee a ſtranger ſo inquiſitive about the Affairs of one that was unknown to him. Think not, replied the Stranger, that I am ignorant of what employs your Thoughts: I know all that has befallen you to this Hour, and am come to bring you Conſolation in your Misfortunes. What now will you give to him that ſhall aſſure you of, one Day, mounting the Throne, and becoming the moſt powerful and glorious King that has hitherto reign'd in England? If ever that happens, anſwer'd Edwin, I will liberally reward all that ſhall have done me any ſervice, as well as the Perſon that foretells my good Fortune. He who is able and willing to raiſe you to this height of Grandeur, continued the Stranger, requires nothing of you but to embrace his Doctrine and obey his Precepts. I ſhou'd be a Wretch indeed, reply'd Edwin, ſhould I refuſe to be rul'd by ſo true a Friend. Then the Stranger laying his Hand on the Prince's Head, told him, Remember what I am now doing, and when the like ſhall happen to you, think then of performing your Promiſe without delay. Upon theſe Words, the Stranger diſappear'd in an extraordinary manner, to convince Edwin there was ſomething ſupernatural in this Adventure (1).

Huntingd. l. 3. Edwin's Surpriſe was farther increas'd by the coming of a Meſſenger from the Queen, to let him know Redowald had alter'd his Mind. She had ſo livelily repreſented to him the Horror of the Action he was about to commit, that he reſolv'd to hazard all, rather than be inſtrumental in deſtroying the Innocent. Redowald having taking this generous Reſolution, ſent back the Ambaſſadors, declaring he cou'd not think of delivering up Edwin, much leſs of putting an innocent Prince to death, that had fled for Refuge to his Palace. He did not queſtion but this Refuſal would kindle a bloody War. Adelfrid was fierce and powerful, and as he could not but be provok'd, the King of Eaſt-Anglia rightly judg'd he wou'd do his utmoſt to be reveng'd. But as uſually the Party that thinks himſelf injur'd, is apt to imagine the Injurer ſtands only upon the defenſive, Redowald believ'd Adelfrid, not expecting to be attack'd, might be eaſily ſurpriz'd before he cou'd draw his Forces together. For this reaſon, he reſolves to prevent him, and carry the War into Northumberland.

This Reſolution being taken, an Army was levied with all Expedition, and divided into three Bodies, that were to march at ſome diſtance from each other. The Command of the firſt was given to Reyner his eldeſt Son, with Orders to march before and ſecure a certain Paſs. He follow'd himſelf at the Head of the ſecond, leaving Edwin in the Rear with the third. Reyner, deſirous to ſignalize himſelf by ſome brave Action, before the Arrival of the other two Bodies, advanc'd with more ſpeed than his Orders requir'd. He hop'd to ſurprize the King of Northumberland, who did not expect to be attack'd. And indeed, Adelfrid had not yet aſſembled all his Forces; but finding Reyner too far advanc'd to be ſupported, took advantage of his Raſhneſs, and attack'd him before it was in the power of Redowald to join him. As Reyner's Conduct was entirely owing to his Exceſs of Ambition and Courage, he ſuſtain'd the Efforts of Adelfrid with great Bravery; but having too much expos'd himſelf to Danger, was ſlain, and his Army put to rout.

Redowald, extremely concern'd for the loſs of his Son, thought of nothing but Revenge. Having join'd Edwin he march'd with all Expedition to attack his Enemy, who, being now too far advanc'd, had not time to retreat. Nay, he could not think of retiring, after all his proud Threats, had it been in his power: and therefore, inſtead of retreating, he fiercely march'd towards the Eaſt-Angles. The two Armies ſoon coming to an Engagement (2) Adelfrid perform'd Wonders to preſerve his Reputation; but finding he was overpower'd by Numbers, choſe rather to die than out-live the Shame of his Defeat. With this Reſolution he threw himſelf among the thickeſt of his Enemies, and fell in the midſt of their Ranks, cover'd with Wounds. The Northumbrians immediately threw down their Arms, and betaking themſelves to flight, left their Enemies Maſters of the Field. Bede. G. Malmſb. 617. Sax. Ann.

After this great Victory, to which Edwin had not a little contributed, Redowald march'd into Northumberland without Oppoſition. Adelfrid had left three Sons, Anfrid, Oſwald, and Oſwy, who finding themſelves unable to reſiſt the Conqueror, fled into Scotland. The Northumbrians, thus abandon'd, without General or Army, and in the uſual Confuſion on ſuch Occaſions, choſe to ſubmit to Redowald. This generous Prince would neither puniſh them for the Inſolence of their King, nor make the beſt for himſelf of the advantage acquir'd by his Victory. From an uncommon greatneſs of Soul, he not only gave Edwin the Kingdom of Deïra, for which he had ſome Pretenſions, but likewiſe that of Bernicia, reſerving to himſelf only the Glory of ſo heroical an Action; for which and upon account of his late Victory, he obtain'd the Dignity of Monarch then vacant.

EDWIN.

Edwin (3), who a little before was an Object of Pity, by one of thoſe ſurpriſing Revolutions that are beyond the reach and foreſight of Man, but are ever ſubſervient to the Deſigns of Providence, ſaw himſelf on a ſudden at the Head of a powerful Kingdom. One can't help ſeeing in the Advancement of this Prince, the hand of God, diſpoſing all things, by degrees, for the Execution of his Purpoſes. It appear'd in the Sequel, that God was pleas'd to make uſe of Edwin to lead the Northumbrians to the Knowledge of the Goſpel, as he had already made uſe of Ethelbert for the Converſion of the Saxons of Kent. This is what we ſhall ſee more fully in the Hiſtory of the Church. Sax. Ann. Bede. G. Malmſb. Huntingd.

Upon the Death of Redowald, in 624, Edwin openly aſpired to the Monarchy; and indeed there was then no Saxon or Engliſh Prince able to diſpute that Honour with him, except Cinigiſil, and Quicelm, joint Kings of the Weſt-Saxons. Quicelm eſpecially oppos'd him to the utmoſt of his Power, and thereby drew upon himſelf from that Prince, then in league with the King of Mercia, a War that put him in danger of loſing his Dominions, and oblig'd him humbly to ſue for Peace. The War being thus ended, Edwin met with no farther Oppoſition, and ſaw himſelf at length inveſted with the ſo much deſir'd Dignity of Monarch. The very Welſh, to prevent an Invaſion, threatned by Edwin, conſented to pay him Tribute.

624. This Prince carried the Prerogatives of the Monarchy higher than any of his Predeceſſors. He claimed an abſolute Power over the other Kings, and treated them with little or no reſpect. He ſhowed the moſt regard for Ebald King of Kent, whoſe Siſter Ethelburga, a Princeſs of great worth, he deſigned to eſpouſe. He imagined, his being Monarch would cauſe his propoſal to be gladly received; but he met with more difficulty in his Courtſhip than he expected. Ethelburga, being a zealous Chriſtian, would not hear of marrying an idolatrous Prince, tho' otherwiſe never ſo much to her advantage. Her Brother was no leſs averſe to the match, and when propoſed to him, refuſed to give his Conſent, unleſs his Siſter had free Liberty publickly to profeſs her Religion. Though this Condition was by no means pleaſing to the Monarch, yet the deſire of poſſeſſing a Princeſs, whoſe Worth was univerſally known, induced him to agree to whatever was required. On the other hand, Ethelburga was prevailed with to conſent, in expectation that after the Example of Bertha of France, her Mother, who had procured the Converſion of the Saxons of Kent, ſhe ſhould be able likewiſe to lead her Spouſe, and his
625. Subjects, to the knowledge of the Truth. Every thing being ſettled to the King of Kent's ſatisfaction, Ethelburga ſet out for Northumberland accompanied with ſome Eccleſiaſticks, and particularly Paulinus, conſecrated Biſhop by Juſtus Archbiſhop of York. This was the ſame Paulinus that converted Edwin and the Northumbrians to the Chriſtian Religion, as will be more fully related in the Hiſtory of the Church.

Bede, l. 2. c. 9.

Edwin lived ſeveral years in profound Peace, both feared and eſteemed by all the Kings of the Heptarchy. He improved theſe favourable Junctures, not only in maintaining his Dominion over the other Kings, but alſo in eſtabliſhing good Order in the State, and enacting wholſome Laws, which he cauſed to be ſtrictly obſerved. Hiſtorians remark, that in his reign Juſtice was adminiſtred with that impartiality and rigour, that a Child might have gone over the whole Kingdom of Northumberland with a Purſe of Gold in his hand, without danger of robbing. But Edwin's chief Care, after his Converſion, was to ſpread the Chriſtian Religion where it was yet unknown, and replant it, where it had been aboliſhed. By his Inſtigation, perhaps by his abſolute Order, it was, that Erpwald King of Eaſt-Anglia, permitted the Goſpel to be preached again in his Dominions, and at length turned Chriſtian himſelf. Edwin, who could but ill brook the leaſt oppoſition to his Will, pretended to have an Authority over the reſt of the Kings, of which he was extremely jealous. By an Enſign carried before him in the form of a Globe (1), as a ſymbol of the Union of the Heptarchical Government in his Perſon, he gave them to underſtand, he would be conſidered, not only as their Head, but their Maſter.

Bede. Malmſb. Huntingd.

633. Of all the Anglo-Saxon Princes, Penda King of Mercia was the moſt uneaſy at Edwin's Greatneſs. This Prince being naturally reſtleſs and proud, and looking upon his dependence on the King of Northumberland as diſhonourable, was extremely deſirous to caſt off that Badge of Slavery. But as he did not dare to undertake alone ſo great an Enterprize, he impatiently waited for a favourable opportunity to act. At that very time, there was another Prince in the Iſland, who, being in the ſame caſe, no leſs ardently deſired to throw off the Engliſh Monarch's Yoke. This was Cadwallo King of Wales, who deemed it a diſhonour to him and his Country, to pay tribute to a foreign Prince. Theſe two Princes knowing at length each other's thoughts (2), enter into a League againſt Edwin, and make preparations, which as they could not be concealed, cauſed Edwin to reſolve to prevent them if poſſible. Accordingly he advances as far as Heathfield (3), where meeting the confederate Kings, the two Armies came to an Engagement. The Battle was fought on both ſides with deſperate fury. The Mercians and Welſh confided in their numbers, and the Northumbrians in the valour and prudence of their King. Edwin, tho' inferior in number of Troops, ſupplied that defect by his courage and conduct, and kept the balance even, which made him hope Victory would at laſt incline to his ſide. But a fatal Accident robb'd him of that preſence of Mind he had all along preſerved, and which was then more than ever neceſſary. Offrid, his eldeſt Son, bravely ſeconding him, was ſlain at his feet with an arrow, which threw him into ſuch a rage, that he ruſhed among the thickeſt of his Enemies, without minding, whether he was followed by his Soldiers. He was immediately run through in many places, and with his Life loſt the Victory. Upon Edwin's diſappearing, the diſmayed Northumbrians begin to fall into diſorder, and at laſt relinquiſh the Field of Battle, and take to flight.

633. Bede, l. 2. c. 2.

Sax. Ann.

Thus fell Edwin, in the forty-eighth year of his Age, the ſixteenth of his Reign, and the ninth of his Monarchy. By his firſt Wife, Daughter of Cearlus King of Mercia, he had two Sons, Offrid and Edfrid. By his ſecond, Ethelburga of Kent, he had two other Sons, and two Daughters, who all died in their Infancy, except Anfleda, Wife of Oſwy King of Northumberland. Edwin reſided at Derventio, now Auldby (4) in Yorkſhire.

INTERREGNUM.

The two conquering Kings behaved upon their Victory with all imaginable Cruelty. As the Northumbrians, after the Loſs of their King and Army were unable to reſiſt them, they entered Northumberland and ravaged the Country in a terrible mander. Cadwallo, though a Chriſtian, carried his Barbarity to that height, that Edfrid, Son of Edwin, dreading to fall into his Hands, ſurrendered himſelf to Penda, from whom he expected more favour. He was received at firſt with ſome Civility, but was afterwards, by Penda's Command, murdered in his Preſence. Queen Ethelburga and Paulinus fled to the King of Kent, who gave his Siſter ſome Lands to found a Monaſtery, where ſhe paſſed the reſidue of her Days. As for Paulinus, he was by the ſame King's means made Biſhop of Rocheſter.

Bede, l. 2. c. 20.

Bede. Thorn. Hiſt. Abb. Canterb. Cam. in Kent.

The Northumbrians were ſo weakened by their defeat, and the cruelty, or rather fury, of the two victorious Kings, that they remained a long time before they recovered themſelves. At length, ſeeing no end to their Misfortunes, they judged it more honourable to die with their ſwords in their Hands, than periſh by the barbarity of the two Tyrants, who breathed nothing but blood and ſlaughter. Accordingly, being reſolved to ſell their lives dear, they conſidered of chuſing a Leader. But when they came to the Election, the old jealouſies between the Bernicians and Deïrians reviving, they could not agree upon chuſing a King in common. The Men of Deïra choſe Oſric, a relation of Edwin; and the Bernicians ſet Anfrid on the Throne. This laſt, after the defeat and death of his Father, retired into Scotland with Oſwald and Oſwy, his Brothers, where they were all three Baptized.

Sax. Ann. Bede. Malmſb.

OSRIC in Deïra. — ANFRID in Bernicia.

Theſe two Kings were no ſooner on the Throne, but they abjured the Chriſtian Religion, which they had before profeſſed. But if their Rebellion againſt God was ſudden, their Puniſhment was no leſs ſo, being both ſlain in the firſt year of their reign. Oſric raſhly beſieging Cadwallo in York, with an Army of undiſciplined Troops, the Welſh King, diſdaining to be thus braved, ſallies out and attacks him ſo briſkly, that his Army is routed, and himſelf ſlain on the ſpot. After which he marched againſt the King of Bernicia, who was at the head of twelve thouſand Men, and amuſing him ſome time with propoſitions of Peace, till he was within diſtance, fell upon him unexpectedly, and made a terrible ſlaughter of the Northumbrians, Anfrid himſelf being killed in the Battle.

INTERREGNUM.

It is eaſy to conceive the wretched condition of Northumberland, after ſo many ſucceſſive Loſſes. Cadwallo's rage being inflamed by the efforts of the Northumbrians, ſeemed incapable of being glutted with leſs than the entire deſtruction of the miſerable Nation. His barbarities at length obliged Oſwald, Brother of Anfrid, to reſolve to hazard all, in order to relieve a People ſo cruelly oppreſſed. In this generous reſolution, he aſſembles a ſmall body of Forces, with which he boldly oppoſes the Uſurper. Tho' the King of Mercia was now returned to his Kingdom, Cadwallo looking upon Oſwald's Army with the utmoſt contempt, marched againſt him, not doubting of Succeſs (5). Oſwald being informed of his approach, intrenched himſelf in an advantagious Poſt, where he reſolutely expected him. But as he relied more on the aſſiſtance of Heaven than his own ſtrength, he erected a Croſs before the Camp, and falling down on his knees with the whole Army, humbly implored a Bleſſing on his Arms. In the mean time, Cadwallo advanced full of Confidence, not queſtioning in the leaſt but the Superiority of his Forces would procure him the Victory. In this Belief, to encourage his Men by his Example, he attempts in perſon to force the Enemy's Intrenchments, wholly intent upon ſatisfying his furious Rage. But whilſt he is endeavouring to open a Paſſage to join his Enemies, he is ſhot through the Body with an Arrow, which puts an End to his Projects and Life. His Death cauſes a great Diſorder among his Troops, who begin by degrees to retreat. Then the Northumbrians ruſhing out of their Reintrenchments, fall upon their Enemies ſo vigorouſly, that they are entirely routed. The Victory was ſo compleat, and the Protection of Heaven appeared ſo viſibly in Favour of the Engliſh, that the Field of Battle was named Heoſen or Heaven-Field, the ſame that is now called Haledon (1).

OSWALD.

634. Flor. Wig. M. Weſt. After this great Victory, Oſwald took Poſſeſſion of the two Kingdoms of Northumberland, to which he was Heir, namely, to Bernicia by Adelfrid his Father, and to Deïra by Acca his Mother, Siſter of Edwin. He was the moſt knowing, as well as moſt pious Prince of his Age, having been inſtructed in the Chriſtian Religion whilſt in Scotland. His ſtrict Virtue, great Humility, and Zeal for the Advancement of the true Religion, gained him, to ſuch a degree, the Love and Eſteem of his Subjects, that they reverenced him as a Saint after his Death. He had the Happineſs and Satisfaction to free his Country from the Tyranny of Cadwallo, to unite the two Kingdoms of Northumberland under his Dominion, and moreover to be elected Monarch of the Anglo-Saxons. It is even pretended that the Welſh, Scots, and Picts were tributary to him. Bede, l. 3. c. 1, 2. He took particular Care to reſtore the Chriſtian Religion in his Dominions, from whence the late Troubles after Edwin's Death had entirely baniſhed it.

This Prince ſpent ſeveral Years in this ſo pious and neceſſary a Work: but at length was obliged to leave off, in order to oppoſe the Deſigns of the King of Mercia, who was preparing to attack him. Penda, ever reſtleſs and haughty, could not bear to ſee Oſwald his Superior, as Monarch; and therefore, to free himſelf from ſo uneaſy a dependence, without any Declaration of War, he ſuddenly takes up Arms to ſurprize him. Oſwald being ſenſible, that it was of the utmoſt Conſequence ſpeedily to oppoſe the King of Mercia's Deſigns, made haſte to meet him, before he had aſſembled all his Forces. Penda taking Advantage of this Precipitation, which rendered him ſuperior to his Enemy in Number of Troops, gave him Battle, and obtained a ſignal Victory; which would have redounded more to his Glory, had he not ſullied it by his Cruelty. The Body of Oſwald, who was ſlain in the fight, being found among the dead, the inhuman Conqueror cut it in ſeveral Pieces, and fixing them on Stakes, erected them in the Field of Battle like ſo many Trophies. This Battle was frought at Bede, l. 3. c. 9. Oſweſtree (2). Oſwald left a Son called Adelwalt, ſome time after King of Deïra.

Bede, l. 3. c. 16. Penda, after his Victory, behaved with his uſual Barbarity. Having ravaged Northumberland, he laid ſiege to Bamborough, a ſtrong Town built by Ida, where meeting with more Reſiſtance than he expected, he reſolved to reduce it to Aſhes. To that End, having laid under the Walls a great Quantity of Wood, he ſet Fire to it as ſoon as the Wind favoured his Deſign. But hardly was the Fire lighted, when the Wind came about and blew the Flame directly into his Camp, by which the Beſiegers were great Sufferers. This Stratagem failing, he raiſed the Siege, and quitting Northumberland, carried the War into Eaſt Anglia. Penda's Retreat affording the Northumbrians a little Reſpite,
642. the Bernicians place Oſwy, Brother of Oſwald, upon the 644. Throne; and the next Year Oſwin, Son of Oſric, ſlain by Sax. Ann. Cadwallo, was crowned King of Deïra.

643. OSWY in Bernicia. 644. OSWIN. in Deïra.

Oſwy thought he was very unjuſtly dealt with, in being deprived of Part of his Brother's Dominions; but as he dreaded another Invaſion from Penda, it was no proper Seaſon to do himſelf Juſtice. As long therefore as he was under that Apprehenſion, he lived in a good Underſtanding with the King of Deïra. But the Moment he ſees Penda engaged in other Wars, he aſſerts his Claim to Deïra, and picks a Quarrel with Oſwin; who, after trying ſeveral Ways to ſatisfy his Enemy, is forced at laſt to take up Arms in his own Defence. Oſwin was a mild and peaceable Prince, 650. more devout than brave, and tho' drawn into the War purely by Neceſſity, yet for all that he could not conquer his G. Malm. l. 1. c. 3. Scruples. He verily believed, the ſhedding his Subjects Blood in his Quarrel, was the greateſt of Sins, and therefore withdrawing privately from his Army, he retired to a certain Earl's Houſe (3), whom he ſuppoſed to be his beſt Friend, with deſign to betake himſelf from thence to ſome Monaſtery. But before he could put his Project in execution, 651. his treacherous Friend betrayed him to Oſwy, who order- Bede, l. 3. c. 14. ed him to be inhumanly murdered, in expectation of ſeiz- Sax. Ann. Huntingd. ing his Kingdom with the greater eaſe. This barbarous Action did not however procure him the Advantage he hoped for. The People of Deïra exaſperated againſt him, and dreading to fall under the Dominion of ſo cruel a Prince, immediately ſet Adelwalt, Son of Oſwald his Brother, upon the Throne, who was better able to defend himſelf than his Predeceſſor. Some Time after, Oſwy, touched with Remorſe, founded a Monaſtery in the very Place where Oſwin was murdered (4), flattering himſelf he ſhould atone for his Crime by this ſlight Penance.

OSWY ſtill in Bernicia. 652. ADELWALT in Deïra.

It was hardly poſſible for Oſwy and Adelwalt, tho' very near Relations, to live in a good Underſtanding. Oſwy ſtill preſerved his Claim to the Kingdom of Deïra, and Adelwalt could not be ignorant of it. Conſequently it was his Intereſt, not only to ſuſpect his Uncle's Deſigns, but even to put it out of his Power, if poſſible, from giving him any Diſturbance. For this Reaſon, he readily liſtened to the Propoſal of a League with the Kings of Mercia and Eaſt-Anglia, againſt Oſwy. Penda, tho' ſeventy-eight Years old, was the Author of this League. Oſwy being informed of it, did all that lay in his Power to divert the impending Storm, even to the offering Money to Penda, to bribe him to deſiſt from his Enterprize. But nothing could appeaſe that Prince, the irreconcileable Enemy of the Northumbrians, who ſeeing himſelf ſupported by the Armies of Eaſt-Anglia and Deïra, believed, he had now a favourable Opportunity to gratify his Paſſion. Oſwy therefore found, 655. he was obliged to ſtand alone againſt theſe three Enemies, G. Malm. whoſe united Forces could not but inſpire him with ſome l. 1. c. 4. Dread. In this preſſing Neceſſity, he made a Vow to found a dozen Monaſteries, and make his Daughter a Nun, if God would give him the Victory. To this Vow it is that Hiſtorians aſcribe the Succeſs, God was pleaſed to vouchſafe him in this War.

Whilſt the two Armies were advancing towards one another, Adelwalt formed new Projects. He conſidered, to which Side ſoever the Victory inclined, it would prove equally dangerous to him, ſince he had the ſame Reaſon to fear his being deprived of his Dominions by Penda as by Oſwy: And therefore he reſolved to ſave his own Troops, and ſtand neuter during the Battle, that he might be in Condition to defend himſelf againſt the Conqueror. When the two Armies came in ſight, Penda, who had not dived into Adelwalt's Deſign, boldly attacked the King of Bernicia, not doubting of being ſeconded by the Deïrians and Eaſt-Anglians. But when the Mercians ſaw Adelwalt draw off his Troops, their Ardor abated, and thinking they were betrayed, began to give ground. Mean while, the Kings of Mercia and Eaſt-Anglia did their utmoſt to revive the Courage of the frighted Troops. But being both ſlain in endeavouring to renew the Fight, their Army was put to rout. Bede, l. 3. This Battle was fought in Yorkſhire on the Banks of the Are, c. 24. and the Place was afterwards called Winwidfield (5).

After this Victory, Oſwy without loſs of Time, marched into Mercia, and became Maſter of that Kingdom, which he enjoyed but three Years. In that Interval, the Monarchy, vacant ever ſince the Death of Oſwald his Brother, was conferred upon him. Penda was properly the only Prince that could juſtly pretend to it, but withal the moſt dangerous to be intruſted with it.

Oſwy held Mercia by Right of Conqueſt, whilſt the Sons of Penda were forced to ſeek for Refuge among their Friends. Their Misfortune would doubtleſs have been of longer Continuance, had not the rigorous proceeding of Oſwy's Officers compelled the Mercians to take up Arms. They concerted their Meaſures ſo well, that when Oſwy leaſt expected it, the Northumbrians were on a ſudden driven out of Mercia, and Wulpher, Son of Penda, placed on the Throne.

(1) Bede ſays, the Battle was fought at Deniſſburna, (ſuppos'd to be Dilſton) and relates many very incredible and ſuperſtitious Miracles concerning this Place and the Croſs erected by Oſwald, whoſe chief Merit with the Monks, was his introducing Monkery with the Chriſtian Religion, which makes the Story of the Croſs to be conſider'd as a monkiſh Fiction, as well as the Name of Heaven-Field.

(2) In Shropſhire, then call'd Maſerfield. 'Tis incredible to think how many Miracles were aſcribed to him after his Death by his Friends the Monks; particularly the Wonders perform'd by his Right-hand, which Bede ſays, was preſerv'd uncorrupt in the Church of Peterborough in his Time. It ſeems he ſent one Day a large Silver Diſh, full of Meat to ſome poor People to his Gate, ordering the Diſh to be broken in pieces, and diſtributed among them. Whereupon Aidan taking him by the Right-Hand, ſaid, Let this Hand never corrupt. Which ſay the Monks, accordingly happen'd.

A few Years after, Oſwy, in ſome meaſure repair'd this Loſs, by the acquiſition of Deïra, upon the Death of Adelwalt, who died without Heirs. Thus Northumberland was once more united into one Kingdom.

OSWY alone.

This Re-union however did not hold long. Oſwy's tender Affection for his natural Son Alfred, induced him to divide Northumberland again, and make him King of Deïra, though contrary to the People's Inclination.

OSWY in Bernicia. — ALFRED in Deïra.

Oſwy, after he had reigned twenty-eight Years, died in 670 (1). The beginning of his Reign was diſturbed with Wars, but his good Fortune prevailed at laſt, and procured him ſome Quiet. Bede, for Reaſons taken Notice of in the Hiſtory of the Church, ranks him among the moſt illuſtrious Kings of the Heptarchy, and loads him with Praiſes, tho' his Reputation was very much ſullied by the Murder of Oſwin. By Anfleda, Daughter of Edwin, he had two Sons and three Daughters. Egfrid his Son ſucceeded him both in his Kingdom, and in the Monarchy of the Angle-Saxons. The Deïrians, upon Oſwy's death, revolted againſt Alfred, and put themſelves under the Dominion of Egfrid, who thereby became King of all Northumberland. Alfred retir'd into Ireland, where he applied himſelf chiefly to his Studies, in expectation of a favourable Opportunity to recover his Dominions.

EGFRID alone.

670. G. Malmſb. l. 3. de Pontif. Egfrid, tho' he came to the Crown young, ſoon made himſelf both eſteem'd and fear'd. The Picts invading his Territories, were defeated ſeveral times, and forced in the end to purchaſe a Peace with Part of their Country. Wulpher, King of Mercia, thought likewiſe to make ſome Conqueſts in Northumberland; but before the End of the War, was very glad to preſerve his own Dominions. Egfrid's good Succeſs in the beginning of his Reign, procured him the Dignity of Monarch, which his Father enjoy'd before him.

684. Bede, l. 4. c. 26. In the Year 684. he ſends an Army into Ireland for the Conqueſt of that Iſland, under the Conduct of Bertfrid, whoſe Cruelties to the Iriſh, eſpecially in not ſparing their very Churches and Monaſteries, cauſe the Enterprize to miſcarry. The Iriſh recovering out of their firſt Surprize, defend themſelves ſo well, that Bertfrid is forced to return home with his almoſt ruin'd Army.

Egfrid not being able to gain any thing from that Quarter, reſolves to enlarge his Bounds towards the North, and to that end carries his Arms into the Country of the Picts, who little expected an Invaſion. For which Reaſon, they betake themſelves to their Moraſſes and Fens, to avoid the firſt Attacks of their Enemies. Egfrid was ſo unwiſe as to follow them, and lead his Men into unknown Defiles, which he could not get clear of. Whereupon the Picts, who were perfectly acquainted with the Country, haraſs'd his hunger-ſtarv'd Troops in ſuch a manner, that he loſt above half his Army. And at laſt, to open a Paſſage, he was forced to come to a very unequal Engagement, wherein he loſt his Life, in the fortieth Year of his Age, and fifteenth of his Reign.

Egfrid was twice married; Adelfrida his firſt Wife, Daughter of Annas King of the Eaſt-Angles, and Widow of Thombert an Engliſh Lord, is ſaid to remain a Virgin, tho' ſhe had two Huſbands, and at laſt to be entirely parted from Egfrid. She founded a Monaſtery at Ely, and was the firſt Abbeſs herſelf. She was reverenced in England by the Name of St. Auldry.

The Death of Egfrid, and Loſs of his Army, were extremely prejudicial to the Kingdom of Northumberland, which from that time never recovered its former Luſtre. The Picts improv'd their Victory by the Conqueſt of Part of Bernicia, which lay convenient for them. The Welſh, on the other hand, poſſeſs'd themſelves of the two Provinces, that formerly compos'd the Kingdom of Areclute, and out of them erected the Kingdoms of Lenox and Cumberland; the firſt of which was taken from them ſome Years after.

Egfrid leaving no Iſſue, the Northumbrians recall'd Alfred from Ireland, and crown'd him King of both Kingdoms, which from thenceforward remain'd always united.

ALFRED.

The Picts and Welſh having had Time to ſecure their Conqueſts before Alfred was ſettled in his Throne, it was not poſſible for him, after Egfrid's Death, to recover them out of their Hands. All he could do, was to defend, and that with great Difficulty, the reſt of his Dominions from the frequent Attacks of his Neighbours. The Monarchy of the Angle-Saxons went to the Kings of Weſſex. 685. Bede, l. 4. c. 26.

Alfred ended his Days in 705, having reigned twenty Years after his Reſtoration. He left his Son Ofred to ſucceed him at eight Years of Age, under the Guardianſhip of a Lord named Brithric. 705. Ann. Sax. Flor. Wig.

OSRED.

The Minorities of Princes being generally attended with Troubles, it happen'd in the beginning of This, that Edulph, a certain Lord of the Country, taking Advantage of Ofred's Youth, made an Attempt upon the Crown. A powerful Party having own'd him for King, Ofred and his Guardian were obliged to retire to Bamborough-Caſtle, where they were immediately beſieged by Edulph. The Length of the Siege giving Brithric Time to look about him, and his Friends an Opportunity of riſing in Favour of their lawful King, Edulph found himſelf deſerted on a ſudden, and forced to raiſe the Siege in confuſion and hurry. Whereupon, Brithric improving this happy Turn, ſallied out in purſuit of the Uſurper, and taking him Priſoner, ordered him to be beheaded, about two Months after his Revolt. G. Malm. l. 3. de Pont. Sax. Ann. Malmſb. Bede, l. 5. Flor. Wig.

When Ofred came of Age, and was Maſter of himſelf, he fell into a wicked and lewd Courſe of Life; but eſpecially he had little or no Regard for the Monks, which was look'd upon Then as the height of Impiety. He made no Scruple, as 'tis pretended, to debauch the Nuns, and even to force them, when fair Means would not prevail. Tho' this Imputation cannot be ſaid to be certainly true, yet the Effects of it were great. After Alfred, Oſwy's natural Son, came to the Crown, all the Baſtards of the Kings, or their Deſcendants, imagin'd they had the ſame Right to aſpire to the Throne. This prov'd the Occaſion of many Troubles in the Kingdom. Cenred and Oſric, Deſcendants of Ogga, natural Son of Ida, ſeeing Ofred was neither eſteem'd nor belov'd, form'd a Party againſt him, which was abetted to the utmoſt of their Power by the Regular and Secular Clergy, whoſe Intereſt it was to have a new Sovereign. This Party became at length ſo ſtrong, as to be able to give Ofred Battle, wherein he was ſlain, in the nineteenth Year of his Age, and eleventh of his Reign, Cenred, the principal Author of the Revolt, was his Succeſſor. Flor. Wig. 716. G. Malm. l. 1. c. 3. H. Hunt. l. 2.

CENRED.

This Prince died in the ſecond Year of his Reign, and Oſric that aſſiſted him in obtaining the Crown, mounted the Throne after him. 716.

OSRIC.

He reign'd eleven Years, without doing any thing remarkable, and left his Crown to his Couſin Ceolulph. 718. Sax. Ann. Bede.

CEOLULPH.

This Prince turning Monk, in the ſeventh or eighth Year of his Reign, paſs'd the reſidue of his Days in the Monaſtery of Lindisfarn. Edbert aſcended the Throne after him. 730.

EDBERT.

The Coronation of Edbert was immediately follow'd by an Invaſion of the Picts in the northern Frontiers. This War obliging him to march all his Forces towards the North, the King of Mercia, taking Advantage of their diſtance, fell upon the ſouthern Parts of Northumberland, and carried off a great Booty. 737. G. Malm. l. 1. c. 3. H. Hunt. l. 4. 740.

Edbert, towards the End of his Reign, having made a League with Oengusſa King of the Picts, recover'd the City of Areclute (2), Capital of the Kingdom of Lenox, taken by the Welſh in the Reign of Alfred. Deovama, General or Prince of the Welſh, endeavouring to relieve Areclute, was defeated by the Confederate Kings. Shortly after, Edbert retired into a Monaſtery leaving his Crown to his Son Oſulph. 756. Malmſb. Huntingd. S. Dunelm.

OSULPH.

758. Osulph was assassinated in the first year of his Reign; and Mollon-Adelwald, though not of the Blood-royal, was rais'd to the Throne.

MOLLON-ADELWALD.

759. Sax. Ann. Malmsb. Hunting. Mollon-Adelwald's Election was a fresh occasion of sundry Calamities that afflicted Northumberland, and prov'd in the end the destruction of the Kingdom. The Northumbrians having been guilty of the error of placing on the Throne a King not of the Royal Family, all the Great Men thought themselves entitled to the Crown, as well as the Princes of the Blood. Hence those many Factions, that ended at last in the entire loss of the publick Liberty. Some

761. S Dunelm. of the Nobles finding Mollon had rais'd himself to the Throne by help of a powerful Party, believ'd it allowable for them to do the same. Oswy, one of these Lords, led the way, but death freed the King from this Competitor. Afterwards, Alcred, descended from Ida by Alaric, one of his natural Sons, following the example of Oswy, and secretly conspiring against Mollon, found means to insnare him and put him to Death; after which he was crown'd in his stead.

ALCRED.

765. Mollon's Faction, that was very much humbled by his death, having in time recover'd the superiority they had lost, Alcred was forc'd to fly to the King of the Picts, for fear of falling into the hands of his Enemies. As soon as he was gone, Ethelred, Son of Mollon, was plac'd on the Throne by his Father's Party.

ETHELRED.

774. Sax. Ann. Malmsb. S. Dunelm. Hunting. As Ethelred had been rais'd to the Crown by the interest of his Faction, he judged the best way to fix himself in the Throne, would be by the death or banishment of the Heads of the contrary Party. Accordingly, three of the principal opposers of his Election were put to death, for forg'd or slight Crimes. But this method, instead of having the expected Effect, serv'd only to hasten the plots of his Enemies, whom the death of the three innocent Lords furnish'd with a plausible pretence to take up Arms. In a short time, they were able to bring into the Field an Army, that gave the King some Uneasiness. The King however sending his best Troops against them under the Command of a General entirely devoted to his Service, was in hopes of speedily reducing them to obedience. But his army was overthrown by the Rebels. This Defeat, which was soon follow'd by a second, threw himself into such an ill Situation that he was oblig'd to fly for refuge to some of the neighbouring Kingdoms. Upon his retiring, Alfwald, Son of Osulph, and Grandson of Egbert, was placed on the Throne by the victorious Party.

ALFWALD I.

779. H. Hunt. l. 4. R. de How. Alfwald I. reigned eleven years with great Justice and Moderation. But however, it did not prevent his being assassinated by one of the contrary Faction. He was honoured by his Followers as a Saint after his death.

OSRED II.

789. G. Malm. l. 1. c. 3. Osred, Son of King Alcred, was chosen in his room, who, very unlike his Predecessor, became so contemptible, that he was confin'd to a Monastery the first year of his Reign. Ethelred's Party was deeply concern'd in deposing Osred, and had interest enough to recall and place him again on the Throne, after fifteen years exile.

ETHELRED restored.

Ethelred began his new Reign with two acts of Cruelty, that very much exasperated his Enemies against him. He put Osred his Predecessor to death, who, tho' a Monk, made him uneasy (1): And then dispatch'd out of the way Alphus and Alfwin, Sons of the good King Alfwald.

During this Reign, the Danes made a descent ito Northumberland, and burnt Lindisfarn Monastery. Allur'd by the booty, taken in this first Expedition, they came again next year, and pillaged Tinmouth Monastery, founded by King Egfrid. Ethelred, by the assistance of his Father-in-law, Uffa King of Mercia, prevented them from carrying their Ravages any farther, and drove them back to their Ships, where almost all of them perish'd in a sudden and violent storm on the English Coast. 794. 795.

After Ethelred was recall'd, his cruel and revengeful temper very much inflam'd the enmity of the opposite Faction towards him. Mean while, regardless of the murmurs of his Enemies, he thought only of glutting his Revenge, and establishing himself in his Throne, by the death or banishment of those he most fear'd. At length, attempting to send Ardulph, one of the principal Lords of the Country, into exile, he gave the contrary Party an occasion to rebel. After the civil War had lasted two years, the Malecontents, finding they had taken a tedious, and uncertain way to get rid of their King, caus'd him to be assassinated. However his Faction was still powerful enough to place Osbald, one of their own Party, on the Throne. 796. Sim. Dunelm. Rog. Hov.

Charles the Great, Ethelred's Friend, was so incens'd with the Northumbrians, that he was going to proclaim war against them, as appears in Alcuin's Letter, on this occasion, to Offa King of Mercia. Alcuin. Ep. G. Malm. l. 1. c. 3.

OSBALD or OSRED.

Whilst people were intent upon the publick rejoicings at the election of the new King, the opposite Party laid their measures so well, that Osbald was dethron'd, twenty-seven days after his Election, and Ardulph chosen in his room. 796.

ARDULPH.

The Divisions that prevail'd in Northumberland, still continued to rend that unfortunate Kingdom. Ardulph was supported in the Throne only by one of the Factions that was then the most powerful. But this did not hinder the other Party from frequently attempting to get uppermost. Alcred, formerly King of Northumberland, left a Son nam'd Alcmund, who was head of this Party. This Prince begin- 796. 800. ning to grow formidable, Ardulph put him to death, judging it necessary to sacrifice him to his Safety. His death being look'd upon by his Friends as a Martrydom, Alcmund was rank'd in the Number of the Saints. But this was not all that follow'd upon his death. It afforded the King's enemies a pretence to rise in arms, and set Alaric, a Lord, at their head. But this General being vanquish'd, and slain in battle, the Male-contents remain'd quiet for some time, in expectation of a more favourable opportunity. And indeed, the face of Affairs was quickly chang'd. For the opposite party became at length so powerful, that the King was glad to escape out of his Enemies hands, by flying to the Court of Charles the Great, where the English were always welcome. Sim. Dunelm.

ALFWALD II.

After the Retreat of Ardulph, Alfwald II. who had chac'd him away, was plac'd on the Throne, and reigning about two years, by his Death left the Crown to Andred. 808.

ANDRED.

In Andred's Reign it was that Northumberland submitted to the dominion of Ecbert, King of Wessex, who put an end to the Heptarchy. 810.

(1) Simeon of Durham, and Hoveden say, that Osred went from his Monastery into exile. From whence being invited over by some of his Party, but afterwards deserted by them, he was taken by Ethelred and put to death. S. Dunelm p. 112. Howed p. 405. So that he was no Monk, as Rapin supposes.

Kingdom of Mercia.

THE Kingdom of Mercia was bounded on the North by the Humber, by which it was ſeparated from Northumberland; on the Weſt by the Severn, beyond which were the Britons or Welſh; on the South by the Thames, by which it was parted from the Kingdoms of Kent, Suſſex and Weſſex; on the Eaſt by the Kingdoms of Eſſex and Eaſt-Anglia. Thus Mercia was guarded on three Sides by three large Rivers that ran into the Sea, and ſerved for Boundaries to all the other Kingdoms. Hence the Name, Mercia, from the Saxon Word, Merc, ſignifying a Bound, and not, as ſome fancy, from an imaginary River called Mercia. The Inhabitants of this Kingdom are ſometimes termed by Hiſtorians, Mediterranei Angli, or the Mid-land Engliſh, and ſometimes South-Humbrians, as being South of the Humber; but the moſt common Name is that of Mercians. The principal Cities of Mercia were Lincoln, Nottingham, Warwick, Leiceſter, Coventry, Lichfield, Northampton, Worceſter, Glouceſter, Derby, Cheſter, Shrewsbury, Stafford, Oxford, Briſtol. Of all the Kingdoms of the Heptarchy this was the fineſt and moſt conſiderable. Its greateſt Length was a hundred and ſixty Miles, and its greateſt Breadth about one hundred.

H. Hunt. Fl. Wig. CRIDA, firſt King of Mercia, arrived in England in 584. He was crown'd the ſame or the following Year, and died in 594 (1).

INTERREGNUM.

After Crida's Death, Ethelbert, King of Kent, and Monarch of the Anglo-Saxons, made himſelf Maſter of Mercia, and kept it ſome Time, as will be related in the Hiſtory of the Kingdom of Kent. But afterwards he reſtored it to Wibba, Son of Crida, reſerving however ſome Right of Sovereignty, the Nature of which Hiſtorians have neglected to explain.

WIBBA.

597. H. Hunt. l. 2. Polychr. l. 5. c. 12. This Prince reigned nineteen Years, and died in 615. He left a Son called Penda, who ſhould have ſucceeded him, but Ethelbert being ſtill alive, and dreading his reſtleſs and turbulent Spirit, left Mercia about a Year without a King. After that he placed Cearlus, Couſin-german of Wibba, on the Throne.

CEARLUS.

616. Malmſb. G. Thorn. After the Death of Ethelbert in 616, Cearlus freed Mercia from the Dominion of the Kings of Kent, he reigned nine Years, and died in 624. As he left no Children, Penda, Son of Wibba, poſſeſſed the Throne after him.

PENDA.

625. H. Hunt. l. 2. Malmſb. This Prince was fifty Years old when he came to the Crown. Ethelbert had not without Reaſon paſſed him by after his Father's Death, he being the moſt reſtleſs and ſtirring Prince that ever reigned before or ſince in England. He hated Peace worſe than Death. I have already, in the Hiſtory of Northumberland, ſpoken of his Wars with Edwin, Oſwald and Oſwy. His War with the Kings of Weſſex and Eaſt-Anglia, to avoid Repetition, ſhall be related in the Hiſtory of theſe two Kingdoms.

653. Bede, l. 3. c. 21. In 653, Penda cauſed Peda his eldeſt Son to be crown'd King of Leiceſter, and then ſent him into Northumberland to eſpouſe the Daughter of King Oſwy, where he was converted to Chriſtianity. He brought back with him ſome Miſſionaries, who preached the Goſpel in Mercia with good Succeſs. But Penda lived and died a Pagan.

Bede, l. 3. c. 24. Malmſb. At length Penda was ſlain in Battle in the eighteenth Year of his Age, as was related in the Hiſtory of Northumberland. He left five Sons, Peda, Wulfer, Ethelred, Merowald, and Mercelm, and two Daughters, Ciniburga, and Ciniſwintha.

INTERREGNUM.

After the Defeat and Death of Penda, Oſwy became Maſter of Mercia, and kept it three Years. However he left Peda his Son-in-law the little Kingdom of Leiceſter. But Peda being ſoon after poiſoned by his Wife, Oſwy ſeized that too, and held it with the reſt of Mercia, till he was driven thence by Wulfer, as we have ſeen in the Hiſtory of Northumberland. 657. Bede, Polychr. Flor. Wig.

WULFER.

Wulfer was almoſt as much a Stranger to Peace as his Father Penda. He waged War, at ſeveral times, with all the neighbouring Princes, with various Succeſs, one while Conqueror, another while vanquiſhed. As the Particulars of theſe Wars are not very material, and beſides are but lamely related by the Hiſtorians, it is needleſs to inſiſt upon them. I ſhall only obſerve, that he took Adelwalch, King of Suſſex, Priſoner, and brought him to Mercia, after having conquered his Kingdom (2). Some Time after, Adelwalch turning Chriſtian during his Impriſonment, Wulfer gave him the Iſle of Wight, which he had likewiſe ſubdued. There is Room to conjecture, that Wulfer had alſo conquered the Kingdom of Eſſex, ſince it is well known he diſpoſed of the Biſhoprick of London in Favour of one Wina. 659. M. Weſt. 663. Bede, l. 4. c. 3. & 7. Fl. Wig. 666.

Wulfer was ſtill an Idolater when he came to the Crown; but ſhortly after was converted, and his Children were brought up in the Chriſtian Religion (3). Vereburga, one of his Daughters, was honoured as a Saint. He died in 675, thinking to leave his Crown to his Son Cenrid; but his Brother Ethelred found means to ſupplant his Nephew and obtain the Kingdom. Malm. l. 1. c. 4. Flor. Wig.

ETHELRED.

Ethelred, as ſoon as he was ſeated on the Throne, erected Herefordſhire into a Kingdom, and gave it to Merowald his Brother (4), who dying without Heirs, left it to his younger Brother Mercelm. But he dying alſo without Children, this little Kingdom was reunited to Mercia. 675.

In 679, Ethelred invaded Kent, and made great Devaſtations (5). After that he turned his Arms againſt Northumberland (6), and compelled Egfrid to reſtore certain Mercian Towns, taken during the Reign of Wulfer. Theodore, Archbiſhop of Canterbury, greatly contributed to the Peace concluded between theſe two Kings. 679. Bede, l. 4. c. 21. G. Malm. l. 3. de Pont. Bede. Fl. Wig. M. Weſt.

In 697, Oſtrith, Wife of Ethelred, was aſſaſſinated (7), and the little Care taken to diſcover the Murderer, gives room to ſuſpect the King himſelf was not innocent. However that be, Ethelred growing weary of the World, reſigned his Crown to Cenred his Nephew, Son of Wulfer, and turned Monk in Bardney Monaſtery, of which ſhortly after he was made Abbot. 704. G. Malm. l. 1. c. 4.

CENRED.

Nothing remarkable was done by this Prince, during his four Years Reign, but the exchanging his Crown for the Monkiſh Habit, after the Example of Offa, King of Eſſex, who was come to his Court to demand Ciniſwintha his Aunt, Daughter of Penda, in Marriage. By the Perſuaſions of this Princeſs, both Kings were prevailed upon to turn Monks, and go to Rome, and receive the Tonſure at the Pope's Hands. Ceolred, Son of Ethelred, ſucceeded his Couſin Cenrid. 704. Bede, l. 5. c. 20.

CEOLRED.

Ceolred had a terrible War to ſuſtain againſt Ina, King of the Weſt-Saxons. Hiſtorians, according to Cuſtom, without relating the Motives or Particulars of this War, only ſay, the two Kings, at Wodenburg in Wiltſhire, fought a 709. Ann. Sax. Fl. Wigg. H. Hunt. l. 4.

bloody Battle with ſuch equal Succeſs, that neither could boaſt of the Victory.

715. G. Malm. l. 1. c. 4. Ceolred was far from being of his Predeceſſor's Mind to prefer the Monks Habit before a Crown. He not only diſregarded the Monks and the reſt of the Clergy, but, if the Hiſtorians are to be credited, violated their Privileges without any ſcruple. This Behaviour, ſo contrary to that of all the other Engliſh Princes, raiſed great Clamors againſt him. The Monks in particular took all occaſions to paint him in the blackeſt Colours. Their Animoſity follow'd him even in the other World. After his Death, which Such kind of Reports againſt thoſe that were not in the Intereſt of the Monks, were not ſpread without Deſign. The Hiſtories of thoſe days are full of the like Tales. Ethelbald, Grandſon of Eoppa, Brother of Penda, mounted the Throne after Ceolred.

ETHELBALD.

716. This Prince was one of the moſt illuſtrious Kings that had hitherto worn the Crown of Mercia, to which he added the Dignity of Monarch of the Anglo-Saxons, reſigned by Ina King of Weſſex, when he turned Monk. This Dignity ſeems to have conſiſted originally only in preſiding at the general Aſſemblies, and commanding the Armies of the ſeven Kingdoms, and ſome other Prerogatives, which conferr'd no Right of Sovereignty over the other Kings. At leaſt, the Electors look'd upon it in this Light. But the Monarchs generally conſider'd it after a very different manner. They were no ſooner inveſted with it, but their firſt care was to graſp at an unlimited Power, to which they thought themſelves intitled by the Examples of the preceding

Bede, l. 5. c. 24. H. Hunt. Monarchs. Ethelbald, improving ſome favorable Junctures in his Reign, carried the Prerogatives of the Monarchy to the higheſt degree, and thereby grew very troubleſome and formidable to the other Kings (1). For which reaſon the Kings of Weſſex and Northumberland agreed to attack him from two different Quarters at once. As Mercia was ſituated between theſe two Kingdoms, Ethelbald was obliged to ſend half his Army towards the North, whilſt with the other half he marched himſelf againſt the Weſt-Saxons

752. Ann. Sax. H. Hunt. commanded by Ethelun. The Particulars of this War are unknown, except that Ethelbald was vanquiſhed and his Army put to rout (2).

757. M. Weſt. Four Years after, this Prince was ſlain (3) in a Mutiny of the Army raiſed by a Lord named Beornred, who was proclaim'd King by the Soldiers.

BEORNRED, the Uſurper.

757. G. Malm. l. 3. c. 4. Bede, Epit. Beornred's Election by the Army, who had no right to aſſume ſuch an Authority, was very diſpleaſing to the Mercian Lords, eſpecially as the King elect was no ways related to the Royal Family. And therefore, before Beornred had time to eſtabliſh himſelf in his Uſurpation, they forthwith placed on the Throne Offa Nephew of the late King. Preſently after, Offa drawing an Army together, gave the Uſurper Battle, and obtained a complete Victory. Some ſay, Beornred was ſlain, and others, that he maintain'd his Ground for a while in ſome part of Mercia.

OFFA.

757. G. Malm. l. 4. Flor. Wig. Huntingd. M. Paris. Offa was one of the moſt famous Kings that reigned in England during the Heptarchy, not only for his being inveſted with the Dignity of Monarch, but for his Victories over the Welſh and the neighbouring Saxon Princes (4), and for ſeveral other things which I ſhall briefly relate. One of his greateſt Victories was that over Aldric King of Kent, in 774.

Nothing was more common than to ſee thoſe who were inveſted with the Monarchy, aſpiring to a ſovereign Authority over the other Kings. Offa, treading in the Steps of his Predeceſſors, never ceaſed to diſturb his Neighbours on that occaſion, and was engaged by his Ambition in continual Wars with ſuch Princes as diſputed his pretended Rights. But theſe Wars are ſo confuſedly and lamely related by the Hiſtorians, that all I could ſay would not ſuffice to give a clear Notion of them. We muſt therefore be contented with what has been ſaid of him in general, which may ſerve to diſcover the Character of King Offa.

Whilſt Offa was employed in ſubduing the Saxon Kings, the Welſh, always upon the Watch to improve the Advantages afforded them by the frequent Diſſenſions of the Engliſh, thought they had now a fair Opportunity to attack him. This unexpected War, wherein the Welſh at firſt were ſucSim. Dun. ceſsful, caus'd Offa to conclude a Peace with the Engliſh, in order to turn his Arms againſt the Welſh. He quickly reduc'd them to ſuch a Condition that they were forced to abandon not only their late Conqueſts in Mercia, but alſo part of their own Country beyond the Severn, which Offa ſeiz'd and peopled with Engliſh Colonies. But to prevent the Welſh from ever retaking it, he threw up a Rampart, defended by a large Ditch, by means of which he parted his Conqueſts from the reſt of Wales. This Rampart, in length twenty four Miles, reaching from the Mouth of the Dee, to the place where the Wye runs into the Severn, was called Clawdh Offa, or Offa's Dyke (5).

In 786, Offa made his Son Egfrid Partner with him in Ann. Sax. the Government, and gave his Daughter Edburg in Mar- M. Paris. riage to Brithric King of Weſſex.

What caſt the greateſt Blemiſh on Offa's Reputation was M. Weſt. his Treachery to Ethelbert King of the Eaſt-Angles. This Ann. Sax. young Prince deſigning to marry, came to the Court of Offa and demanded his Daughter Adelfrida in Marriage. He was receiv'd at firſt with great Marks of Affection and Eſteem. But ſoon after the Scene was changed, Offa, by the preſſing and repeated Inſtigations of Quendrida his Wife (6), who repreſented to him that he ought by all means to embrace ſo fair an Opportunity of becoming Maſter of Eaſt-Anglia, was perſuaded to break the moſt ſacred Laws of Honour and Hoſpitality, by the Murder of Ethelbert (7). Which done he marches into Eaſt-Anglia with Brompton. a numerous Army, before the Eaſt-Angles had time to prepare for their Defence, and meeting with no Oppoſition, ſeizes the Kingdom, and unites it to Mercia.

He had no ſooner committed this Horrid Fact, but he was tormented with cruel Remorſe. His Crime was continually before his Eyes, and tortured him to ſuch a Degree, that he could not enjoy a Moment's Eaſe. To appeaſe his raging Conſcience, he reſolv'd upon a Journey to Rome, 794. (which he perform'd in 794) to obtain a Pardon from the Pope, and ſecure himſelf from the Puniſhment due to his Crime. The Pope (8) granted his Requeſt, on condition he would be liberal to the Churches and Monaſteries: for that was the only way then of atoning for Sins. It were to be wiſh'd that Reſtitution had alſo been enjoined as a neceſſary and previous Condition.

Among the Liberalities of Offa to the Churches of Rome, we muſt not omit one of great Conſequence for England. Ina King of the Weſt-Saxons, had now founded at Rome a College for the Education of Engliſh Youth; for the Maintenance whereof the Founder order'd a Penny to be collected yearly of every Family in his Dominions (9). This kind of Charity was term'd Romeſcot, that is, Tribute of Rome, or ſent to Rome. Offa extended this Tax through- M. Paris. out Mercia and Eaſt-Anglia, the Lands belonging to the M. Weſt. Monaſtery of St. Albans only excepted: And becauſe this Money was paid at Rome on a Holy-day, call'd St. Peter's ad vincula (10), this Tax was nam'd Peter-Pence, inſtead of Romeſcot. By this Means the Directors of the College were abundantly ſupplied wherewithal to defray the Expence they were at from the great Concourſe of the Engliſh, who came to ſtudy at Rome. In proceſs of Time, the Popes pretending it was a Tribute paid by the Engliſh to St. Peter and his Succeſſors, converted it to their own uſe, 'till it was entirely aboliſh'd by Henry VIII (11).

Before Offa left Rome, he obtain'd of the Pope the Canonization of St. Alban, the firſt Britiſh Martyr, whoſe Relicks were pretended to be found at Verulam. At his re- 795. turn, he built there a fine Church and a ſtately Monaſtery, Bede, l. 1. to which he granted great Privileges and a large Revenue. c. 7. From that time Verulam was call'd St. Albans. Offa was alſo very munificent to the Church of Hereford, where the Body of the King of Eaſt-Anglia lay buried, that Prayers

The Canonization of St. Alban, procured by his means, and the founding a noble Monaſtery in Honour of that Saint, being put in the Balance againſt the Murder of Ethelbert, is the Ground of that Hiſtorian's Uncertainty.

The Reign of Offa is memorable upon ſeveral Accounts: His Dike: The Union of Eaſt-Anglia to Mercia: The erecting of Lichfield into an Archbiſhoprick (2), of which I ſhall ſpeak elſewhere: Peter-Pence: A Body of Laws publiſh'd under the Title of Mercens Leaga, (i. e.) Laws of the Mercians (3), which ſerv'd for Pattern to his Succeſſors, and the greateſt part whereof were inſerted in King Alfred's Laws, publiſhed about the end of the next Century (4).

CENULPH.

796. Sim. Dun. R. de Hov. Cenulph was no ſooner on the Throne, but he declared War againſt Edbert-Pren King of Kent, the motive whereof is unknown (5). We are only told, it proved fatal to the King of Kent, who being taken Priſoner, was carried to Mercia, where Cenulph ordered his Eyes to be put out (6), after he had placed another King (7) on the Throne of Kent (8).

Cenulph died in 819, after a glorious Reign of twenty four Years. He left a Son very young, named Cenelm, and two Daughters, Quendrida and Burganilda. G. Malm. Polychr.

Its greateſt length was eighty, and its greateſt breadth fifty five miles. It contained the two Counties of Norfolk and Suffolk, with part of Cambridgeſhire. The chief Towns were Norwich, Thetford, Ely, and Cambridge. I have already related, how this Kingdom was founded by the Angles that landed on the eaſtern Coaſts of Britain, under twelve Chiefs, the Survivor of whom, Uffa, aſſumed the Title of King of the Eaſt-Angles.

UFFA.

571. We don't find this Prince acted any thing remarkable after his being King. He died in 578, leaving his Son Titilus to ſucceed him.

TITILUS.

578. All we know of this King is, that he died in 599, and had for Succeſſor his Son Redowald.

REDOWALD.

599. Lang. Chr. Reg. This Prince was the moſt illuſtrious of all the Kings of Eaſt-Anglia, if not of the whole Heptarchy. As I have had occaſion to ſpeak of him largely in the Hiſtory of Northumberland, I ſhall only obſerve here that he died in 624, leaving his Crown to his Son Erpwald.

ERPWALD.

624. G. Malm. l. 1. c. 3. Erpwald made but a very indifferent Figure in the Heptarchy, being all along in Subjection to Edwin King of Northumberland, who might have depriv'd him of his Kingdom, with the Conſent of the Eaſt-Angles, if the Obligations he had received from Redowald his Father would have ſuffered him to have been guilty of ſo black an Ingratitude. However he was in reality the Sovereign of Eaſt-Anglia, though he left Erpwald the Title of King. Erpwald was aſſaſſinated in 633, after he had reign'd about nine Years. Bede, l. 2. c. 15.

INTERREGNUM.

After his Death, Eaſt-Anglia had no King for three Years, the Reaſon whereof is unknown. In 636 the Eaſt-Angles placed on the Throne Sigebert, half Brother of their laſt King. 633.

SIGEBERT.

636. G. Malm. l. 1. c. 5. Fl. Wig. Bede, l. 3. c. 18. H. Hunt. l. 3. This Prince who was baniſhed by Erpwald his Brother by the Mother's Side, on ſuſpicion of aſpiring to the Crown, had retired into France, where he became a Chriſtian. As ſoon as he was King of Eaſt-Anglia, he made it his chief Buſineſs to bring his Subjects to the Knowledge of the true God; which indeed was planted among them in the Reign of Redowald, but having made no great Progreſs, was now almoſt extinguiſhed. After he had effected this Work by the Aſſiſtance of Felix a Burgundian Prieſt, he retired into a Monaſtery, reſigning his Crown to Egric his Couſin.

EGRIC.

644. Bede. Egric ſoon after his Coronation, being attacked by Penda King of Mercia, the Eaſt-Angles having no great Confidence in their new King, petition Sigebert to quit his Monaſtery, and put himſelf at the Head of their Army. He ſtood out a good while againſt their Intreaties: But poſſeſs'd with a Notion that Heaven muſt crown ſo pious a Prince

(1) Probably the true Reaſon why W. Malmsbury gives him an indifferent Character, is becauſe he ſeized the Lands of ſeveral Monaſteries, particularly of that at Malmsbury. See W. Malmsb. p. 30.
(2) Upon his conquering Kent he remov'd the Archiepiſcopal See from Canterbury to Lichfield. See M. Paris, p. 978, 979. Malmsb. de Pontif. p. 199.

with Victory, they preſt him ſo earneſtly, that at length he yields to their Requeſt, and heads the Army with Egric, carrying nothing but a Switch in his Hand. God, who is not directed by the Imaginations of Men, gave the Victory to the Mercians, both the Eaſt-Anglian Kings being ſlain on the Spot. They were ſucceeded by Annas, Son of Ennius, Nephew of Redowald.

ANNAS.

644. Annas was one of the moſt illuſtrious Kings of Eaſt-Anglia. By his Aid it was, that Cenowalch, King of Weſſex, who fled to him for Refuge, was reſtored to his Kingdom, of which he had been depriv'd by Penda in 645.

654. Ann. Sax. Flor. Wig. Polychr. This Action drew upon him the Hatred of Penda, who, out of Revenge, reſolv'd to carry Fire and Sword into Eaſt-Anglia. Annas died whilſt he was preparing for his Defence, leaving the Management of this dangerous War to Ethelric, his Brother and Succeſſor (1).

ETHELRIC.

654. Ethelric dreading the Valour and Power of Penda, bribes him with a Sum of Money to deſiſt from his War with the Eaſt-Anglians, and to induce him to invade Northumberland, offers to accompany him with all his Forces. I have already related how they were both ſlain in an Engagement with Oſwy. Adelwald, Brother of Ethelric, mounted the Throne after him.

ADELWALD.

655. We know nothing more of this Prince, but that he died in 664, leaving his Crown to Aldulph his Nephew, Son of Ethelric.

ALDULPH.

Of this Prince all we can learn is, that he was alive in 680, and aſſiſted at the Council of Hatfield. His Succeſſor was Alfwald. 664.

ALFWALD.

Alfwald died in 749, and was ſucceeded by Beorna and Ethelbert, who divided the Kingdom. Flor. M. Weſt.

BEORNA and ETHELBERT.

Ethelbert dying before the Year 758, Beorna reign'd alone. But we know nothing more of him, but that he was ſucceeded by Etheldred. 749.

ETHELRED.

Ethelred dying about the Year 790, left the Crown to Ethelbert.

ETHELBERT.

This is the Prince that Offa King of Mercia put to death in order to ſeize his Kingdom in 792 (3). From that Time Eaſt-Anglia and Mercia made but one Kingdom.

THE Hiſtory of the Kingdom of ESSEX.

Kingdom of Eſſex. THE Kingdom of Eſſex or the Eaſt-Saxons was bounded on the North by Eaſt-Anglia, on the Eaſt by the German Ocean, on the South by the Thames, and on the Weſt by Mercia. Its greateſt Length was ſeventy-five Miles, and its Breadth thirty-eight. It contain'd the Counties of Eſſex and Middleſex, and Part of Hertfordſhire. The principal Cities were London and Colcheſter; the firſt of which became afterwards the Metropolis of all England. It had formerly been very conſiderable, by reaſon of its Situation, in the Time of the Romans, who made it a Colony. But in all Probability it was reduced very low after the Arrival of the Saxons.

This Country having been extorted from Vortigern by Hengiſt, after the Maſſacre of the Britiſh Lords, was erected into a Kingdom by Erchenwin the firſt King. Hiſtorians have neglected to inform us of the Occaſion and Manner of founding this Kingdom, by which the Succeſſors of Hengiſt were depriv'd of almoſt as large a Tract of Land as the Kingdom of Kent. Had a Monaſtery been in the caſe, we ſhould have had all the Particulars.

ERCHENWIN.

527. G. Malm. l. 1. c. 6. Erchenwin began his Reign in 527, and died in 587, after he had reign'd ſixty Years. He was ſucceeded by his Son Sledda.

SLEDDA.

587. It is not known in what Year this Prince died, but only that his Son Sabert or Saba reign'd in 599.

SABERT.

604. Bede, l. 2. c. 3. Sabert was the firſt Chriſtian King of Eſſex, being converted by the preaching of Mellitus, and Sollicitation of Ethelbert, King of Kent, his Uncle, by his Mother's Side (4). He was noted for his Piety and Zeal for the true Religion. He died in 616, and was ſucceeded by his three Sons (5).

SAXRED, SEWARD, and SIGEBERT.

616. Brompt. M. Weſt. Theſe three Princes reigning together, forſook with one Conſent the Chriſtian Religion, which they had profeſs'd during their Father's Life. After they had reign'd ſeven Years, they raſhly came to an unequal Engagement with Cinigiſil and Quicelm Kings of Weſſex, and were all three cut off, with their whole Army. Their Succeſſor was Sigebert the Little. Bede, l. 2. c. 15. M. Weſt.

SIGEBERT the Little.

Sigebert the Little. Nothing particular is known concerning this Prince, not ſo much as the Time of his Death, but only that he was ſucceeded by Sigebert the Good, Grandſon of a Brother of pious King Sabert, and was on the Throne in the Year 653. 623.

SIGEBERT the Good.

Sigebert reſtor'd the Chriſtian Religion in his Dominions, from whence it had been expell'd ever ſince the Death of Sabert. He was aſſiſted therein by Cedd, a Northumberland Prieſt, conſecrated Biſhop of the Eaſt-Saxons. This Prince was aſſaſſinated in 655, by two Counts his Relations, who, having been excommunicated by Cedd, complain'd that the King, inſtead of avenging their Quarrel, had caſt himſelf at the Feet of the Biſhop, begging Pardon for converſing with them after their Excommunication. His Succeſſor was Swithelm his Brother. 653. Flor. Wig. in Geneal. G. Malm. l. 1 c. 6. Bede, l. 3. c. 22.

SWITHELM.

There is nothing particular concerning this Prince, except that Sebba and Siger ſucceeded him. 655. Flor. Wig. G. Malm.

SEBBA and SIGER.

Sebba was Son of Seward, and Siger of Sigebert the Little, Son of the ſame Seward. Siger return'd to Idolatry; but Sebba ſtedfaſtly adhered to the Chriſtian Religion. They were Vaſſals to the King of Mercia, as was before obſerv'd in the Reign of Wulfer. Siger dying in 683, Sebba remained ſole King of Eſſex.

SEBBA alone.

Sebba reigned about eleven Years longer, and then, 683.

(1) The Sax. Ann. Huntingd. p. 327. and Malmsbury ſay, that he was ſlain in a Battle with Penda.
(2) Tyrrel ſays, he ſaw in a Chronicle of Mailroſe a King nam'd Switheard, who reign'd in 749. He might have ſucceeded Alfwald, Rapin.
(3) He was ſainted after his Death. Malmsb. Brompt.
(4) Ricula, Siſter to Ethelbert, was Sabert's Mother. Rapin.
(5) He was buried in St. Paul's Cathedral, which, according to ſome, he built. Higd. Polychr. p. 228.

being very old, turn'd Monk in 694. He left his Crown to Sighard and Senofrid his Sons.

SIGHARD and SENOFRID.

694. These two Brothers reigned, snd very probably died, together about the Year 705. Offa, Son of Siger, mounted the Throne after them.

OFFA.

705. Bede, l. 5. c. 23. This Prince desiring to marry, and casting his Eyes on Ciniswintha, Daughter of Penda King of Mercia, goes to the Court of Cenred to demand this Princess his Aunt in Marriage. But Ciniswintha, being very religious and not young, persuades her Lover to turn Monk, as she does likewise her Nephew King of Mercia. These two Princes went to Rome together, and received the Tonsure at the Pope's Hands. Offa is said by some to be succeeded by Seolred or Selred, Son of Sigebert the Good.

SEOLRED.

Seolred reigned thirty eight Years, and was killed at last, but by whom, or in what manner, is unknown. Swithred his Son succeeded him, as some say. 707. G. Malm. H. Hunt.

SWITHRED.

This is the last King of Essex, whose Name occurs in History or the Saxon Annals. He began his Reign in 746, and in case he was alive at the time of the Dissolution of the Heptarchy, must have reigned seventy eight Years. 746.

Of all the Kingdoms of the Heptarchy, there is none whose History is so imperfect as that of the Kingdom of Essex.

History of the Kingdom of KENT.

Kingdom of Kent. THE Kingdom of Kent, the first that was founded by the Saxons, being neither large nor very considerable, made no Figure in the Heptarchy, only during the Reigns of Hengist and Ethelbert. It was very advantageously situated, having the Sea on the South and East; the Thames on the North; and the little Kingdom of Sussex on the West. As long as this last subsisted, it served as a Bulwark to the Kings of Kent, against the Ambition of the Kings of Wessex. But after it was subdued by the West-Saxons, the Kingdom of Kent was in continual Danger of falling under the Dominion of these powerful Neighbours. The Truth is, the Jealousy between the Kings of Wessex and Mercia, and the Equality of their Forces, were the only things that long prevented this little Kingdom from becoming a Prey to one or other of them. It was not above sixty Miles in length, and thirty in breadth. The chief Towns were Dorobern or Canterbury the Capital, Dover, Rochester, and some others not so large indeed, but considerable however for their Situation and Harbours, as Sandwich, Deal, Folkstone, Reculver, &c.

HENGIST, first King.

455. Hengist arrived in Great-Britain in 449. He assumed the Title of King of Kent in 455, and died in 488. He was succeeded by his Son Escus.

ESCUS.

488. G. Malm. l. 1. c. 1. As the Saxons, after the Death of Hengist, conferred the Command of their Armies on Ella King of Sussex, Escus very likely was not in so great Esteem as his Father. I know of nothing remarkable concerning his Reign (1), which lasted to the Year 512. His Successor was Octa his Son.

OCTA.

512. Flor. Wig. Malmsb. Polychron. This Prince suffered, or at least could not prevent the dismembring of Essex and Middlesex from the Kingdom of Kent, to form the Kingdom of the East-Saxons. This is the only Particular we meet with during this twenty two Years Reign. After Octa, his Father Hermenric ascended the Throne of Kent.

HERMENRIC.

534. There is nothing particular concerning this Prince, who reigned however thirty Years. Before his Death he associated Ethelbert his Son and Successor.

ETHELBERT.

568. Ethelbert was one of the most celebrated Kings, not only of Kent, but of the whole Heptarchy. He was famous upon many Accounts, particularly for his being the first Christian King of his Nation. But as I intend to speak elsewhere of the Conversion of the Anglo-Saxons, I shall relate here only such of Ethelbert's Actions as respect not Religion.

This Prince, who had a great and an aspiring Genius, beheld with regret, that his Predecessors had lost the Dignity of Monarch and the Superiority Hengist had over all the Saxons, settled in his time in Great-Britain. At his coming to the Crown, he finds Ceaulin King of Wessex in possession of this Superiority as Monarch. He resolves to dispute it with him, but is twice worsted. For this cause he remains quiet till the Year 593, when he takes up Arms again, not singly as before, but in conjunction with all the other Kings, who are displeased with Ceaulin's seizing the Kingdom of Sussex. Ethelbert being declared General, defeated Ceaulin, who died soon after. Flor. Wig. H. Hunt. l. 2. M. West. 568. G. Malm. l. 1. c. 1.

After Ceaulin's Death, Ethelbert being elected Monarch of the Anglo-Saxons, and forgetting the Fall of Ceaulin, of which he himself was the cause, exercised an almost absolute Power over all the Kingdoms lying South of the Humber, the Northumbrians alone having found means to keep themselves independent. All the rest chose rather to submit than contend with him (2). Bede, l. 1. c. 25. G. Thorn.]

Besides his being formidable to his Neighbours for his great Accomplishments, he had moreover the Advantage of being allied to France by means of his Marriage with Bertha, Daughter of Cherebert King of Paris. This Alliance procured him great Respect, the Kings his Neighbours having reason to dread the introducing the French into England, as he might easily have done. But though the Haughtiness wherewith Ethelbert treated them, after several Victories, made them exceeding uneasy, they had still a much greater Occasion to be alarmed.

Upon the Death of Crida King of Mercia, Ethelbert seized that Kingdom, though the deceased King had left a Son of fit Age to succeed him. In this Ethelbert trod exactly in the Steps of Ceaulin, though he had himself stirred up the other Kings against that Monarch, on account of his Ambition. Thus Men, for the most part, condemn in others what they approve in themselves. Ethelbert it seems pretended that he had a Right as Monarch, or as Descendent of Hengist, to succeed to all the vacant Thrones in the Heptarchy. For when Fortune smiles on a Man, he easily finds Reasons, good or bad, to support the most exorbitant Pretensions. However this be, the Anglo-Saxon Princes, alarmed at this open Usurpation, began to stir and take Measures to put a stop to this formidable Power, before it grew to a greater Height. The Monarch dreading they would all join in a league against him, and serve him as they did Ceaulin, thought it not Prudence to expose himself to the same Danger. Accordingly, to make them easy, he restored the Kingdom of Mercia to Wibba, Son of Crida, reserving however such an Authority over him, that he durst not undertake any thing without his Order or Leave. Satisfied with this kind of Moderation, the English Princes laid aside all thoughts of a War, which Necessity alone had driven them to. 594.

Nothing very remarkable happened in the rest of Ethelbert's Reign, except what relates to Religion, of which I shall speak in the History of the Church. This Prince had two Wives, the first was Bertha of France Sax. Ann. Fl. Wig.

(1) H. Huntingdon says, that he enlarged his Dominions, by conquering the Kingdoms of the Britons, p. 312.

(2) Malmsbury observes, that King Ethelbert, in the beginning of his Reign, was a Scorn to the neighbouring Princes; for being beaten in one or two Battles, he could scarce defend his own Territories: but when in his riper Years he had learned more Experience in War, he soon brought under his Subjection all the Nations of the Anglo-Saxons, except the Northumbrians. Rapin.

by whom he had Edbald his Succeſſor, and Ethelburga, married to Edwin King of Northumberland. The Name of his ſecond Wife is unknown. He died in 616 (1), after he had reigned fifty two Years.

EDBALD.

916. G. Malmſb. G. Thorn. Hiſt. Ab. S. Aug.

Edbald was very unlike his Father. As ſoon as he became his own Maſter, he forſook the Chriſtian Religion and turned Heathen. He is even ſaid to have married the Queen his Mother-in-law. His Vices rendering him ſlothful and unactive, all the Engliſh Sovereigns caſt off the Yoke they had worn during the Life of Ethelbert. The King of Mercia in particular having freed himſelf from the Servitude Ethelbert had kept him in, Edbald had neither the Power nor Courage to maintain what the King his Father thought he had ſo firmly eſtabliſhed. I don't know whether Hiſtorians are not agreed in giving this Prince an exceeding bad Character, in order to ſet off his Converſion the more. However this be, they aſſure us, that by the Pains of Laurentius, Archbiſhop of Canterbury, he was brought to a ſenſe of his Errors, and returning to the Profeſſion of the Goſpel, ſpent the remainder of his Days in the Practice of its Precepts. He left two Sons (2), Ermenfred and Ercombert, which laſt ſucceeded him, and a Daughter named Enſwith, Foundreſs of the Abby of Folkſtone.

Bede, l. 2. c. 6.

ERCOMBERT.

640. M. Weſt. G. Malm. l. 1. c. 1. G. Thorn.

Ercombert, though the youngeſt of Edbald's Sons, found means to aſcend the Throne, in prejudice of his elder Brother (3). This Prince ordered the Temples of the falſe Gods to be razed to the Ground, and the Idols broken in Pieces, leſt they ſhould prove a Snare to the People. Ermenfred his Brother being ſeized with a Diſtemper that brought him to his Grave, he promis'd to leave the Crown, which of right belonged to him, to his Children. But he was not ſo good as his Word: Perhaps it was too late when he came to think of it juſt before his Death, in the Year 664 (4). He left two Sons, Egbert and Lothair, and two Daughters; Ermenilda the eldeſt was Wife of Wulpher King of Mercia: The other was a Nun.

EGBERT.

Egbert was no ſooner on the Throne, but he put two Sons of his Uncle Ermenfrid to Death, for fear they ſhould diſturb him in the Poſſeſſion of the Crown. He preſented their Siſter Domnena with ſome Lands in the Iſle of Thanet, where ſhe founded a Monaſtery. This Prince died in 673, leaving two Sons, Edric and Widred, who were not his immediate Succeſſors, the Crown being ſeized by their Uncle Lothair.

LOTHAIR.

673. Vit. Richar. 685. G. Malmſb. l. 1. c. 1.

After Lothair had reigned ten Years unmoleſted (5), to ſecure the Succeſſion in his Family, he made his Son Richard Partner with him in the Government. This Proceeding obliges his Nephew Edric, Son of his Brother Egbert, to withdraw from Court, and apply to Edelwalch King of Suſſex for Aid, who puts him at the Head of an Army; with which entring Kent, he vanquiſhed Lothair, who died of the Wounds he received in Battle. After this Victory, Edric was crowned without Oppoſition. Richard Son of Lothair fled into Germany, where Boniface, Archbiſhop of Mentz, an Engliſhman, gave him his Siſter in Marriage, and cauſed him to be elected King of Suabia, if we may believe ſome Hiſtorians. I don't know how he came to die at Lucca in Tuſcany, where his Tomb is ſtill to be ſeen. They ſtile him King of England, though at moſt he was but King of Kent.

Offici. Eccl. Andr. in Feſto Ric. 685. G. Malmſb.

EDRIC.

This Prince reigned but two Years (6), and as he had no Children, left the Crown to his Brother Widred, who was forced to make Swabert his Partner, whoſe Extraction is unknown.

WIDRED and SWABERT.

After Edric's Death, Troubles and Commotions aroſe in the Kingdom of Kent, occaſioned by the Ambition of ſome Nobles who fortified themſelves, and refuſed to acknowledge Widred for King. In all probability Swabert was one of the principal of the Rebels, ſince he was aſſociated into the Government. It is not known whether he was any way related to the Royal Family.

In the Reign of theſe two Kings, Cadwallo King of the Weſt-Saxons imagining the inteſtine Diviſions of Kent would render the Kingdom an eaſy Conqueſt, ſent an Army thither under the Command of his Brother Mollon, who overran great part of the Country. But at length, the two Kings joining Forces, vanquiſh him in Battle. Mollon perceiving he was cloſely purſued, took ſhelter with twelve others in a Houſe which they valiantly defended: But the Kentiſh Soldiers ſetting fire to it, they all miſerably periſh'd in the Flames. Cadwallo ſoon revenged the Death of his Brother, whom he tenderly loved. He entered Kent with a formidable Army, and never left till he had deſtroyed the whole Country with Fire and Sword. After this Invaſion, Kent was reduced ſo low, that it never more made any Figure in the Heptarchy.

H. Hunt. l. 4. 678. G. Malmſb. l. 1. c. 1. Brompt. G. Thorn. Polychr. l. 5. c. 20.

The two Kings enjoyed no Repoſe till the Year 691. This perhaps is the reaſon of Bede's placing the beginning of Widred's Reign in this Year, tho' he was crowned five Years before. Swabert died in 695, and Widred remained ſole King of Kent.

Sax. Ann. Flor. Wig. Polychr.

ALDRIC.

Aldric was frequently attacked by his Neighbours, who ſeeing the weak Eſtate of the Kingdom of Kent, improv'd the Opportunity to ſubdue it. Offa King of Mercia was one of the moſt forward. He gained a Battle upon Aldric, which ſunk the Affairs of Kent very low, but however the Jealouſy of the other Kings would not ſuffer Offa to become Maſter of the Kingdom. Beſide, he was diverted from the War by a Welſh Invaſion in Mercia, as hath been related in the Hiſtory of that Prince. Had it not been for this, he would in all likelihood have united Kent to Mercia.

760. Fl. Genal. Malmſb. l. 1. c. 3.

Aldric had aſſociated his Son Alcmund, but that Prince dying before him, he left no Heirs, and with him ended the Race of Hengiſt. After his Death, Edbert, ſirnamed Pren, was placed on the Throne.

EDBERT-PREN.

The Kingdom of Kent being extremely weakned, Cenulph King of Mercia, making uſe of ſo fair an Opportunity, ravaged it from one end to the other; and at laſt having defeated and taken Edbert Priſoner, carried him into Mercia, where he ordered his Eyes to be put out. After that he placed on the Throne Cudred, who was in abſolute Dependence upon him, and paid him Tribute.

Hiſtory of the Kingdom of SUSSEX.

The Kingdom of Suſſex.

THE Kingdom of Suſſex was one of the moſt inconſiderable of the Heptarchy. It contained only the two Counties of Suſſex and Surry, the greateſt part of which conſiſted of the large Foreſt of Andredſwald, ſo called by the Saxons from Anderida, the Name it had in the time of the Romans. As this Foreſt ſtood untouched when Ella conquered Suſſex, we may ſuppoſe it was cleared by degrees. This Kingdom was not above fifty Miles long and forty broad. It was bounded on the North by the Thames, on the South by the Sea, on the Eaſt by the Kingdom of Kent, and on the Weſt by Weſſex. The capital City was Chicheſter, built by Ciſſa the ſecond King of this Kingdom. He built alſo Ciſsbury, whoſe Ruins are ſtill to be ſeen.

ELLA, firſt King.

491. Ella arrived in Britain in 476, and was crowned King of Suſſex in 491. He was a Prince of ſo great Reputation among the Saxons, that they judged him worthy to ſucceed Hengiſt in the Command of their Armies. He met with ſome ill Succeſs, having to deal with ſo experienced a General as Arthur. But however it did not hinder him from ſettling in the Country where he firſt landed, and founding there the Kingdom of Suſſex or of the South-Saxons. I have largely ſpoken of Baldulph and Colgrin his Sons, ſlain in the Battle of Badon. This Prince dying in 514, left the Crown to his only ſurviving Son Ciſſa.

Huntingd.

B. II.

CISSA.

514. Ciſſa was memorable only for his long Reign of ſeventy ſix Years, and, I may add, his great Age. For ſuppoſing him but a Year or two old when his Father brought him over in 476, he muſt have been at leaſt one hundred and fifteen, or one hundred and ſixteen Years of Age when he died in 590. But it is not very likely Ella ſhould bring with him a Child of a Year old.

M. Weſt.

590. Ciſſa leaving no Iſſue, Ceaulin King of Weſſex and Monarch of the Anglo-Saxons ſeized the Kingdom of Suſſex. This occaſioned the League againſt him. But notwithſtanding his being vanquiſhed, Ceolrick his Nephew and Succeſſor remained in Poſſeſſion of Suſſex.

Flor. Wig. H. Hunt. l. 2.

From that time the South-Saxons made ſeveral Attempts to ſhake off the Yoke of the Kings of Weſſex. And herein properly conſiſts the Hiſtory of Suſſex, till the Kingdom was entirely ſubdued.

In 607 they revolted againſt Ceolric King of Weſſex, but were reduced to Obedience.

In 648 they made another Struggle with better Succeſs. Cenowalch King of Weſſex continuing ſtill in Eaſt-Anglia, and Penda King of Mercia being Maſter of Weſſex the South-Saxons took that Opportunity to place on their Throne a King named Adelwalch.

ADELWALCH.

684. The Kingdom of Weſſex having ſuffered much by Penda's Invaſion, who ſeized and kept it three Years, Cenowalch was little able, after his Reſtoration, to dethrone the new King of Suſſex. But Adelwalch however was not left in quiet. Wulpher King of Mercia, having attacked Cenowalch and worſted him in ſeveral Encounters, penetrated as far as Suſſex, where vanquiſhing Adelwalch in Battle, he took him Priſoner, and after that, became Maſter of his Kingdom, and the Iſle of Wight. Adelwalch having embraced the Chriſtian Religion in Mercia, where he was Priſoner, Wulpher ſet him at Liberty, and made him a Preſent of the Iſle of Wight (1).

661. M. Weſt.

Bede, l. 4. c. 13.

Sax. Ann.

It is very probable Adelwalch, after the Death of Wulpher, recovered the Kingdom of Suſſex, ſince we find in the Saxon Annals, that he was on the Throne in 686.

686. The ſame Year Cedwalla, a Weſt-Saxon fugitive Prince, entered Suſſex with an Army, and Adelwalch endeavouring to drive him thence was ſlain in Battle.

G. Malm. l. 1. de Pontif.

After the Death of Adelwalch, Cedwalla would fain have made himſelf Maſter of Suſſex, but was oppoſed by Authun and Berthun, who were returned with an Army from an Expedition in the Kingdom of Kent. At the ſame time, Cedwalla, hearing of the Death of the King of Weſſex, who had expell'd him his Dominions, returned thither, where he was placed on the Throne. Mean while Authun and Berthun were crowned Kings of Suſſex. They are ſaid by ſome to be Sons of Adelwalch, and by others, his Generals only.

Bede, l. 4. c. 15.

AUTHUN and BERTHUN.

688. Theſe two Kings did not live long undiſturbed. Cedwalla now become King of Weſſex, made war upon them, and gained a Battle, wherein Berthun was ſlain.

AUTHUN alone.

Authun very probably preſerved the Crown of Suſſex, by an entire Dependence on the King of Weſſex, who, after the Death of Authun, would not even ſuffer the vacant Throne to be filled.

722. The South-Saxons made ſeveral Attempts to recover their Liberty. They took up Arms in 722: But having taken wrong Meaſures, Ina King of Weſſex reduced them to Obedience.

Sax. Ann. H. Hunt. l. 4.

725. Three Years after, taking Advantage of ſome Troubles that broke out in Weſſex, they placed on the Throne a King named Albert. But Ina having defeated and ſlain the new King, united their Kingdom to his own.

Fl. Wig. Bede, l. 5. c. 9.

754. However, this prevented them not in 754, in the Reign of Sigebert King of Weſſex, afterwards depos'd, from revolting once more, and chuſing one Oſmond for their King. In all likelihood Cenulph, Succeſſor of Sigebert, found means to reduce them again to a ſtate of Dependence. From that time the South-Saxons, as far as appears, never attempted to recover their Liberty, their Country being conſidered ever after as a Province of Weſſex.

THE

Hiſtory of the Kingdom of WESSEX.

The Kingdom of Weſſex or Weſt-Saxons.

THERE were in the Heptarchy three Kingdoms, two of Angles, and one of Saxons, that greatly ſurpaſſed the reſt in Grandeur and Power. The two Kingdoms of Angles were Northumberland ſituated beyond the Humber, and Mercia containing all that lay between the Humber, the Thames and the Severn, with the two Kingdoms of Eſſex and Eaſt-Anglia. Weſſex the third great Kingdom, inhabited by Saxons and Jutes, was ſituated South of the Thames, in breadth about Seventy Miles, from the Thames to the Britiſh Channel; and in length one hundred and fifty, from the Frontiers of Suſſex, to the River Tamar, which parted it from Cornwal. The principal Cities were Wincheſter, the Capital, Southampton, Portſmouth, Saliſbury, Dorcheſter, Sherborn, Exeter, where a great many Britons were mixt with the Saxons. The Iſle of Wight, inhabited by Jutes, was alſo dependent on this Kingdom.

As each Kingdom of the Heptarchy derived its Name from the Inhabitants and Situation, the Kingdom of Weſſex or of the Weſt-Saxons was ſo called, becauſe it lay

West of Suſſex, Kent, and Eſſex. Beſides the Extent, the Situation of this Kingdom made it alſo very conſiderable, ſince it was guarded on the North by the Thames, and on the South by the Sea; on the Eaſt it was bounded by the little Kingdom of Suſſex, not at all formidable to its Neighbours, and on the Weſt by the Britons of Cornwal, divided ſo from the reſt of their Countrymen the Welſh, by the Mouth of the Severn, that it was almoſt impoſſible for them to aſſiſt one another.

CERDIC.

519. This Prince, of whom I have largely ſpoken in the ſecond Book, arrived in Britain in the Year 495, and was crowned the firſt time King of the Weſt-Saxons in 519, after Arthur had ſurrendered to him the two Counties of Hampſhire and Somerſetſhire, the whole then of this Kingdom. He was crowned a ſecond time at Wincheſter in 532 or 533, by the ſame Title, upon the Delivery of Berkſhire, Wiltſhire, Devonſhire, and Dorſetſhire by Modred. He died in 534, leaving his Crown to his Son Cenric.

CENRIC.

534. H. Hunt. Cenric, who during his Father's Life was renowned for his Valour and Conduct, after he was King, preferred a quiet Life to the Noiſe and Hurry of Arms. We don't find he acted any thing memorable during his Reign, except defeating the Britons, who ventured to attack him in 552. He died in 560, and was ſucceeded by Ceaulin his eldeſt Son.

CEAULIN.

560. H. Hunt. Flor Wig. M. Weſt. Ceaulin, being elected Monarch after his Father's Death, carried the Prerogatives of that Dignity to a very great Height. Having brought the neighbouring Princes into ſubjection, he made them apprehenſive, by ſeizing the Kingdom of Suſſex after Ciſſa's Death, that he intended to reduce all England into one Kingdom. The better to ſecure Suſſex, he went and kept his Court at Chicheſter, leaving the Government of Weſſex to Ceolric his Nephew, whom he deſigned for his Succeſſor. His Ambition cauſed all the other Kings, Ceolric himſelf not excepted, to enter into a League againſt him. He was vanquiſhed by the King of Kent, who commanded the confederate Army (1), and forced to fly to ſome unknown Corner, where he ended his Days ſoon after. His Wars with the Britons and Aidan King of Scotland, were related in the ſecond Book.

Fl. Wig. 592. G. Malm. l. 1. c. 2. Flor. Wig. in Gen.

CEOLRIC.

594. Fl. Wig. G. Malm. Ann. Sax. Nothing particular occurs concerning this Prince after his Acceſſion to the Throne upon the Death of his Uncle Ceaulin. He died in 598 and was ſucceeded by his Brother Ceolulph.

CEOLULPH.

598. Fl. Wig. H. Hunt. All we know of this Prince is, that in 607 he reduced to Obedience the South-Saxons, who had revolted (2). He died in 611, and had for his Succeſſor Cinigiſil his Nephew, Son of Ceolric.

CINIGISIL.

611. A Year after his Coronation Cinigiſil aſſociated Quicelm his Brother, or rather divided with him the Kingdom of Weſſex.

CINIGISIL and QUICELM.

612. 614. H. Hunt. These two Brothers obtained in 614 a ſignal Victory over the Britons (3).

I have already given an Account of Quicelm's Wars with Edwin King of Northumberland, and ſhall have further Occaſion to mention him in the Hiſtory of the Church; and therefore ſhall ſay no more of him here. Quicelm turned Chriſtian a little before his Death, which happened in 635. 635.

CINIGISIL alone.

636. This Prince who had embraced the Chriſtian Religion ſometime before his Brother, in 636, reigned alone till his Death. He left his Crown to his Son Cenowalch.

CENOWALCH.

643. The Reign of Cenowalch was much troubled with his Wars with the Kings of Mercia. Penda, whoſe Siſter he had married and divorced, attacked him when he leaſt 645. expected it, and compelled him to abandon his Kingdom, and fly for Refuge to Annas King of the Eaſt-Angles, where he remained the three Years Penda kept poſſeſſion of Weſſex. Cenwalch was converted in Eaſt-Anglia, and 646. at length reſtored to his Kingdom by the Aſſiſtance of 648. Annas.

652. In 652 he obtained a ſignal Victory over the Britons (4), which was followed by another in 658 (5). G. Malm.

661. Sax. Ann. H. Hunt. Æthelw. l. 2. c. 7. G. Malm. Sax. Ann. Fl. Wig. H. Hunt. G. Malm. l. 1. c. 2. Some Years after, he was engaged in war with Wulpher, Succeſſor of Penda: but which was the Aggreſſor, or what was the Succeſs of the War is unknown. Wulpher was defeated and taken Priſoner. Others affirm he had entirely the Advantage, which to me ſeems moſt likely (6). It is certain Wulpher conquered Suſſex and the Iſle of Wight, which he could not have done, if Cenowalch had been in condition to oppoſe him. However this be, Cenowalch died in 672, and left his Crown to his Queen Sexburga.

SEXBURGA.

627. She was a Princeſs of great Courage, of a very ſublime and extenſive Genius, and poſſeſſed all the Qualifications Id. neceſſary for well-governing a Kingdom. She reigned but Id. one Year, and then died, as ſome ſay; but according to others, was depoſed by the Weſt-Saxons, who thought it a Diſhonour to obey a Woman (7).

Fl. Wig. in Gen. After the Death or Expulſion of Sexburga, the Kingdom was divided among ſeveral of the Great Men (8), of whom Cenfus, a Prince of the Royal Blood, deſcended from Cerdic, was the chief. Nothing more particular is known concerning this diſmembring of the Kingdom, which however was united again into one Body, after theſe petty Tyrants were either Dead or expelled. 673.

CENFUS, ESCWIN, and CENTWIN.

674. H. Hunt. l. 2. In 674, Cenfus aſſociated his Son Eſcwin, and probably was forced to let Centwin Brother to the late King Cenowalch reign alſo over ſome part of the Kingdom.

The next Year Wulpher attacked the Kings of Weſſex, whoſe Army was commanded by Eſcwin. A bloody Battle was fought, in which Wulpher had the Advantage; though the Loſs on both ſides was very great (9).

Cenfus died two Years after, and Eſcwin his Son did not long ſurvive him. Thus Centwin remained ſole King of Weſſex.

CENTWIN alone.

676. H. Hunt. Sax. Ann. M. Weſt. Fl. Wig. Hiſtory inform us, that in 682 Centwin obtained a ſignal Victory over the Welſh (10), upon which Cadwallader their King was forced to go and ſue for Aſſiſtance from the King of Armorica: The Welſh Prince afterwards took a Journey to Rome, where he died.

Fl. Wig. Sax. Ann. G. Malm. l. 1. c. 2. About the end of Centwin's Reign, Cedwalla a Prince of the Blood-Royal of Weſſex had ſo gained the People's Affection, that the King being jealous of him ordered him to depart the Kingdom. As Cedwalla could not diſpute the King's Command, he retired into Suſſex, and being well beloved, a great many young People choſe to accompany him, and follow his Fortune, inſomuch that he entered Suſſex with a fort of Army (11). Adelwalch, then King of Suſſex, angry at Cedwalla's preſuming to enter his Dominions in a warlike Manner, and without his Permiſſion, Sax. Ann. Fl. Wig. plac'd on the Throne.

CEDWALLA.

686. Fl. Wig. Cedwalla was not only King of Weſſex but likewiſe Monarch of the Anglo-Saxons. His firſt war was with Authun and Berthun Kings of Suſſex, ſpoken of before.

Having ended this war to his advantage, he turn'd his Arms againſt Kent (1), from whence he carried off a great Booty. Then he attack'd the Iſle of Wight, which belonged to the King of Suſſex ever ſince Wulpher's Grant to Adelwalch. Alwald, Brother to Authun, being then Governor of the Iſle, undertook its defence; but as Cedwalla's Forces were much ſuperior to his, he was forc'd at laſt to abandon the Iſle to the Mercy of the Conqueror. The Inhabitants being yet Idolaters, Cedwalla thro' a falſe Zeal for Religion, reſolved to root them out, and people the Iſland with Chriſtians. He would have executed this barbarous Reſolution, had not Wilfred, formerly Biſhop of York, and then Biſhop of Selſey in Suſſex, repreſented to him that it would be much better to endeavour to convert them. Upon the Biſhop's Remonſtrances, Cedwalla relented, but on condition the Inhabitants would be inſtantly baptiz'd. The poor Wretches, who had no time to deliberate, embraced the Chriſtian Religion at the firſt preaching of Birwin a Prieſt, Nephew of Wilfred, who was entruſted with their Converſion, if the bare Declaration of People threatned with death in caſe of refuſal, may be called by that Name.

687. G. Malm. l. 1. c. 1. Brompt. Polych. Some time after Cedwalla ſent his Brother Mollon with an Army into Kent. The miſerable death of Mollon there, and the terrible manner Cedwalla reveng'd it, have already been related in the hiſtory of that Kingdom.

688. Bede, l. 5. c. 7. At length, Cedwalla reſolved to take a Journey to Rome to receive Baptiſm at the hands of the Pope; for altho' he was a Chriſtian and a great zealot, he had never been baptized. He perform'd this Journey in 688. As he travelled thro' France and Lombardy, he was every where very honourably received. Cunibert King of the Lombards was particularly remarkable for the noble Entertainment he gave him. When he came to Rome, he was baptiz'd by Pope

M. 688. Sergius II, who gave him the name of Peter. He had all along wiſhed to die ſoon after his Baptiſm, and he had his deſire, for he died a few weeks after at Rome. He was buried in St. Peter's Church, where a ſtately Tomb was erected to his Memory, with an Epitaph ſhewing his name, quality, age, and time of his death (2). He left, by Cendrith his Queen, two Sons, who did not ſucceed him by reaſon of their tender age. Ina his Couſin mounted the Throne after him.

INA.

688. Of all the Kings that reign'd in England during the Heptarchy, Ina was one of the moſt famous and illuſtrious: He muſt needs have been of great repute, ſince the ſame year he was crowned he was declared Monarch of the Anglo-

Aſſ. Men. Saxons in a General Aſſembly, where Sebba King of Eſſex, his Friend, ſerved him effectually.

Ina's Wars with the Britons in Cornwal, the Kings of Kent, the South-Saxons, and King of Mercia, rendred his valour, merit, and abilities, more and more conſpicuous. But as Hiſtorians have only told us the Succeſs, without mentioning the motives and circumſtances of theſe Wars, it is impoſſible to give a particular account of them. They

694. G. Malm. l. 1. c. 2. Polychr. l. 5. c. 20. An Sax. H. Hunt. l. 4. only inform us that he carried his Arms into Kent, from whence nothing could drive him but the bribing him with a large Sum of Money (3); that in 710, he conquered part of Cornwal: That in 715, Ina and Ceolred fought a bloody Battle at Wodensburgh in Wiltſhire, with equal loſs on both ſides. That laſtly, he reduced to obedience the South-Saxons, who had revolted, and plac'd one Albert on their Throne (4).

An. Sax. Fl. Wig. H. Hunt. l. 4. Theſe are the military Exploits that gained Ina his Reputation for War. But the Panegyricks beſtowed on him by Hiſtorians, were not owing to theſe ſo much as to four other particulars, which to them ſeemed of greater importance, and which they have chiefly dwelt on. Firſt, he rebuilt Glaſſenbury Monaſtery, and augmented the Revenues and Privileges in ſuch a manner, that it became one of the moſt conſiderable in all England (5). In the ſecond place, he publiſhed a Body of Laws, entitled, Weſt-Saxon Leaga (6), that is, Laws of the Weſt-Saxons, which ſerved for foundation to that publiſhed in the next Century by Alfred the Great his Succeſſor. Thirdly, Ina ſignalized his Piety by quitting his Crown and turning Monk, which was then looked upon as an undoubted mark of Religion. This reſolution was taken by the perſuaſions of his Queen Ethulburga, who had prepared him for it, by frequently repreſenting to him the Examples of ſo many Kingss his Predeceſſors, that had run the ſame Race before, and were honoured as Saints. But laſtly what contributed moſt to Ina's Fame, was this: before he ſhut himſelf up in a Mo-

727. M. Weſt. naſtery, he went to Rome, where after conferring with Pope Gregory II. he built a large College for the Inſtruction and Reception of the Engliſh Eccleſiaſticks that ſhould come to ſtudy at Rome, and for the Entertainment and Lodging of the Kings and Princes of the ſame Nation, that ſhould viſit the Tombs of the Apoſtles. Adjoining to the College, he built alſo a ſtately Church, and appointed a certain number of Prieſts to officiate. Beſides the Charge of the Buildings, of the ornaments of the Church, and of the neceſſaries of the College, there was an abſolute neceſſity of ſettling a ſtanding Fund for their maintenance, according to the intent of the Founder. Now Ina had taken care of this, by laying a Tax of a Penny on every Family in the Kingdom of Weſſex and Suſſex, which was to be ſent yearly to Rome, under the name of Romeſcet. Some time after Offa King of Mercia impos'd the ſame Tax on the Kingdom of Mercia and Eaſt-Anglia, and term'd it Peter-Pence. Some ſay, Ina returned into England to have this Tax ſettled by the General Aſſembly, or Parliament of Weſſex, and to get the Charter ſigned by all the Nobility of the Kingdom (7). After which he return'd to Rome, where he took upon him the Monkiſh Habit (8). Ethelburga, who adviſed him to it only becauſe ſhe had a mind to become a Nun herſelf, put on the Veil in the Monaſtery of Barking.

Malmsbury is miſtaken in ſaying Ina was ſixty two years on the Throne of Weſſex, ſince it is certain he had reigned but thirty-ſeven, or at moſt but thirty-nine years when he reſigned his Crown to his Couſin Adelard.

ADELARD.

727. G. Malm. l. 1. c. 2. Though Adelard was placed on the Throne with the conſent of the Aſſembly General, Oſwald, one of the Royal Family (9), diſputed the poſſeſſion of it with him. Their quarrel was decided by a Battle, wherein the King was victorious over his Rival, whoſe Death, which happened ſhortly after, reſtored peace and tranquility to the Kingdom. Adelard died in 740, and was ſucceeded by Cudred An. Sax. his Brother or Couſin.

CUDRED.

740. We have only the following particulars of the Reign of Cudred: for we muſt not expect to find any connexion between the Facts related by the Hiſtorians, or Annaliſts.

743. In 743, this Prince obtained a ſignal Victory over the Corniſh Men. Two years after, Ethelun, a Weſt-Saxon Lord, diſſatisfied with the King, raiſed a ſedition among the Soldiers, in which Cenric Son of Cudred was ſlain. This Action was followed by a Civil War, which laſted An. Sax. H. Hunt. l. 4. ſome time. Ethelun being at the Head of the Rebels, dared to give his ſovereign Battle, wherein the King, though not without great danger of being vanquiſhed, gained the victory. During the Fight, Ethelun gave ſuch notable proofs of an undaunted Courage, and extraordinary Conduct, that the King choſe rather to receive him into favour, than deſtroy a Subject that might be ſerviceable to him. And indeed, it was the ſame Ethelun, that in 752 vanquiſhed Ethelbald King of Mercia, in a Battle 750. Bed. Ep. contin. mentioned in the Hiſtory of that Kingdom (10).

SIGEBERT.

754. H. Hunt. l. 4. Fl. Wig. Sigebert, very unlike his Predeceſſor, by his Vices and Cruelties (2), drew on himſelf the hatred and contempt of his Subjects. A certain Count (3) having expoſtulated with him concerning his Conduct, he ordered him to be put to Death in his Preſence. This Action made the Weſt-Saxons loſe all Patience; they publickly depoſe him, and place on the Throne Cenulph, Son of Adelard. Sigebert finding he could have no Redreſs, was forced to ſubmit to the ſentence of the States, and betake himſelf to a Foreſt (4), where he was killed by a Swineherd (5).

CENULPH.

754. Ann. Sax. G. Malm. l. 1. c. 2. H. Hunt. l. 4. R. de Hov. Cenulph became very famous for his frequent victories over the Britons (6).

After he had reigned thirty Years, he grew jealous of Cunehard, Brother of Sigebert, and perhaps not without Reaſon. Cunehard having notice of the King's ſuſpicions, and knowing he intended to diſpatch him out of the way, reſolved to prevent him. To this End, diſcovering him one Day, as he went alone (7) to viſit a certain Lady whom he admired, he followed him, with ſome of his Friends (8), into the Houſe and attacked him, Cenulph defended himſelf furiouſly, and even wounded his Enemy, but at laſt, overpowered with Numbers, ſunk down with his Wounds. The King's officers and domeſticks running in at the Noiſe, and finding him dead, fell upon Cunehard and ſlew him, not regarding the large offers he made them to ſpare his Life, and place him on the Throne (9). Brithric, Son of Cenulph, ſucceeded his Father.

BRITHRIC.

784. 787. Fl. Wig. Brithric, three years after he was on the Throne, married Edburga, Daughter of Offa, King of Mercia, and about the ſame time baniſhed Egbert the Kingdom. Egbert, a Prince of the Royal Family (10), by his noble Qualities had gained the Affection of the Weſt-Saxons to ſuch a degree, that the King could not help being jealous. This was a ſufficient inducement to Brithric to free himſelf from the Uneaſineſs occaſioned by that Prince, by removing him from his Preſence (11). Egbert retired at firſt to the Court of Offa King of Mercia: but did not meet there with the Reception he expected, Offa being unwilling to diſoblige his Son-in-law Brithric by harbouring a Prince that was hateful to him. Whereupon Egbert reſolved to retire into France, where he was very civilly received by Charles the Great, who ſhowed him, on ſeveral Occaſions, marks of his Eſteem. During Egbert's twelve years abode at this Prince's Court, he very much improved his natural Abilities (12), and rendered himſelf capable of executing the grand Deſign of uniting the ſeven Kingdoms of the Anglo-Saxons into one Monarchy, as will be ſeen preſently.

During the Reign of Brithric, the Danes made their firſt deſcent in the Kingdom of Weſſex (13). They began then to be formidable, not only at Sea, but on the Coaſts of ſeveral European Kingdoms. As in proceſs of time, they did the Engliſh incredible Damage, it is not without reaſon that Hiſtorians have been very exact in marking the time of their firſt Deſcent.

799. or 800. G. Malm. l. 2. c. 1. Aſſ. Men. Brithric in 799 was poiſoned by Edburga his Wife (14). The Weſt-Saxons were ſo provoked at this Action, that before they proceeded to the Election of a new King, they made a Law prohibiting the Wives of their future Kings from taking the Title of Queen, and ſitting on the Throne with their Husbands. And leſt the complaiſance of the Kings to their Wives might occaſion the breaking of this Law, it was further enacted, that hereafter, if any King of Weſſex ſhould diſpenſe with the Obſervance of it, he ſhould, ipſo facto, be deprived of his Royal Rights, and his Subjects abſolved from their Oath of Allegiance.

This affair being ended, an honourable Ambaſſy was ſent by the Weſt-Saxons to Egbert, to offer him the Crown. Egbert was then at Rome with Charles the Great, who received there, ſoon after, the Imperial Crown. Here he took his leave of that great Prince, who had been a Father to him, and at his departure gave him freſh marks of his Affection.

Queen Edburga having left Weſſex upon poiſoning her Husband, fled alſo to Charles the Great, who, in conſideration of the Friendſhip between him and her Father Offa, gave her a rich Abbey, where ſhe might have ſpent the remainder of her Days in Peace (15). But that way of Life not being agreeable to her Conſtitution, ſhe behaved ſo ill in it, that being ſurprized in an intrigue with a young Engliſh Gentleman, the Emperor was forced to ſend her away. She wandred about from place to place for ſome time, and at laſt went and ended her Days at Pavia in great want.

EGBERT.

800. Egbert, beſides the Valour natural to all the Saxon Princes, had one qualification that gave him a ſuperiority above the other Kings his Cotemporaries, which was, his great Knowledge in Politicks, acquired during his abode at the Court of Charles the Great, whoſe Example and Inſtructions, no doubt, had greatly contributed towards it. He was no ſooner on the Throne of Weſſex, but he perceived himſelf ſuperior to the other Kings, and reſolved to make the beſt Uſe of it (16). But like an able Politician, he judged it neceſſary to proceed by degrees in the execution of his Projects. Accordingly, he ſpent the firſt ſeven years of his Reign in ſettling the affairs of his Kingdom, and in gaining the love and eſteem of his own Subjects, in which he ſucceeded to his Wiſh.

The Kingdom of Weſſex being bounded on the South by the Sea, and on the North by the Thames, Egbert muſt of courſe begin the extending his borders either Eaſtwards or Weſtwards. To the Eaſt lay the Kingdom of Kent, which would have been very convenient for him; but as this Kingdom was then in ſubjection to Cenulph, King of Mercia, a Prince of diſtinguiſhed Worth, and Monarch of the Anglo-Saxons, to begin with Kent would have been the ready way to ruin his Deſigns. And therefore, in expectation of a more favourable juncture, Egbert thought it proper to carry his Arms firſt towards the Weſt, againſt the Britons of Cornwal. His ſucceſs was ſo great in a war 809. undertaken in 809, that in one Campaign he reduced all Malmſb. Cornwal to his Obedience (17).

The Welſh intending to aſſiſt their Brethren in Cornwal, 810. gave Egbert a pretence to attack them the next Year. He defeated them ſeveral times, and at laſt ſubdued the Kingdom of Venedocia (18), one of the three, Wales was then divided into (19). The ſtruggles of the Welſh afterwards 811, to ſhake off their Yoke, ſerved only to make it the hea- 812, vier. Egbert re-entring their Country, deſtroyed all 813. with Fire and Sword, which made them take care how they provoked him a third time to come among them.

At length the death of Cenulph in year 819, gave 819. Egbert room ſeriouſly to conſider of executing his deſigns. He was immediately inveſted with the dignity of Monarch, to which none had a better claim than himſelf. His Kingdom was in a flouriſhing condition, whilſt the reſt, weakned by inteſtine diviſions, daily loſt ſomewhat of their luſtre and power. The Heptarchy was reduced to five Kingdoms, of which he poſſeſſed one of the moſt conſiderable. In the other four, the race of their antient Kings being extinct, nothing enſued but quarrels and diſſentions among the principal Lords, who all thought they had a right to aſpire to the Crown. And therefore ſo far were they from conſulting in common the publick good, that they regarded only their own Intereſts, and the forming of Parties to ſupport them in their ambitious Pretenſions. On the contrary, the Kingdom of Weſſex became every day more powerful by the weakneſs of the reſt, and the prudent adminiſtration of the Perſon that governed it, whoſe valour was equal to his Judgment and Ability, to ſet in motion the Springs of the moſt refined Politicks. Wherefore Egbert reſolved to haſten the execution of his Project of reducing England into one Kingdom. Almoſt all the preceding Monarchs had form'd the ſame deſign, and their not ſucceeding was entirely owing to unſeaſonable junctures. But ſoon after Egbert's being declared Monarch, every thing conſpir'd to favour him. Northumberland had been long rent by two Factions, who, little attentive to what paſſed abroad, were only watching opportunities to ſupplant one another. Mercia was in no better condition. Bernulph, who had depos'd Ceolwulph, reigned only by the ſupport of a powerful Party, who indeed had Intereſt enough to raiſe him to the Throne, but found it difficult to uphold him, by reaſon of the envy of the nobles at his advancement. For which cauſe, tho' that Kingdom was conſiderably enlarged by the Acquiſition of Eaſt-Anglia, and tho' the King of Kent was become its tributary, it was far from being ſo powerful as Weſſex. The Eaſt-Angles, not yet thoroughly ſettled in the ſtate of ſubjection Offa had reduced them to, were waiting for a favourable Opportunity to throw off the Mercian Yoke, which to them was intolerable. The wars of the Kings of Kent with the Weſt-Saxons and Mercians, had brought them ſo low, that they could not avoid being tributary to the King of Mercia, and conſequently were not in condition to ſtand againſt Egbert. As for the Kingdom of Eſſex, beſides the probability of its being in Subjection to Mercia, it had long made but a very inconſiderable figure, and if it was ſtill governed by Swithred, which is uncertain, that Prince muſt have been of an extreme old Age.

Theſe conſiderations inflaming Egbert's Ambition, he began his Preparations, which raiſing ſuſpicions in the King of Mercia, he thought betimes of providing for his ſafety. Tho' he was ignorant that Egbert intended the Conqueſt of all England, he could hardly doubt but he deſign'd to enlarge his dominions at the expence of his Neighbours. And therefore, dreading the Storm might ſuddenly fall on him, he believed that by attacking him before he was ready, he ſhould break his meaſures and compel him to be quiet. To this end, he advanc'd with his Army as far as Ellandunum near Salisbury (1), where contrary to his expectation he met his Enemy, whom he thought to have ſurpriz'd unawares. The two Armies coming to an Engagement, the Mercians were routed with ſo great Loſs, that it was not poſſible for Bernulph ever to retrieve it.

Sax. Ann. Malmſb. Huntingd.

This Victory procur'd Egbert two great Advantages. Firſt, As it very much weakened the King of Mercia, who alone was able to withſtand him. Secondly, As it opened the way to the Conqueſt of Kent, for which Bernulph himſelf had given a pretence, by attacking him firſt. This Conqueſt was abſolutely neceſſary to his becoming maſter of all the Country between the Thames and the Sea. Beſides, by beginning the execution of his Deſigns with the Kingdom of Kent, he was the leſs apprehenſive of alarming the Northumbrians, who were too remote to concern themſelves with what was tranſacting beyond the Thames.

Purſuant to this Reſolution, Egbert ſent his Son Ethelwolph with a powerful army into Kent. Baldred, unprepared againſt an Invaſion, preſſed in vain the King of Mercia to come and aſſiſt him. Bernulph was diſabled, by his late defeat, from bringing an army ſo ſoon into the field. Beſides, Egbert had ſo poſted himſelf, that it was not poſſible to relieve Kent without overcoming his army, which as Bernulph could not pretend to attempt, the burden of the war, notwithſtanding his weakneſs, was to be ſuſtained by Baldred alone. However he hazarded a Battle; but being vanquiſhed, retired into Mercia, leaving his Kingdom to the young Weſt-Saxon Prince, who became maſter of it without any difficulty. Thus the Kingdom of Kent was united to thoſe of Weſſex and Suſſex, and by that means Egbert ſaw himſelf in poſſeſſion of the whole Country lying South of the Thames.

This firſt ſtep being taken, Egbert rendred himſelf alſo maſter of the Kingdom of Eſſex, which is all Hiſtorians ſay of it, without mentioning any one Circumſtance: So imperfect is the Hiſtory of that Kingdom.

Tho' the Conqueſt of theſe two Kingdoms was a great ſtep towards ſubduing the reſt, yet the moſt difficult Task was ſtill behind; namely, the Conqueſt of Northumberland, Mercia, and Eaſt-Anglia. Had theſe three Kingdoms been in their former ſplendor, each of them in particular would have kept Egbert fully employed. Nay, had they but entered into a ſtrict Alliance for their common defence, when they were going to be attacked, they would perhaps have cauſed that ambitious Prince to deſpair of ſubduing them. But their diviſions prevented them from making ſo neceſſary an Alliance. The Eaſt-Angles were waiting for an opportunity to revolt againſt the King of Mercia. The Northumbrians for ſome time had lived in a ſort of Anarchy, which diſabled them from taking any meaſures with regard to foreign Affairs. So far were they from any thoughts of aſſiſting their neighbours, that they were wholly intent upon deſtroying one another, in which they were but too ſucceſsful. Mercia indeed ſeemed ſtill very powerful, but the Mercians were in no greater Union among themſelves than the Northumbrians, and beſides, the battle of Ellandunum had conſiderably weakened them; whereas Weſſex was grown ſtronger by the Conqueſt of two Kingdoms.

Egbert beholding with pleaſure how all things conſpired to favour his deſigns, reſolved to invade Mercia in the firſt place, plainly foreſeeing, could he conquer that Kingdom, the reſt would make no long reſiſtance. Mercia and Eaſt-Anglia made but one body ever ſince their union by Offa. But as this union was not cemented by the mutual Affections of the two Nations, it was rather deſtructive than advantageous to the State. The Eaſt-Angles looked upon the Mercians as their hateful maſters; whilſt the Mercians on their part, treated the Eaſt-Angles with haughtineſs, as a conquered Nation. This being the Caſe, it was much more eaſy for Egbert to foment their mutual Enmity, than for them to reap the benefit of their Union. For this reaſon Egbert, to accompliſh his ends with the more eaſe, increaſed their animoſity to the utmoſt of his power, not doubting but, could he once bring them to an open rupture, they would ſo weaken one another, as never more to be able to reſiſt him. It is ſtrange, ſince this maxim is univerſally known, We muſt divide thoſe whom we would deſtroy, it ſhould ſo frequently happen that they againſt whom it is practiſed, ſhould attend ſo little to it. That the Eaſt-Angles, blinded by their extreme deſire of freeing themſelves from the Mercian Yoke, without a moment's conſideration followed the advice ſecretly given them by Egbert, of taking up Arms for the recovery of their Liberty. Their attention to their preſent Intereſt, prevented them from reflecting, that after they had been ſubſervient to Egbert's deſign, they would be ſtill leſs able to withſtand him than the Mercians. It is true, Egbert, pretending to have no other view but their Intereſt, cauſed whatever was moſt capable to excite them to a revolt, to be laid before them. His Emiſſaries told them, there never was ſo favourable an opportunity of recovering their Liberty: That the Mercians were ſo extremely weakened ſince the battle of Ellandulum, that they were hardly able to maintain their tyranny over the Eaſt-Angles: That beſides, Egbert was ſo incenſed againſt Bernulph that he would readily aſſiſt them, having publickly declared as much. This was ſufficient to induce the Eaſt-Angles to revolt. The pleaſure of thinking they ſhould be freed from their dependance on the Mercians, baniſhed from their thoughts the fear of becoming ſubject to the Weſt-Saxons. Thus reſolved, they took up Arms, and choſe a General, whoſe Name Hiſtorians have neglected to relate. Bernulph informed of their motions, thought he could not be too ſpeedy in putting a ſtop to an evil that ſeemed of ſo dangerous a conſequence. With the firſt Troops he could draw together, he marched againſt the Eaſt-Angles, but inſtead of chaſtiſing them, as he vainly hoped, was defeated and ſlain.

The Eaſt-Angles were mightily encouraged by this Succeſs, without diſheartning however the Mercians, who made freſh attempts to reduce the Rebels. They forthwith elect a King, named Ludican, who endeavours to continue the War, whilſt the Eaſt-Angles are preparing to receive him, in expectation the King of Weſſex would not fail them upon occaſion according to his Promiſe. Ludican actually entered Eaſt-Anglia with a numerous Army; but Death prevented him from making any Progreſs, and rendered his preparations for that Campaign of no Effect. Some ſay, he was ſlain in a Battle: Others affirm, the Eaſt-Angles found means to free themſelves from the dread of this Prince, by cauſing him to be aſſaſſinated. Malmſb. Aſſer. Ann.

Whether the Mercians diſcovered that Egbert privately aſſiſted the Eaſt-Angles, or the Conqueſts already made by that Prince, opened their Eyes, they were ſenſible at length, the maintaining their dominion over Eaſt-Anglia, was not ſo much the buſineſs of the preſent War, as the preſervation of their own Liberties. In this belief, they reſolved to exert their utmoſt, and chuſe a King of known valour, without regarding the Intereſts of the ſeveral Factions, which till then had kept them divided. Their choice fell upon Witglaph, a Lord of great Merit, whoſe Son had married a Daughter of King Cenulph. If the new King had been to deal with the Eaſt-Angles, probably he would have ended the war to his advantage. But inſtead of aiming at the reduction of Eaſt-Anglia, he was very much embaraſſed to defend his own dominions. Egbert fearing the ſtate of affairs might be changed under a new Prince, whoſe valour he was no ſtranger to, no longer delayed to declare openly for the Eaſt-Angles. Hitherto he had only aſſiſted them privately, at leaſt he had not appeared as a party in the war, raiſed by him between them and the Mercians, with the ſole aim that they might weaken one another. But as ſoon as the preparations of the Mercians gave him room to fear the balance would incline too much on their ſide, he thought himſelf obliged to take other meaſures, by publickly aſſiſting the Eaſt-Angles, and declaring war with the Mercians. Witglaph uſed his utmoſt endeavours to withſtand the united Forces of the Eaſt-Angles and Weſt-Saxons. He even frequently tried the fortune of his Arms in skirmiſhes and conflicts, but always with ill ſucceſs. At length, having loſt a great battle, and finding his caſe deſperate, he fled to the Abby of Croyland, where he lay concealed three Months. In the mean time, Egbert purſuing his victory, became maſter of Mercia, without any oppoſition. He deſigned to unite it to the reſt of his dominions, but by the mediation of Siward Abbot of Croyland, Witglaph was reſtored to his Kingdom, on condition of paying homage, and becoming tributary to the Conqueror.

Ingulph. Sax. Ann.

After the Eaſt-Angles had been ſubſervient to Egbert's Deſigns, they were glad to be received into his Protection, on almoſt the ſame Terms with the Mercians, ſo that all the advantages procured them by the War, was the change of one Maſter for another.

Northumberland alone remained as yet free from the dominion of Egbert. But that Kingdom was little able to preſerve her Liberty, conſidering the ill ſituation of her Affairs. Andred, who then reigned, was a King in name only. His Faction had placed him on the Throne, not that he, but themſelves might reign in his Name. Beſides, the Kingdom was all along rent by Parties, and frequently invaded by the Scots, who had over-run great part of its Territories. It was not poſſible therefore for the Northumbrians to withſtand the victorious Arms of the King of Weſſex, or rather, of all the reſt of England, which was in that Prince's Power. Accordingly, when Egbert approached with an Army that had already conquered four Kingdoms, Andred and the Northumbrians in great Conſternation, and unable to make head againſt him, ſubmitted, and accepted of the ſame Terms granted the Mercians and Eaſt-Anglians.

Malmſb.

Thus ended the Heptarchy of the Anglo-Saxons, by the reduction of the ſeven Kingdoms, under the Dominion of the King of Weſſex. Indeed Mercia, Eaſt-Anglia, and Northumberland, ſtill preſerved a Shadow of Liberty; but very probably Egbert would not have ſuffered other Kings to be choſen, after the Death of thoſe who were then on the Throne, if the Danes, who ſhortly after began their Invaſions, had given him Time to take other Meaſures.

The Government of the Heptarchy, reckoning from the founding of the Kingdom of Mercia, the laſt of the ſeven Anglo-Saxon Kingdoms, held two hundred and forty three Years. But if the time ſpent by the Saxons in their Conqueſts, be added, from the Arrival of Hengiſt to that of Crida, the Heptarchy will be found to have laſted three hundred and ſeventy eight, from its beginning to its Diſſolution.

If we enquire into the Cauſes of the Diſſolution of the Heptarchy, they will very readily occur. It is eaſy to perceive one of the principal was, the great Inequality amongſt the ſeven Kingdoms, three whereof vaſtly ſurpaſſed the reſt in Extent and Power. Hardly was the Heptarchy founded, when the Kings of Weſſex looked upon Suſſex and Kent as extremely convenient for them, and accordingly both the one and the other were ſubdued by them at different times. The Kings of Mercia had all along an Eye on the Kingdom of Eſſex. Nay, it appears they were Maſters of it for ſome time, and in all likelihood it was not entirely free, when conquered and united to his other Dominions by Egbert. Eaſt-Anglia was an Object that continually inflamed the Deſires of the Mercians and Northumbrians, the firſt of whom carried it at length.

Another Cauſe of the Diſſolution of the Heptarchy, was the default of the Male-Heirs in the Royal Families of all the Kingdoms, Weſſex excepted. Hence aroſe thoſe Diſſentions among the Great Men, which exceedingly weakened their reſpective States. We may aſſign moreover as another Cauſe, the Concurrence of various Circumſtances, which never met but in the time of Egbert. But chiefly this Diſſolution was owing to the Direction of the Providence of God, whoſe good Pleaſure it was to raiſe England by degrees, and after ſeveral Revolutions, to her preſent height of Grandeur and Power.

The Conqueſts of Great-Britain, and the relinquiſhing of the ſame by the Romans, is the Subject of the firſt Book of this Hiſtory. In the ſecond the largeſt and nobleſt Part of the Iſland is repreſented ſtruggling with the Anglo-Saxons, and at laſt obliged to ſubmit to their Yoke. In the third, I have related, though in a very general Manner, the Affairs of the Heptarchy of the Anglo-Saxons, their Wars, the Succeſſion of their Kings in each of the ſeven Kingdoms, and have concluded with ſhowing this ſame Heptarchy turned into a real Monarchy.

It remains now that I ſpeak of the Converſion of the Anglo-Saxons to the Chriſtian Religion, and give a Repreſentation of the Church of England in her Primitive State, wherein conſiſts the principal part of the Engliſh Hiſtory during the Heptarchy.

STATE of the Church of ENGLAND,

FROM THE

Converſion of the Engliſh, to the Diſſolution of the Heptarchy.

WE have ſeen, in the ſecond Book, the horrid Deſolation of the Britiſh Church, whilſt expos'd to the Barbarity of the Saxons, who thought it their Duty to perſecute the Chriſtians. We ſhall now behold theſe very Saxons from Perſecutors grown Chriſtians, by the Direction of divine Providence, which inceſſantly watches for the Welfare of Mankind, forming a flouriſhing Church in the ſame Places where they had exercis'd their Cruelties. 'Tis not our Buſineſs to dive into the Reaſons of God's aſſigning different Periods to the ſeveral Nations of the World, for leading them into the way of Salvation. It is ſufficient for us to know and admire, that when the happy time is come, not only no Obſtacle can obſtruct the Execution of his Deſigns, but on the contrary, every thing helps to accompliſh them: Nay, the weakeſt Inſtruments, in the hands of the Almighty acquire an irreſiſtible Force.

In order to have a clear and diſtinct Knowledge of the manner of the Converſion of the Anglo Saxons, and of the moſt remarkable Occurrences from the Foundation of their Churches, to the Diſſolution of the Heptarchy, England muſt be conſider'd not, as it is at preſent, one Realm, but as divided into ſeven diſtinct Kingdoms. Theſe Kingdoms being converted at different times, it will be neceſſary to treat of each of them by itſelf. And therefore, I am now about to relate how the Goſpel was received by every one of them in particular, with the moſt memorable tranſactions in reſpect to Religion, from their Converſion to their being reduced under the Dominion of Egbert, the firſt real Monarch of England.

The CHURCH of KENT.

The State of the Church of Kent.

AS Kent was firſt converted, I ſhall begin with that Kingdom. But becauſe ſeveral Accidents conſpired to this Event, it will be proper, in order to have a juſt Notion of the Thing, to ſet them all in one View before the Reader.

I have ſpoken in the Hiſtory of Kent, of Ethelbert's Power over the reſt of the Kings of the Heptarchy, and intimated, that his Neighbourhood to, and Alliance with France, did not a little contribute towards it. For this Reaſon he omitted nothing to cultivate a ſtrict Friendſhip with the French, well knowing how much it might turn to his Advantage. The Means he judged moſt proper to this End, was the demanding a French Princeſs in Marriage; accordingly he caſt his Eyes on Bertha, Daughter of Cherebert, King of Paris. He at firſt met with ſome Obſtacle. Chilperic, who, after his Brother Cherebert's Death, had been as a Father to this Princeſs, would not hear a word of the Match, on account of Ethelbert's being an Idolater; and this for ſome time put a ſtop to the Matter. But Ethelbert found Means to remove this Difficulty, by promiſing to let Bertha have the free Exerciſe of her Religion, and bring over with her a certain Number of Eccleſiaſticks. Upon theſe Terms the Princeſs was given him in Marriage. Chilperick her Uncle, was in hopes that as ſhe was thoroughly grounded in her Religion, ſhe would be ſo far from turning Heathen herſelf, that ſhe would contribute to the Converſion of the Engliſh Monarch. And in this his Expectations were anſwered. As ſoon as they came together, ſhe ſpared no pains to gain his Love and Eſteem by her affable and condeſcending Behaviour. Ethelbert, charm'd with the good Qualities of his Spouſe, had all the Value and Affection for her ſhe could deſire. In this agreeable Situation Bertha juſtly hoped to bring the King at length to have favourable Thoughts of the Chriſtian Religion, and therefore took all Occaſions to diſplay the Goſpel Truths in the moſt affecting manner. Beſides, the Converſations Ethelbert had from time to time with Luidhard Biſhop of Soiſſons, who came over with the Queen, contributed very much to her Deſign. In a ſhort time, Ethelbert was ſo wrought upon, that if he had not yet Reſpect enough for the Chriſtian Religion to embrace it, at leaſt he had no Averſion to the Goſpel or thoſe that profeſſed it.

In this favourable Juncture it was that Pope Gregory I. 596.
ſent Miſſionaries into England to inſtruct the Engliſh in the Knowledge of the Goſpel. Gildas and Bede reproach the Britons bitterly for ſuffering their Neighbours to live ſo long in Paganiſm, without offering them their Aſſiſtance to free them from their Errors. But they blame them without Cauſe. It is eaſy to ſee, that whilſt the Saxons oppreſſed the Natives with all imaginable Cruelties, theſe laſt were very unfit Inſtruments to inſtruct their Perſecutors. Beſides, their continual Wars gave the Saxons no time to turn their Thoughts to religious Affairs. But when they came to be ſettled, Aſſiſtance was not wanting, and though it came from far, it was no leſs effectual than if it had flowed from their Neighbours. As this here is a very remarkable Epocha in the Engliſh Hiſtory, it will be proper to ſhow the ſecret Ways made uſe of by Providence in the Execution of its Deſigns in favour of this Nation. In order to this, it will be neceſſary to look back a little to what happened before.

Bede, l. 1. c. 22.

About eighteen or twenty Years before the Arrival of the Roman Miſſionaries, in the Reign of Alla King of Deira, ſome young Children were ſent from thence to Rome to be ſold. That ſort of Trade was then commonly drove by the Engliſh, who made no ſcruple of ſelling their Children, when over-ſtocked. Theſe young Slaves, being expoſed to ſale in the publick Market, drew the Eyes of vaſt Numbers of People upon them, who could not admire them enough. Among the reſt, Gregory, Archdeacon of Rome, beheld them very attentively. He enquired particularly after the place of their Birth, and the Religion there profeſſed. As ſoon as he knew they were Engliſh (1), and born of idolatrous Parents, he reſolved to go and preach the Goſpel to that Nation; and having obtain'd the Pope's Licenſe, prepared for his Journey. But the Romans, who had a great Veneration for him, petitioned the Pope not to deprive them of ſo uſeful a Paſtor; and the Pope complied with their Requeſt. Thus Gregory's Deſign remained unexecuted. The time appointed by God for the Converſion of the Engliſh was not yet come; and probably, ſuch were then the Circumſtances of the Nation, Gregory's Undertaking would have met with great Difficulties. All England was troubled with Wars and Commotions, which broke out afreſh continually. Ethelbert had not yet eſpouſed Bertha; his Mind as yet was unprepared for the Reception of the Goſpel, and being Vaſſal to Ceaulin, he had but little Power to encourage Gregory's Deſign. But afterwards, all Circumſtances were equally favourable, and helped to promote it. Gregory, now become Biſhop of Rome, called to mind his former Project of converting the Engliſh; and though by reaſon of his Dignity, which obliged him to reſide at Rome, he could not go in Perſon, he ſent thoſe whom he thought capable of inſpiring the People with a Reliſh for the Goſpel. He choſe for this Purpoſe forty Benedictine Monks, with Auſtin at their Head, in quality of Abbot (2). In all appearance, Bertha had acquainted the Pope how well affected the King her Husband ſtood

(1) Bede has either invented or elſe heard that Pope Gregory made divers Latin Alluſions upon the Anſwers to his Queſtions concerning thoſe Boys. Particularly being told they were Angli, he replied, Bene, nam Angelicam habent faciem. Hence ſome have imagined (particularly Verſtegan) that the Name of Angli comes from Angelus. Whereas it is plain, their being call'd Angli gave occaſion to Gregory's Pun.

with regard to Religion, ſince they were ordered to land in Kent. Auſtin and his Companions (1) having paſſed through France, where they were ſupplied with Interpreters, arrived at the Iſle of Thanet (2), in the year of our 597. Lord 597. As ſoon as they were landed, he ſent the Bede, l. 1. c. 25. King word, that he was come into his Dominions with a Company of very honeſt Men, to bring him a meſſage of the greateſt Importance, and inſtruct him in what would procure him everlaſting Happineſs. Upon this Information, Ethelbert ordered them to ſtay where they were, deſigning to go himſelf and hear from their own Mouths the occaſion of their Journey. Some few days after, he went to the Iſle of Thanet, in company with the Queen, who, in all likelihood, was not ignorant of the Reaſon of Auſtin's coming. As ſoon as the King arrived, he ſeated himſelf in the open Air, being apprehenſive, as Bede ſays, of Charms or Spells, which in the open Field, he thought, could have no Power over him. Then ordering the Strangers to be called before him, he asked them what they had to propoſe. Auſtin, who was the Spokeſman, made a long Harangue, preaching the Goſpel in a forcible and zealous manner, ſays the ſame Hiſtorian, though he relates not one word of his Sermon. Ethelbert, informed by the Interpreters what Auſtin had ſaid, returned him this Anſwer: "Your Propoſals are noble, and your Promiſes "inviting. But I cannot reſolve upon quitting the Reli- "gion of my Anceſtors, for one that appears to me ſup- "ported only by the Teſtimony of Perſons that are en- "tire Strangers to me. However, ſince, as I perceive, "you have undertaken ſo long a Journey on purpoſe to "impart to us what you deem moſt important and valua- "ble, you ſhall not be ſent away without ſome Satisfaction. "I will take care you are treated civily in my Domini- "ons, and ſupplied with all Things neceſſary and conve- "nient. And if any of my Subjects, convinced by what "you ſhall ſay to them, deſire to embrace your Religion, "I ſhall not be againſt it."

This firſt Step being taken, the Queen got leave for the Miſſionaries to ſettle at Canterbury, the Capital of Kent, where ſhe took care to provide them with convenient Lodgings, and procure them the liberty of preaching to as many as had the Curioſity to hear them. They made ſo good uſe of this favourable Juncture, that in a ſhort time ſeveral of the principal Saxons embraced the Chriſtian Faith. The ſwift Progreſs of the Goſpel at Canterbury, raiſed the King's Curioſity to be more particularly inſtructed in the 598. nature of the Religion thoſe Strangers preached. At length,
Bede. Fl. Wig. Thorn. by the Perſuaſions of the Queen, and frequent Conferences with Auſtin, he received Baptiſm, about a year after the arrival of the Miſſionaries. The Converſion of the King being followed by that of Multitudes of his Subjects, the Queen's Chapel, which ſtood without the City (3), ſoon became too little to hold them. And therefore they were obliged to turn one of the Heathen Temples into a Church,
Bede, l. 1. c. 33. which was dedicated to St. Pancrace. Shortly after ſeveral other Temples were ſerved in the ſame manner by Ethelbert's Order, and the Foundations of Canterbury Cathedral were laid; which was dedicated to St. Peter and St. Paul, and was afterwards called St. Thomas. Auſtin began alſo a Monaſtery which he had not the Satisfaction to ſee finiſhed. Peter, one of his Companions, was the firſt Abbot. It was called the Monaſtery of St. Auguſtin, from its Founder. Ethelbert at length leaving Canterbury to the Cam. in Cant. Italian Monks, went and kept his Court at Reculver.

Thus began the Converſion of the Saxons in England. Auſtin and his Fellow-labourers were the Inſtruments made uſe of by Divine Providence to turn them from their idolatrous Superſtitions to the Light of the Goſpel; a Bleſſing their Brethren in Germany enjoyed not till Two hundred years after, in the reign of Charles the Great. Ethelbert promoted to his utmoſt the Converſion of his Subjects, but without uſing the leaſt Violence or Compulſion, having learnt of his Inſtructors, as Bede expreſly obſerves, that Bede, l. 1. c. 26. Gregor. Ep. L. vii. Ep. 30. God requires none to ſerve him, but thoſe who do it with a willing Mind. It were to be wiſhed, all Chriſtian Princes would follow his Example! The Saxons were ſo eager to embrace the Goſpel, that, if Hiſtorians may be credited, Auſtin in one day baptized Ten thouſand in the River Swale, which runs into the Thames.

This ſwift Progreſs of the Goſpel in Kent making Auſtin believe he ſhould meet with the ſame Succeſs every where, he looked upon all England as already converted. Poſſeſſed with this Notion, he haſtened to Arles, to get himſelf conſecrated Archbiſhop of the Saxons, by Etherius [or Vigilius,] then Archbiſhop of that Place. Had he been contented with the bare Title of Biſhop, one ſhould not have wondered at it (4). But it is really ſurprizing, that he ſhould aſpire to the Archiepiſcopal Dignity, at a time when he had no Biſhop under his Juriſdiction. It is true the Pope had promiſed to make him an Archbiſhop, in caſe his Miſſion met with Succeſs. But in all appearance, Gregory, by Succeſs, meant the Converſion of the Engliſh Nation in general, and not of a part only of one of the leaſt Kingdoms in the Heptarchy. How great Progreſs ſoever Auſtin had made for the time he had been in England, yet was it nothing in compariſon of what remained to be done. His haſte therefore to be made Archbiſhop and Primate of England, when there was but one ſingle Church there, does not redound much to his Credit. All that can be ſaid in his Juſtification, is, that the Progreſs of Chriſtianity at Canterbury, made him imagine the Converſion of all England was at hand. And indeed, not long after his return from 603.
Arles, he erected an Epiſcopal See at Rocheſter, of which Juſtus, one of his Companions, was the firſt Biſhop. Hence it is plain, the Goſpel had alſo been preached in that City, and made ſome Progreſs there.

Auſtin muſt needs have entertained great Hopes of his Bede, l. 1. c. 27. Miſſion, ſince fearing he ſhould want Labourers in the approaching Harveſt, he ſends Peter and Laurence, with two others of his Companions, before-hand to Rome, to acquaint the Pope with his Wants, and inform him how Matters ſtood. He took this Opportunity alſo to deſire the Pope's Reſolution of certain Queſtions, which appeared to him difficult, and might, he foreſaw, puzzle him in the Government of the new Church.

The Letters of Auſtin, and the Accounts of thoſe he had ſent, inſpired Gregory with ſo high a Conceit of this Miſſion, that looking upon the Converſion of the Engliſh as accompliſhed, though it was but juſt begun, he ſent the Pall (5) to Auſtin, as a Mark of Diſtinction and Honour to this new Apoſtle. He ordered him alſo to erect Biſhops Sees Greg. Ep. 15. l. 11. in ſeveral Places, particularly at York, where was to be a Metropolitan with twelve Suffragans, and that after the Death of one of the two Archbiſhops, the Survivor ſhould conſecrate another in his Place, and have the Precedence of him (6). The reaſon of this Preference with regard to York, was, becauſe it had formerly, under the Romans, been an Archbiſhoprick as well as London and Caerleon. As for this laſt, it being then in the Hands of the Britons, and already an Archbiſhop's See, though not under the Pope's Juriſdiction, there was no occaſion to mention it. Gregory's Intent therefore in making London an Archbi-
Rog. Wen. M. Weſt. G. Malmſb. l. 1. c. 4. ſhoprick, was to reſtore Things to their former State. But however, he afterwards altered his Meaſures at the inſtance of Auſtin, who was deſirous of procuring that Honour for Canterbury, the Metropolis of Kent, where he had begun to exerciſe his Miniſterial Functions. The Pope's View then, was only to put Things upon an antient foot, when in his Anſwer to Auſtin, he told him he meant, that the two Archbiſhops of London and York ſhould be independent of one another, however, that Auſtin during Life, ſhould have Juriſdiction, as well over them, as all the reſt of the Biſhops of Great-Britain.

But all the Pains Gregory was at, came to nothing for the preſent, ſince the Chriſtian Religion was far enough from extending to Northumberland. However, the great Hopes he had conceived from the Letters and Meſſengers of Auſtin, induced him to give Directions concerning the Engliſh Churches, juſt as if they had been really formed. Beſides theſe general Orders, he exhorted Auſtin, in the ſame Letter (7), not to be elated at his having received from Heaven the Gift of Miracles, which makes it probable, word had been ſent him, that ſeveral Miracles had been wrought by Auſtin. He charged him alſo, not to pull down ſuch Idol Temples as were fit to be converted into Churches, but to conſecrate them by ſprinkling Holy-Water, and placing Relicks under the Altars. And ſince the Saxons had been accuſtomed to offer Sacrifices to their Greg. Ep. l. 9. Ep. 59, 60.

601. Bede.

1. Queſtion. How are Biſhops to behave with reſpect to their Clergy? Into how many Portions are the Offerings at the Altar to be divided? And how ought a Biſhop to act in the Church?

For Satisfaction in the firſt Point, the Pope refers him to St. Paul's Epiſtle to Timothy. To the ſecond he anſwers, That it was the Cuſtom of the Church to divide the Offerings into four Parts, one for the Biſhop; another for the Clergy; a third for the Poor; and a fourth for the Repairs of the Churches. As to the laſt Article, which would have been very obſcure, had not the Pope cleared it in his Anſwer, he replies, That Auſtin being a Monk, ought not to live apart from the reſt of the Clergy, but according to the Practice of the Primitive Chriſtians, Act. iv. 32. ſhould have all things in common (1). He adds, if there were any Clerks not admitted into Holy Orders, who could not live continently, they were to marry, and receive the Stipends at their own Houſes, according to the words of Scripture, Diſtribution was made to each of them according to every one's Wants. As for other Chriſtians, he ſays, there was no need to preſcribe any Rules in relation to their Alms-giving, ſince our Saviour himſelf ſays, Give Alms of ſuch things as you have, and behold all things are clean unto you.

II. Queſtion. Since there is but one Faith, how comes it that there are different Cuſtoms in Churches, one manner of ſaying Maſs in the Roman, and another in the Gallican Church?

The Pope adviſes him to ſelect from each Church, what he thought moſt convenient for the Church of England.

III. Queſtion. What Puniſhment ought to be inflicted on him that has ſtole any thing from the Church?

Gregory replies, The Motives of the Theft muſt be conſidered, whether it was done out of Neceſſity or Covetouſneſs, and the Puniſhment to be proportioned accordingly, with Charity and Temper. As for Reſtitution, God forbid the Church ſhould receive more than ſhe loſt.

IV. Queſtion. Whether two Brothers may marry two Siſters, that are no way related to them?

Gregory anſwers, This may be done very lawfully.

V. Queſtion. To what Degree of Conſanguinity are Marriages forbid?

The Pope anſwers, To the ſecond Degree incluſively and no farther. He would not however have thoſe ſeparated who have married within the prohibited Degrees before their Converſion, becauſe they did it out of Ignorance. But he would have all the new Converts charged not to preſume to do any ſuch thing, and in caſe they did, to be debarred the Communion.

VI. Queſtion. Whether a ſingle Biſhop may ordain another, without the Aſſiſtance of other Biſhops, when the Length of the Journey makes it inconvenient for them to meet?

Gregory replies, That ſince Auſtin was now the only Biſhop in England, he might conſecrate others without any Aſſiſtance. But in order to avoid the like Inconvenience for the future, he would have him place Biſhops ſo, as that they might not be at too great a Diſtance from one another.

VII. Queſtion. How ought I to manage with the Biſhops of Gaul?

The Pope tells him, That he allows him no manner of Juriſdiction over them, becauſe he had no deſign to deprive the Archbiſhop of Arles of the Authority he was in poſſeſſion of.

VIII. Queſtion. Whether a Woman with Child ought to be baptized?

The Pope anſwers, He ſaw no Inconvenience attending it.

IX. Queſtion. How long after her lying in, ought a Woman to come into the Church?

Anſwer. If ſhe comes into the Church the minute after her Delivery, ſhe ſins not.

X. Queſtion. How long after the Birth, ought the baptizing of an Infant to be deferred?

Anſwer. A Child may be baptized the Moment he is born.

XI. Queſtion. How long, after a lying-in, muſt it be before a Man and his Wife come together again?

Gregory is very large in his Anſwer, and takes occaſion to blame Mothers for not ſuckling their own Children, attributing the Riſe of ſo ill a Cuſtom to their Incontinency. And therefore he decides, that the Husband ought not to have to do with his Wife till the Child is weaned (2).

XII. Queſtion. May a Woman, during ſome certain times, come into the Church?

The Pope ſays a great deal on this head, and concludes, Womens Infirmities ought to be no Obſtacle to their going to Church and praying to God.

XIII. Queſtion. May a Man that has lain with his Wife, come into the Church or receive the Sacrament, before he has waſhed himſelf?

The Pope here, as uſual, makes a great many Diſtinctions, and concludes, ſuch a Man had better abſtain from both for ſome time.

XIV. Queſtion. May a Man after an Impure Dream, receive the Communion, or if he be a Prieſt, adminiſter it?

The Pope's Anſwer is full of Diſtinctions about what is, and what is not Sin: And concludes at laſt, a man in the Caſe mentioned ought not to communicate. He gives leave however, for a Prieſt in the ſame Caſe, to adminiſter the Sacrament, if there is no other in the way to officiate for him.

Theſe are the Difficulties Auſtin wanted the Pope to reſolve, which don't ſerve to give us any great Idea of the Abilities of this famous Apoſtle. However, Gregory thought fit to anſwer them fully and diſtinctly, as if they had been of the utmoſt Importance. He had the Converſion of the Engliſh ſo much at heart, that inſtead of giving Auſtin the leaſt Diſcouragement, he extolled him mightily.

Auſtin's Care was not confined to the Converſion of the Saxons only. He undertook alſo, what ſeemed to him no leſs worthy of his Zeal, the bringing the Britiſh Biſhops to a conformity with the Roman Church (3), and the making them acknowledge the Pope's Juriſdiction. As this is a remarkable Circumſtance of Auſtin's Life, it will be neceſſary to enlarge upon it a little. This Deſign of his was not eaſy to be executed. The Britons thought they could juſtify their adhering to the ſame Rites and Cuſtoms they had practiſed ever ſince the Converſion of Britain. Beſides, they could not conceive, upon what grounds they were obliged to conform to a Church ſo remote, or what Advantage the owning the Pope's Authority would be to them. Theſe Difficulties did not diſcourage Auſtin. He had, beſides his Zeal for the See of Rome, another, and perhaps no leſs powerful Motive, to induce him to this Undertaking, which was his Claim to the Primacy of all Britain, by virtue of the Pope's Grant. Now, this he could never hope to attain, whilſt the Britiſh Churches were independent of the Pope. He applied therefore all his Endeavours to accompliſh this Enterprize, which coſt him more Pains and Trouble than the Converſion of the Saxons, without having after all the Satisfaction of reaping the Fruits of his Labour.

Bede, l. 2. c. 2.

The Goſpel, as I before obſerved, was preached in Britain, either by the Apoſtles themſelves, or by ſome of their Diſciples. From thoſe early Days, the Britons had conſtantly adhered to the Cuſtoms and Rules preſcribed to them by their firſt Teachers. But the Church of Rome had made ſeveral Innovations in the Divine Service, to which they pretended all other Churches ought to conform. The Oppoſition the Biſhops of Rome every where met with, was not capable to make them drop their Pretenſions. Altho' this Difference was of no great conſequence, it cauſed however, towards the end of the ſecond Century, a moſt ſcandalous Quarrel between Pope Victor I, and the Churches of Aſia; which roſe to that Height, that the Pope for no other reaſon, excommunicated them All. This Affair had never been judicially decided: yet for all that the Biſhops of Rome ſtuck to their Claims, and did all that lay in their power to compaſs their Ends. The Weſtern Churches, as neareſt Rome, were leaſt difficult to be prevailed with. Almoſt All, except the Churches of Gaul and Milan, conformed at length to the Roman Ritual.

(1) Here in ſome Books is the ſecond Queſtion inſerted, which runs thus: I deſire to know, whether Clergymen that cannot contain, may marry; and if they marry, whether they muſt return to a ſecular Life? See Spelman Conc. Vol. I. p. 96.

(2) However, he allows thoſe that do not ſuckle their children, to come together after the uſual time of Purgation.

(3) Viz. about the Celebration of Eaſter, Bede, l. 2. c. 2. Huntingd. p. 325. The Britons uſed, for finding Eaſter, the Cycle of eighty-four years, which was called the Roman Account. But about eighty years after the renting of the Roman Empire, the Romans left off the uſe of that Cycle, and took up another of nineteen years; and when they had uſed this about eighteen years, coming then to have to do with theſe northern Nations, they would needs have impoſed the uſe of it upon them, as a Condition of their Communion; and this was what Auſtin attempted to do. See Bp Lloyd's Hiſtor. Account, p. 67, &c.

But

But Britain, being ſtill as it were out of the World, had, ſince the Embaſſy of Lucius to Pope Eleutherius, held very little Communication with the Biſhops of Rome. The Britons conſidered them only as Biſhops of a particular Dioceſe, or at moſt but as Patriarchs, on whom the Britiſh Church had not the leaſt Dependance. So far were they from owning the Pope's Authority, that they did not ſo much as know he pretended to have any over them. But Auſtin, out of the abundance of his Zeal for the See of Rome, took upon him to bring them to acknowledge the Pope as Head of the Church in general. It is a difficult matter to know how far Auſtin's Deſigns reached, ſince it does not appear he had any Inſtructions from Gregory I. who aſpired not to that exorbitant Power attributed afterwards to his Succeſſors. It muſt however be owned, that Gregory laid claim to a Superiority over the Britiſh Churches, ſince in his Letter to Auſtin, he put the whole Iſland entirely under the Juriſdiction of the new Archbiſhop. Indeed it is not to be ſuppoſed Auſtin would have inſiſted ſo much upon that Point, had he not been ſure of being ſupported in it. However this be, he left no Stone unturned to attain his Ends.

The beſt way, as he thought, of proceeding in this Affair, was to get the Britiſh Biſhops to meet him in a Synod, in order to debate upon what he had to propoſe to them. This being agreed to, he omitted nothing that might win them to do as he deſired. But neither Promiſes nor Threats could prevail with the Britiſh Prelates, to admit of the leaſt Change in their antient Cuſtoms. Bede tells us that Auſtin, finding no good was to be done by Arguments, cauſed a Saxon blind Man to be brought into the Aſſembly, and when the Britons had tried in vain to cure him, he reſtored him to his Sight by his Prayers. But, whether the Miracle admitted of ſome Diſpute, becauſe the blind Man was a Saxon; or Bede, who lived long after the Fact, was wrong informed; the Britons ſtood out againſt this Evidence. All Auſtin could obtain, was, that they would meet again, and determine the Matter in a more numerous Synod (1). At this ſecond Council were preſent ſeven Britiſh Biſhops (2), accompanied with Dinoth Abbot of Bangor, who brought ſeveral of his Monks along with him. Before they came to the Synod, they adviſed with a Hermit of great Repute among them, how they ſhould behave in this Affair. The good old Man told them, he ſaw no reaſon to admit of any Alterations in their Divine Service upon the bare Requeſt of a Man to them entirely unknown: But however, as the Eſſence of Religion conſiſted in Union and Charity, it would not be amiſs to comply in ſome meaſure with Auſtin, provided he was a Holy Man, and one ſent from God. Whereupon the Biſhops deſired to be informed how they ſhould know whether he was ſuch a Perſon or not. He replied, they ſhould know it by his Humility, the moſt unqueſtionable Mark of a true Chriſtian: and they would ſee whether he was endued with this Virtue, by his reſpectful riſing up to ſalute them at their coming into the Council-Room; for if he paid them not that Civility, it was a ſure Token of his Pride. Purſuant to this Advice, they took care to come laſt upon the Place. And upon Auſtin's not ſtirring from his ſeat to ſalute them, they conceived an invincible Prejudice againſt him. Thus for a Default in point of Civility, his whole Scheme that had coſt him ſo much Pains and Trouble, fell to the Ground.

Dinoth's Speech to Auſtin. Spelman Conc. Vol. I. p. 108.

Bede, l. 2. c. 8.

As Auſtin in the Synod was earneſtly preſſing the Britons to ſubmit to the Pope, and carrying the Papal Prerogatives to a great height, Dinoth, Abbot of Bangor, made him this Anſwer: "You propoſe to us Obedience to the "Church of Rome; are you ignorant that we already owe "a Deference to the Church of God, to the Biſhop of "Rome, and to all Chriſtians, of Love and Charity, "which obliges us to endeavour by all poſſible means to "aſſiſt and do them all the good we can? Other Obedience than this to him you call Pope, we know not "of, and this we are always ready to pay. But for a "Superior, what need have we to go ſo far as Rome, "when we are governed, under God, by the Biſhop of "Caerleon, who hath Authority to take care of our "Churches and Spiritual Affairs? (3)." It is ſaid Auſtin deſpairing to overcome their Obſtinacy, after a long Diſpute, cried out, full of Indignation, Since you refuſe Peace from your Brethren, you ſhall have War from your Enemies; and ſince you will not join with us in preaching the Word of eternal Life to your Neighbours, you ſhall receive Death at their Hands. Hence it appears, that Auſtin had not only preſſed the Britons to a Conformity with the Church of Rome, and Obedience to the Papal Authority, but alſo had reproached them for their Negligence and want of Zeal, in not promoting the Converſion of the Saxons. Perhaps he deſigned to intimate to them, that the Converſion of all England ſtuck only at the Union he propoſed to them. However this be, theſe Words of Auſtin were looked upon as a Prediction of the Maſſacre of the Monks of Bangor, mentioned in the Hiſtory of Northumberland. I leave the Reader to judge whether the Non-compliance of the Abbot of Bangor to Auſtin's Propoſal, was a Crime of ſuch a Nature as to deſerve ſo ſevere a Puniſhment.

Auſtin not having the Succeſs he expected in this Affair, confined himſelf within the true Bounds of his Miſſion, and cauſed the Goſpel to be preached to the Eaſt-Saxons by Mellitus, one of the Miſſionaries ſent him by the Pope, of whom I ſhall ſpeak more fully, when I come to the Converſion of that Nation. 604.

Theſe, in ſhort, are the Tranſactions of Auſtin, commonly called the Apoſtle of the Engliſh, during the eight Years he lived in England. He arrived in 597, and died in 605, according to the generally-received Opinion. Some affirm he died ſooner, and others, though without grounds, bring his Death down to 613 (4). He was buried at Canterbury near the Cathedral, which was not then finiſhed, with this Inſcription on his Tomb (5).

Here lies Auguſtin, the firſt Archbiſhop of Dorobern, who having been ſent hither by Gregory Pontiff of Rome, and ſupported by the Co-operation of God with Miracles, converted King Ethelbert and his Nation to the Faith; and having accompliſhed the Days of his Miniſtry, departed this Life the 7th of the Calends of June, in the Reign of the ſaid King. Bede, l. 2. c. 3.

Auſtin was ſucceeded by Laurentius (6), who was as ſolicitous to reduce the Britons to the Obedience of the Pope, and a Conformity to the Roman Church in the Celebration of Eaſter. He wrote very preſſing Letters to them, wherein he upbraided them for their Obſtinacy, bitterly complaining, that a Scotch Biſhop, Dagham by name, paſſing through Canterbury, had refuſed to eat with him, on account of their difference of Opinion concerning Eaſter-Day. But his Letters proved of no Effect. Malmſb. G. Pontif. Gervas. Bede, l. 2. c. 4.

Gregory I. pretended not to a Juriſdiction over the Britiſh Churches, as Univerſal Biſhop; a Title he was ſo far from aſſuming, that he had declaimed againſt it with great Diſlike. However, in all appearance, he believed he might as Patriarch of the Weſt, claim the Obedience of the Britiſh as well as Engliſh Biſhops, to his ſpiritual Juriſdiction. But Boniface IV, who not long after Gregory I, was promoted to the See of Rome, being ſupported by the Emperor Phocas, took upon him the Title of Univerſal Biſhop. This was a freſh Motive for the Miſſionaries in England to renew their Endeavours to bring the Britons to own his Authority; but they could not prevail with them. And therefore Mellitus was ſent to Rome for Inſtructions from the Pope upon this Head. But the Death of Ethelbert (7), which happened in the mean time, cauſed them to lay aſide all Thoughts of this Matter, and reduced the Chriſtians to a deplorable condition. Edbald, Son and Succeſſor of Ethelbert, being turned Pagan again, the Miſſionaries loſt that powerful Protection they had till then ſo proſperouſly enjoyed. To compleat their Misfortunes, Sebert King of Eſſex, who had been converted by Mellitus, dying alſo a little after (8), his three Sons who jointly ſucceeded him, apoſtatiz'd from Chriſtianity, and forbad Mellitus, who was come back from Rome, to remain in their Dominions. He fled to Laurentius Archbiſhop of Canterbury, as did alſo Juſtus, Biſhop of Rocheſter, the Inhabitants of that Place having in all appear- 606. 610.

ance abandoned the Faith. These three Prelates, having consulted together, resolved upon going into France, and leaving the reprobate Saxons to themselves. This shows either that the people of Kent and Essex went all back to Paganism, or that there were not so many converts as Gregory was made to believe. Mellitus and Justus went off, according to their Resolution; but Laurentius staid behind, though with intent to follow them in a short time.

Bede, l. 2. c. 6. When he was ready to depart, it is affirmed, that lying one night in his Church, St. Peter appeared to him, and scourged him severely, as a punishment for offering to abandon his Mission. The day after he went to Edbald, and having shewn him the marks of the scourge, he converted him, and persuaded him to disengage himself from his unlawful marriage; he having taken his Father's widow to wife. So far is certain, Edbald was converted: All Historians are unanimous in That: but I cannot warrant the truth of St. Peter's apparition. Edbald being thus returned to the Faith, recalled Justus and Mellitus, and restored them to their respective Dioceses of Rochester and London. But the East-Saxons at London refusing to admit Mellitus, he returned to Kent, where he soon after succeeded Laurentius in the Archbishoprick of Canterbury (1).

Bede, l. 2. c. 7. He is said by his prayers to have put a stop to a great fire, that in all probability would have reduced the City to ashes, and to have wrought several other

After his death, there was a vacancy for four years (3). Egbert and Oswy, Kings of Kent and Northumberland, having held a conference together about the affairs of the Church, resolved to send Wighard a Kentish Priest to be consecrated Archbishop of Canterbury at Rome. Wighard dying there, Vitalian the Pope cast his eyes upon Adrian and Andrew, two Monks, who both refused the Archbishoprick, as too great a burden

668. for them. Theodorus a Greek, Native of Tarsus in Cilicia,

Bede, l. 4. c. 1. to whom it was also offered, not having the same scruples, was consecrated at Rome, and departed for England. The Pope ordered Adrian to go with him, lest, says a Historian, Theodorus, being a Greek, might introduce customs in Britain contrary to those of the Church of Rome. As this Prelate was the most famous that in those early times filled the See of Canterbury, it will not be amiss to take a fuller view of him.

Theodorus was a Prelate of distinguished worth, as well for learning, as greatness of mind, and solidity of Judgment. But he was of a warm and imperious temper, a lover of power, and could ill brook any opposition to his Will. Whilst he was Archbishop of Canterbury, he had frequent opportunities of extending his jurisdiction over all England, which he never neglected, as we shall see hereafter in the account of the ecclesiastical affairs of the other kingdoms, particularly of Northumberland. I shall only observe here, that during his Life, he alone exercised the archiepiscopal functions, which gave him an opportunity of

Bede, l. 1. c. 29. incroaching upon the rights of the See of York; though

669. Gregory I. had ordered, that after the death of Austin, the two Archbishopricks should be independent of each other. As soon as he came into England, he made a Visitation of all the Churches in his jurisdiction, and brought the People to a thorough conformity in the divine Service, to the usage of the Church of Rome.

As the English were yet very ignorant, Theodorus endeavoured to the utmost of his power to instruct them, by erecting a School or Seminary at Crecklade (4), where he and Adrian, besides Divinity, taught Arithmetick, Musick,

Bede, l. 4. c. 2. Astronomy, Greek and Latin. Bede assures us, he knew several of their Scholars, that could express themselves as readily in Greek and Latin as in their own Language. Theodorus was not satisfied with promoting the love of learning among the English, by Exhortations and Instructions only, but also by the Books he brought, and sent for, into England; some of which are still extant in Manuscript, as David's Psalms, St. Chrysostom's Homilies, and Homer, all written in a beautiful Hand. He composed himself a large work called Pœnitentiale, which remained not long since entire at Cambridge (5), but is not to be Journ. des. Scav. 1678. found there now. In 1677, extracts of it, with some other of his treatises, were published at Paris, with notes by Jacobus Petitus (6).

Theodorus died in 690; but the See was not filled till two 692. years after, by Berthwald Abbot of Reculver (7), who, Bede, l. 5. having been Archbishop thirty-eight years (8), gave place c. 9. 24. by his death to Tatwine, a person of great Learning and 731. Probity. He exercised his archiepiscopal functions near two years before he received the Pall; which is a clear evidence it was not yet thought an absolutely necessary qualification for an Archbishop. Tatwine dying in 735, Nothelm, 735. a priest of the Diocese of London, succeeded him, and went and received the Pall at Rome, where he was consecrated by Gregory III. He died in 741, and the year 742. following, Cuthbert Bishop of Hereford, was chosen in his room. To him succeeded Bregwin of a noble family in 759. Germany. This Prelate was exemplary for his religious Gervas. and holy life, during the two years he held the See. Jambert [or Lambert] Abbot of St. Austin's, was his successor. He had the mortification to see the Churches of Mercia and East-Anglia wrested from his jurisdiction, by the erecting Lichfield into an Archbishop's See, in the reign of Offa. Notwithstanding all his endeavours, he could neither prevent it, nor recover his rights. Athelard his successor was more fortunate, for he obtained what his predecessor had sued for in vain. So the Churches of Mercia and East-Anglia were again subject to the jurisdiction of the See of Canterbury. Wulfrid who succeeded him in 804, was living at the time the Heptarchy was reduced to a Monarchy.

Before we leave the Church of Kent, it will be proper to observe, that Gregory's scheme, who had ordered Canterbury and York should be both Archbishops Sees, and independent of one another, remained unexecuted, upon several accounts. In the first place, the Northumbrians did not receive the Gospel so soon as that Pope expected. Again, They all deserted the Faith, after the retreat of Paulinus, who had received the Pall. Lastly, the troubles Northumberland was continually disturbed with, prevented the first Bishops of York, from taking advantage of the Pope's regulation, which besides they did not much regard. This was the reason Theodorus became possessed of all the Authority, as well over the northern, as southern Churches, and that his successors making him their precedent, laid claim to the Primacy of all England, exclusive of the Archbishop of York. This proved, in process of Stubbs. time, the ground of great disputes between the two Archbishops.

The Church of NORTHUMBERLAND.

HAving already given an account of Edwin's marriage with Ethelburga of Kent, I shall only add, that Paulinus, who accompanied her into Northumberland as Bishop of the Northumbrians, spent a whole year at Edwin's court, without making any great progress among people not yet disposed to receive his Instructions. But at length several accidents concurred to encourage his zeal and promote his designs, of which I shall give a particular relation.

Quicelm, one of the Kings of Wessex, bore the yoke of Bede, l. 2. c. 9. Edwin with that impatience, that he resolved to free him- Sax. Ann. self from it, by means of an Assassin, whom he sent to him on some pretence, privately armed with a poisoned dagger. The Ruffian being introduced into the presence-chamber, took his opportunity, and made so furious a Pass at the King, that he was wounded through the body of Lilla his Favourite, who interposed himself, and received the Blow. Paulinus being informed of this accident, hastily ran into the room, and finding Edwin in a great rage with the King of Wessex, told him, God, to whom such wretches were an abomination, would not fail to punish so horrid a villany. It is said that Edwin, whom the Queen had hitherto sollicited in vain, promised at the same time to renounce Idolatry, if the God of the Christians would revenge him of his enemy. At the same instant, news was brought him, that the Queen, after a hard labour, was brought to bed of a Princess, for which he returned thanks to his Gods. Paulinus for his part, having been in great fears for the Queen, fell upon his knees, and thanked God for her deliverance. The Prelate's zeal was so pleasing to the King, that immediately conceiving a favourable opinion of the Christian Religion, he consented Paulinus should baptize the newborn infant. The young Princess, who was named Anfleda was the firſt that received baptiſm in Northumberland (1).

Edwin however, not forgetting the perfidiouſneſs of the King of Weſſex, marched with an army into his dominions, and, after defeating him ſeveral times, compelled him humbly to ſue for peace, and make him ample ſatisfaction. But though he returned with victory according to his wiſh, he deferred the performance of his Promiſes (2). When the Queen and Paulinus preſſed him upon that head, he told them, the quitting his religion ſeemed to him to be of that importance, that he could not reſolve upon it without a thorough examination of matters. And indeed he heartily ſet about it, and frequently conferred with Coifi the Pagan high-prieſt, upon the reaſons alledged by Paulinus in favour of Chriſtianity. Coifi, perceiving the King was very near turning Chriſtian, reſolved with himſelf to make his court to him betimes, by conforming to his will. It would not perhaps be impoſſible in the like caſe, to find ſome of this character among the Chriſtian Clergy.

Bede, l. 2. c. 10. 626. Mean time, the Queen and Paulinus continued to ſollicit the King to perform his promiſe; and to give the greater weight to what they ſaid to him, they got the Pope to write him a Letter. But all would not do; Edwin ſtill demurred, and could not come to a reſolution. At laſt the circumſtances of the Viſion he had formerly ſeen in the Garden of Redowald, being, as it is pretended, revealed to Paulinus, the work was accompliſhed in an extraordinary way. Bede relates, how that one day as the King was ſurrounded with a croud of Courtiers (3), Paulinus came in ſuddenly, and laying his hand on Edwin's head, asked him whether he underſtood the meaning of that Token? At theſe words, Edwin recollecting what had paſſed between him and the Stranger in Redowald's garden, threw himſelf at Paulinus's feet, who, with an air of authority, ſaid to him thus: My Lord, you have eſcaped the hands of your Enemies, and are become a great King. All that was foretold you is come to paſs; it is your duty now to make good your promiſe. Upon hearing this, Edwin is ſaid to reply, He was fully ſatisfied, and ready to receive the Chriſtian Faith. From that moment he ſtrove not only to be better informed himſelf, but alſo to prevail with his ſubjects to follow his example, and embrace the Goſpel. To that end, he believed the beſt way would be, before he publickly declared his intent, to gain ſome of his principal courtiers, whoſe example he did not queſtion, would have a great influence on the reſt of the nation.

Bede, l. 2. c. 13. The greateſt oppoſition was moſt likely to come from Coifi, becauſe it was his intereſt to keep the people attached to the worſhip of Idols. But the King was agreeably ſurprized to find, that inſtead of oppoſing, he was ready to comply with his deſire. One day as the King was diſcourſing with him (4) upon this ſubject, the High-Prieſt, like a good Courtier, ſaid to him: "I have for a good "while been ſeriouſly reflecting on our religion, and on "the nature of our Gods, and muſt own I am not at all "ſatisfied in theſe points, neither can I forbear calling in "queſtion their goodneſs, juſtice, or power. Never per"haps did any perſon ſerve them with greater zeal, re"ſpect and aſſiduity than myſelf. You, Sir, are a wit"neſs with what devotion and care I have all along per"formed the functions of my office; and yet I never "got any thing by it: Neither is there a Man in your "court but what is better preferred than I am. Now, "can I help concluding, that ſince our Gods take ſo "little care of their moſt ſincere worſhippers, they "muſt be either unjuſt, or weak, or rather no Gods at "all?"

Edwin, extremely well pleaſed with this anſwer of the High-Prieſt, had a mind likewiſe to know the ſentiments of another Prieſt (5) that was next in dignity to Coifi; who, encouraged by the example of his Superior, told the King: "Sir, the more we reflect on the nature of our Bede, l. 2. c. 13. "Soul, the leſs we know of it; it is with our Soul, as "with the little Bird that came in the other day at one "of the windows in the room where you ſat at dinner, "and flew out immediately at the other. Whilſt it was "in the room, we knew ſomething about it; but as ſoon "as it was gone, we could not ſay whence it came, or "whither it was flown. Thus our Soul whilſt it ani"mates our Body, we may know ſome of its properties, "but when once ſeparated, we know not whither it goes, "or from whence it came. Since then Paulinus pretends "to give us clearer notions of theſe matters, it is my opi"nion that we give him the hearing, and laying aſide all "paſſion and prejudice, follow that which ſhall appear "moſt conformable to right reaſon."

This advice, that agreed ſo well with the King's intentions, being approved of, it was reſolved Paulinus ſhould explain himſelf upon the ſubject of Religion, in the preſence of the Pontiff and other Prieſts, which was accordingly done. As ſoon as Coifi had heard the Biſhop out, he declared aloud, He could ſee no manner of reaſon to doubt of the truth of the Chriſtian Religion. Edwin being thus ſure of the concurrence of the High-Prieſt and ſome of his principal courtiers, called a Wittenagemot or Parliament, to debate, whether the Chriſtian Religion ſhould be received or not. But the majority being determined already for the affirmative, it paſſed without any oppoſition. Coifi was one of the moſt forward to attack the Pagan worſhip; and being deſirous to ſhow ſome marks of the ſincerity of his converſion, put himſelf at the head of his Prieſts, and marching toward the Heathen temple, darted his Javelin againſt the Idol: After which it was broke in pieces by the 627. King's order, and the temple burnt to the ground (6). The Bede, l. 2. ſame day Edwin was baptized (7), with his niece Hil- c. 14. da (8) afterwards abbeſs of Whitby.

The Northumbrians following the example of their King, Paulinus, who till then had lain idle, on a ſudden found himſelf fully employed, by the prodigious crowds that daily came to be taught and baptized (9). But if it be true, as ſome affirm, that he baptized in one day ten thouſand, his inſtructions muſt needs have been very conciſe (10). A Church of timber was haſtily run up at York for the new converts, who were very numerous. Shortly after, Edwin laid the foundation of a Church of free-ſtone round the former, which ſtood till the other of ſtone was built. He had not the ſatisfaction to finiſh it, which was done by Oſwald his ſucceſſor. Paulinus is ſaid to have 628. preached alſo at Lincoln, where he converted Blecca the Bede, l. 2. Saxon Governor. c. 16.

Thus was Northumberland converted to the Faith of Chriſt. But ſome time after, Edwin being ſlain in bat- 633. tle, ſuch deſolation enſued, that Paulinus being compelled Id. c. 20. to leave the kingdom, the Northumbrians fell back again to idolatry. Anfrid and Oſric, Kings of Deira and Bernicia, followed the example of their ſubjects, though they had been inſtructed in the Chriſtian Religion in Scotland, where they had lived in exile. The apoſtatizing of theſe two princes, and the barbarity of Cadwallo after their death, almoſt quite rooted out Chriſtianity in Northumberland. During theſe calamities, neither Prieſt nor Monk had the courage to attempt the reſtoring the Northumbrians to the Faith. James the deacon, whom Paulinus left at York, was not able alone to put a ſtop to the general revolt (11). Things remained in this ſad 634. ſtate, till Oſwald aſcended the throne, who, as ſoon as Bede, l. 3. he had reſtored peace and tranquillity, laboured with all c. 1, 3. S. Dunelm. his power to make religion flouriſh again. To that end, he deſired the King of Scotland to ſend ſome Perſons of learning to inſtruct his ſubjects. to be ſent to the Northumbrians. He undertook the affair, and being conſecrated Biſhop, ſet out for Northumberland.

635. Bede gives Aidan the character of a pious and religious perſon, but adds, his zeal was without knowledge, becauſe he kept Eaſter after the manner of the Eaſtern Chriſtians, and not according to the cuſtom of the Church of Rome. However, as much a Schiſmatick as he was in Bede's opinion, nothing can be added to his commendation of him for holineſs of life. He not only,

l. 3. c. 5. ſays he, inſtructed Chriſtians in their duty, but alſo gave them an example of a good life, and fervent charity, which charmed the very Heathens, and allured them to the Faith. His ſucceſs was ſo great among the Northumbrians, that they returned in crowds to the profeſſion of Chriſt. Oſwald, who was extremely deſirous of the converſion of his Subjects, did all he could to promote the Work, even to the becoming Aidan's Interpreter, in explaining his diſcourſes to the people. It may perhaps ſeem ſtrange, that Oſwald ſhould not recall Paulinus, who was then Biſhop of Rocheſter, or make uſe of the miniſtry of James, who was left by Paulinus in Northumberland. But it muſt be remembred, that Oſwald, having been inſtructed in the Chriſtian Religion in Scotland, had an averſion for the Roman Miſſionaries, on account of the difference between the Romaniſts and Scots about Eaſter,

652. and the Eccleſiaſtical Tonſure. Aidan dying after he had governed the Church of Northumberland ſeventeen years; Finan, another Monk of Jona, was ſent to ſupply his place. He fixt the Epiſcopal See in the little Iſland of Lindisfarn (1), contrary to Gregory's regulation, who ordered that the principal See for the northern parts ſhould be ſettled at York.

This was not the only thing wherein Finan and the other Scotch Eccleſiaſticks ſhowed their independance on the Church of Rome. Their obſtinate refuſal to conform to the Roman cuſtom of keeping Eaſter, was an article of much more importance, at leaſt in the opinion of the Italian Prieſts, by whom it was conſidered as a principal point. England was then divided into two Parties or Sects, who firmly adhered to their reſpective opinions. All the Scotch Prieſts and Monks, who were very numerous in Northumberland, and all their converts, followed the Eaſtern Churches; but the French and Italian Eccleſiaſticks, in that and all other points, ſtuck to the Church of Rome, branding with the name of Schiſmaticks thoſe who refuſed to do the like. And therefore they uſed their utmoſt endeavours to bring the Engliſh Churches to a conformity with them, which they thought might eaſily be done, could they but once gain over Finan to their ſide. To this end they ſent to him a Scotch Prieſt, that had been educated in France, to lay before him the reaſons alledged by the Church of Rome upon that head. But ſo far was Finan from being prevailed upon, that he became a more profeſſed and open oppoſer of the Roman cuſtoms.

This diſpute was then carried on with great vehemence, not only among the Clergy, but even among the moſt ignorant of the Laity, as it uſually happens in Religious Differences. As long as Aidan and Finan lived, the Ro-

The Romaniſts, deſirous of bringing over their adverſaries to their opinion at any rate, never left till they had got Oſwy to call a Synod [in the Nunnery of Hilda] at Streanes-halh

664. or Whitby, in order to decide this affair. The Synod

Bede. being met, each party endeavoured to procure as many votes as they could; but, as it appears from the accounts of Hiſtorians, the Romaniſts were much more active and zealous than the others; and managed ſo, that Agilbert Biſhop of Paris, formerly Biſhop of the Weſt-Saxons, came to the Synod on ſome pretence, with Agathon one of his Prieſts. At the head of the Scotch Party were King Oſwy, Colman Biſhop of the Northumbrians, and the reſt of the Scotch Prieſts and Monks (2), with all that had received their ordination from them. On the other ſide appeared Anfleda, Oſwy's Queen, Alfred King of Deira, Oſwy's natural Son, Wilfrid a Prieſt his preceptor, who had ſtudied at Rome, Agilbert Biſhop of Paris, and Agathon a Prieſt of the ſame Church, Ronan a Scotch Prieſt, James the Deacon, and all who had been diſciples of the Italian Prieſts and Monks.

To ſee with what eagerneſs this diſpute was managed, one would have thought the very Eſſence of Religion had been at ſtake. And indeed the Romaniſts were of that opi-

l. 3. c. 25. nion, as appears from the words of Bede, it was not without reaſon, ſays he, that this queſtion diſturbed the minds of a great number of Chriſtians, who were apprehenſive, leſt after they had begun the race of Salvation, they ſhould be found to have run in vain. However, this Hiſtorian, though he thought all did run in vain who conformed not to the Church of Rome, gives Aidan and Finan, who were of that number, the higheſt praiſes for holineſs of life. He attributes to them the gift of miracles, which leaves no room to doubt, but that he looked upon them as Saints; notwithſtanding they were, according to his notion, actually involved in Schiſm. Baronius treads in the ſteps of Bede. When he mentions the Scots and Britons of thoſe days, he calls them Schiſmaticks, for refuſing to obey the Pope: But when he ſpeaks of Aidan and Finan, he makes no ſcruple of ſainting them, though they ſtrenuouſly aſſerted the independancy of their Churches. Hence it follows, either theſe two Biſhops were not really Schiſmaticks, or if they were ſo, their Schiſm hindred them not from being great Saints, from being aſſiſted by God in working miracles, and converting nations. But to return to the Synod of Whitby; ſince the diſpute about Eaſter was the occaſion of their meeting, and the cauſe of great commotions in England, it will not be amiſs briefly to relate the firſt riſe of it.

Towards the end of the ſecond Century, a controverſy aroſe in the Church, concerning the day on which the Eaſter Feſtival was to be celebrated. The Churches of Aſia were of opinion, it was to be kept on the fourteenth day of the Moon, according to the cuſtom of the Jews, on what day of the week ſoever it ſhould chance to fall. The Weſtern Churches on the contrary, put it off till the Sunday after the fourteenth day, becauſe our Saviour's reſurrection wes on that day. Several councils were held about this matter, as well in the Eaſt as in the Weſt; but neither party would recede from their opinion, each pleading apoſtolical tradition in their behalf, the Eaſtern Biſhops from St. John, and the Weſtern from St. Peter and St. Paul. Suppoſing the truth of both theſe traditions, the inference was plain, that either of them might indifferently be followed, and that it was no material point, ſince the Apoſtles had not ſettled it among themſelves. And in fact, this diverſity of cuſtom, prevented not the two parties from holding communion with each other, till Victor I. Biſhop of Rome made a rupture, by excommunicating the Quartodecimans, or thoſe that keep Eaſter on the fourteenth day of the Moon. This Proceeding of Victor gave ſo great offence, that Irenæus, Biſhop of Lyons, tho' of the ſame opinion with Victor, ſeverely reprimanded him for breach of charity, on account of a thing of ſo little moment. He alledged the example of Anicetus, Pius, Hyginus, Teleſphorus, Xiſtus, predeceſſors of Victor, who, notwithſtanding this difference, brake not communion with the Churches of Aſia. Adding, he would have acted much better in imitating Anicetus, who gave the Euchariſt with his own hand to Polycarp Biſhop of Smyrna, though of a different opinion from him in this very point.

Victor's haughty treatment of the Churches of Aſia, inſtead of bringing them to his opinion, only made them adhere ſtill more firmly to their own. They believed, they were ſo much the leſs obliged to conform to the practice of Rome, as the Pope, after all, could produce no authentick proof of his tradition from St. Peter and St. Paul; as the Aſiaticks, on their part, would have been as hard put to it to make out Theirs from St. John. What Socrates the Hiſtorian ſays upon this ſubject is very remarkable: Neither Chriſt nor his Apoſtles have ordered any thing concerning the Paſchal Feaſt, as Moſes did to the Jews, their deſign being not to determine circumſtances about Holy-Days, but to inſtruct Chriſtians in the precepts of piety and a good life. It is my opinion therefore, that as certain cuſtoms have been introduced in each country, this of the paſchal Solemnity was one of them, and not built upon the authority of the Apoſtles. The Quartodecimans tell us, the keeping the fourteenth day was inſtituted by St. John. The Romaniſts maintain, they had their practice from St. Peter and St. Paul: But neither of them have proved by any authentick record their aſſertion: Whence it is clear, the Eaſter Feſtival may be kept in every place according to the cuſtom firſt introduced there.

From this paſſage it is evident, that they who were no lovers of wrangling, looked upon this controverſy as of little importance to religion. However, to avoid a diverſity even in the ſmalleſt matters, the council of Arles in 314, ordered that Eaſter ſhould every where be kept on the Sunday after the fourteenth day of the Moon, which happened next after the Vernal Equinox or 21ſt of March. This Canon was confirmed by the council of Nice in 325, and the Emperor ſent orders throughout all the Roman Empire to have it put in practice. His letter upon this occaſion to the Governors and other Magiſtrates, ſhowed that the reaſons the Council went upon, were, that the Quartodecimans were feweſt in number, and ſtood too near the Jewiſh cuſtom. Upon the ſame account it was, that the Council ordered, Eaſter ſhould be the Sunday after the full Moon in March. But it is uncertain whether it was meant, people ſhould reckon from the beginning of the fourteenth of the Moon, or from the evening and beginning of the fifteenth (1). Purſuant to this determination, all the Churches kept Eaſter-Day on a Sunday. One thing however, namely, what was to be done when the full Moon fell out on a Sunday, not being ſettled, cauſed ſome diverſity. In this caſe, ſome Churches, among which was that of Scotland, began their Eaſter that very day, and conſequently at the ſame time with the Jews. But the Church of Rome deferred it till the Sunday following. Since that time, there have been ſome alterations which produced different cuſtoms in the Churches. Whereas for a long while a Cycle of eighty-four years was every where made uſe of to find the preciſe time of Eaſter, the Church of Rome invented a Cycle of nineteen years, much more proper for that purpoſe, and obliged all the Churches under her juriſdiction to conform to the ſame. Although without doubt this was the beſt method, and calculated neareſt the truth; yet as it was unknown to the Britons and Scots, who held but little correſpondence with Rome, they ſtuck to their old way.

Bede, l. 3. c. 25. By theſe various manners of finding Eaſter-Day, it ſometimes happened in Oſwy's court, that whilſt the King was celebrating the Paſchal Feaſt, the Queen, who followed the cuſtom of the Church of Rome, was ſtill keeping Lent. This confuſion made Oſwy deſirous of fixing Eaſter-Day ſo, as all ſhould keep it at the ſame time. At the opening of the Council, having made a ſhort ſpeech upon that head, he ordered Colman to alledge what he had to ſay in defence of the cuſtom of the Scotch Church. Colman ſaid, it had been all along the practice of his predeceſſors, and of thoſe by whom he was ordained in Scotland: That Columba, Aidan, and Finan had always kept to the old way; but if their Authority was not ſufficient, he could alledge that of St. John the beloved Apoſtle. After he had enlarged upon this Argument, Agilbert, Biſhop of Paris, was deſired to ſet forth what was to be ſaid againſt Colman's aſſertion. But the Biſhop having excuſed himſelf on account of his unskilfulneſs in the Engliſh tongue, requeſted that Wilfrid might be allowed to ſpeak the ſenſe of the Church of Rome. Wilfrid, having the King's permiſſion, anſwered Colman with great warmth. He explained the manner of fixing Eaſter practiſed by the Church of Rome, and affirmed that all the Churches in the World conformed to it, except only the Scots, Picts, and Britons, who ſtill perſiſted in their fooliſh obſtinacy. Colman replied, Talking in that manner very much reflected on the memory of St. John, who would never have eſtabliſhed a cuſtom that was chargeable with folly. Wilfrid, being ſenſible he had ſpoke a little too freely, endeavoured to juſtify St. John, by ſaying, he was obliged to retain ſomething of Judaiſm, for fear of giving offence to the Aſiatick Jews, as St. Paul upon the like account had circumciſed Timothy. He concluded with aſſerting, that the Church of Rome exactly followed what was preſcribed by St. Peter and St. Paul in this matter.

It appears from the fore-cited paſſage of Socrates, that it was as difficult for Wilfrid to prove that the cuſtom of the Church of Rome had its riſe from St. Peter, as for Colman to make out, that the practice of the Church of Scotland came from St. John. Beſides, the Cycle of nineteen years then made uſe of by the Romaniſts, was moſt aſſuredly invented after the time of St. Peter. But as Colman and the reſt of the Scotch party knew little of what paſſed abroad, and as their aim was not ſo much to bring the Romaniſts to their cuſtoms, as to perſuade them to let them go on peaceably in their own way, they perſiſted in appealing to the authority of St. John and Columba. But Wilfrid, after juſtifying St. John in the manner above-mentioned, demanded of Colman, with an air of triumph, whether he pretended to compare Columba with St. Peter the prince of the Apoſtles, to whom our Saviour ſaid, Thou art Peter, and upon this Rock will I build my Church? Hiſtory informs us not what anſwer Colman made; for it muſt be remembred, we know nothing of this Council, but what we have from the Partiſans of Rome. However this be, Oſwy ſeemed to be convinced St. Peter had ſome prerogative above the other Apoſtles, ſince he declared at laſt for the cuſtom eſtabliſhed by St. Peter at Rome, before that of St. John. Bede ſays, he was brought to it by being told, that as St. Peter had the Keys of heaven, he would refuſe him entrance if he obſtinately held out againſt the Apoſtle's own inſtitution. Oſwy's declaration immediately gained a majority of Voices for the Romaniſts. Thus Colman and his party loſt their cauſe in this Point.

In the ſame Synod was debated alſo the controverſy about the Eccleſiaſtical Tonſure. The Romaniſts maintained, that the head ought to be ſhaved round juſt in the place where our Saviour wore the Crown of Thorns, of which it was the Emblem. But the Scotch Prieſts ſhaved the fore-part of the head from ear to ear. Bede does not tell us how this matter was decided; but very probably it was determined in favour of the Romaniſts. l. 3. c. 25.

The diſpute about Eaſter being thus ended to the diſadvantage of the Scots, Colman and all his adherents retired into Scotland, not being able to prevail with themſelves to ſubmit to a deciſion that appeared to them ſo unjuſt. Thus is it in matters of religion, things that ſeem at firſt perfectly indifferent, become at laſt of the greateſt conſequence by the pride and uncharitableneſs of the Clergy. Cedd Biſhop of the Eaſt-Saxons, who had been interpreter to both parties in the Synod, was the only one of the Scotch party, that thought it his duty not to leave his flock for a thing of ſo little moment, though he was of a contrary opinion to the Romaniſts. Tuda ſucceeded to Colman's See, and Eatta was made Abbot of Lindisfarn in the room of him that went off with Colman. Bede, l. 3. c. 25.

Thus was the ſtorm raiſed by this controverſy appeaſed at laſt, to the great ſatisfaction of the Pope and his party, who were very ſenſible, that their ſucceſs in this affair would greatly contribute to the eſtabliſhing the Papal authority over the northern Churches, as it really did. The Church of Northumberland had been governed for thirty years by Aidan, Finan, and Colman, whom their adverſaries could charge with nothing, but their firm adherence to the cuſtoms of their anceſtors in relation to Eaſter. After Colman's retiring into Scotland, the government of the Church of Northumberland was always put into the hands either of Saxons or foreigners bred up in the principles of the Church of Rome, the Scots being entirely excluded.

Tuda dying ſoon after, Alfred King of Deira was deſirous of having Wilfrid his preceptor made Biſhop of York, the See whereof was then at Lindisfarn. To that end he ordered him to go into France to be conſecrated by Agilbert Biſhop of Paris. But Wilfrid making a long ſtay in France, Chad then Abbot of Leſtingham was made Biſhop of the Northumbrians (2). Chad being gone into Kent to be conſecrated by Deuſdedit Archbiſhop of Canterbury, and finding he was lately dead, applied to Wina, Biſhop of Wincheſter for conſecration, and then returned into Northumberland. Bede tells us, he was a very religious perſon, without pride or ambition, and one that accepted of the epiſcopal dignity purely in obedience to the King's order. Eddius. Bede. S. Dunelm. Malmſb.

In the mean while, Wilfrid being returned into England, remained ſome time at Canterbury, to take care of that Dioceſe till the arrival of Theodorus, whom the Pope had made Archbiſhop. After a few months ſtay at Canterbury, he went on to Northumberland; where finding Chad was made Biſhop of Lindisfarn, and not daring to complain of the inconſtancy of the King of Deira, he retired to his monaſtery at Rippon (3). Some time after, Theodorus in his viſitation of all the Churches in England coming to York, ſeverely reprimanded Chad for being conſecrated by the Biſhop of Wincheſter. Chad humbly ſubmitted to his cenſure, and without endeavouring to juſtify himſelf, did all the Archbiſhop required of him. Theodorus, charmed with his modeſt Behaviour, conſecrated him anew; but ordered him to return to his Monaſtery (4), and make room for Wilfrid whom the two Kings of Northumberland had deſigned for the Biſhoprick of York or Lindisfarn. Though Bede does not ſay for what reaſon Chad was ſent back to his Monaſtery after his ſecond conſecration, yet it is plain Theodorus was gained by the two Kings, who were for Wilfrid. And indeed there ſeems to be no reaſon for depoſing of Chad, ſince all the defects of his former ordination, ſuppoſing there were any, were removed by the latter.

Wilfrid was a Man of a very proud and haughty temper, one of thoſe that are for domineering where-ever they come, and cannot bring themſelves to uſe towards others that condeſcenſion they expect from all the world. His pride for ſome time was ſupported by his intereſt with the two Kings of Northumberland. But at length Oſwy being dead, Alfred his Son depoſed, and Egfrid who had no opinion of this prelate, in poſſeſſion of the throne, Wilfrid found he had not that reſpect ſhown him, as in the reign of Oſwy. This gave him great uneaſineſs, and not being able to forbear ſhowing it, perhaps in too in- Malmſb. G. Pontif. l. 3. p. 262.

ſolent a manner, he incurred the King's diſpleaſure. Some time after, Theodorus coming again into Northumberland, Egfrid complained to him of Wilfrid (1), and let him know, that inſtead of ediſying the People, he brought a great ſcandal on religion by his pride and arrogance. The King did not accuſe him without ground. Hiſtorians are all agreed, that Wilfrid was exceſſive proud; that he affected to live in a royal manner; that he never went abroad without a numerous retinue; and that he was ſerved in Gold. Theodorus, finding this a fit opportunity to improve the rights of his See, and leſſen thoſe of York, which had been dignified with the title of an Archbiſhoprick in the time of Paulinus, was reſolved not to let it ſlip. Accordingly, without hearing what Wilfrid had to ſay for himſelf, he depoſed him, and obtained the King's leave to divide Northumberland into two Dioceſes. Boſa, who reſided at York, was Biſhop of the firſt, containing the Churches of Deira. Over the other See, which continued fixed at Lindisfarn, and conſiſted of the Kingdom of Bernicia, was placed Eatta. As Egfrid had for ſome time conquered Lincolnſhire from the King of Mercia, he made a third Biſhoprick of it, of which Ethedus was the firſt Biſhop.

Wilfrid enraged at his diſgrace, ſet out immediately for Rome, to lay his caſe before the Pope. Theodorus not liking his going thither, ſent a Monk to inform the Pope of the reaſons of his depoſing him. However, fearing Wilfrid might gain the Pope to his ſide, on account of the ſervice he had done the Church of Rome at the council of Whitby, he wrote to Ebroine, Mayor of the Palace to the King of France, to ſtop him in his journey. Wilfrid, informed of this, reſolved to go by the way of Frieſland (2), where Adalgiſus the King hoſpitably received him, and diſcovered to him that Ebroine had deſired him to detain or murder him. He is ſaid, whilſt he ſtaid in Frieſland, to make a great many converts. At length, taking his leave, he went on to Strasbourg, from whence he was ſafely conducted to Rome by the King of Auſtraſia.

Agatho, who was then Pope, having heard Wilfrid's complaints, held a Synod upon them, who unanimouſly declared that Wilfrid ſhould be reſtored to his Biſhoprick. Wilfrid having thus ſucceeded in his Suit, returned home, and preſented to the King the decree of the Synod at Rome, with a letter from the Pope. But Egfrid had ſo little regard to this decree, that after he had upbraided the Biſhop for procuring it by bribery, he put him in priſon, where he kept him a whole year, and would not then have releaſed him, had it not been for the preſſing inſtances of his Aunt Ebba, and upon condition he would never more ſet foot in Northumberland.

Wilfrid, meeting with all theſe diſcouraging circumſtances, withdrew to the Monaſtery of Glaſſenbury, where Berthwald the Abbot gave him a ſafe retreat; but it laſted not long, for Ethelred King of Mercia, and Uncle to Berthwald, deſired him to diſmiſs him, on account of the King of Northumberland. In this perplexity Wilfrid fled for refuge to Adelwalch King of Suſſex, who was converted during his impriſonment in Mercia, but his ſubjects were ſtill idolaters. This Prince having granted him his protection, deſired him to endeavour the converſion of the people, in which he happily ſucceeded. In a little time the South-Saxons, as well as the inhabitants of the Iſle of Wight, embraced the Chriſtian Faith, by the pains and inſtructions of Wilfrid. At leaſt this is what the writer of his Life relates, though to ſpeak the truth, it is very difficult to clear up the Chronology of theſe facts. Wilfrid remained ſome years in Suſſex, where he was made Biſhop of Seſſey, as will be ſeen hereafter.

Eddius.

During his abſence, Theodorus having taken a third journey to Northumberland, erected a new Biſhoprick at Hagulſtad [or Hexham] of which Thumbert was the firſt Biſhop. This he did to make amends for Lincoln now in the hands of the Mercians. Some time after Theodorus went thither once more, and called a council, wherein he got Thumbert to be depoſed, for daring to take it ill that the Archbiſhop of Canterbury ſhould exerciſe his juriſdiction over the Churches of the North. It was indeed contrary to the regulations of Gregory I; and the Pall ſent to Paulinus firſt Biſhop of the Northumbrians, plainly ſhewed, it was not the intent of the court of Rome that the Churches of the North ſhould have any dependance on Canterbury. But Aidan, Finan, and Colman, not having vouchſafed to demand the Pall of the Pope, York or Lindisfarn had only the bare title of a Biſhoprick, which theſe three Scotch Prelates never minded, the lording it over the Church being what was far from their thoughts. And therefore Theodorus finding he was the ſole Archbiſhop in England, embraced the opportunity to extend his juriſdiction over the North. For that purpoſe probably it was that he depoſed Wilfrid, from whoſe temper and character he expected oppoſition, that he divided York into three Biſhopricks, on pretence it would be more convenient for the people; and laſtly, that he depoſed Thumbert, who had openly cenſured his uſurpations.

Richard. Hagulſtad.

The ſame Council that depoſed Thumbert, choſe in his room Cuthbert a Monk of Lindisfarn, who was the only perſon that oppoſed his own election, out of an exceſs of modeſty and humility. The Biſhops, who all judged him worthy of the Epiſcopal character, found it a very difficult matter to bring him to a compliance; and at laſt were forced to conſent he ſhould remain at Lindisfarn, where he had lived a long time; for which reaſon Eatta was tranſlated to Hagulſtad. 685.

Some time after, Theodorus being grown very old, and finding he had not long to live, was touched with remorſe for what he had done to Wilfrid, and wanted to be reconciled to him. To this purpoſe he interceded for him ſo earneſtly with Alfred, ſucceſſor to Egfrid, that he was recalled. The Biſhoprick of Lindisfarn being then vacant by the voluntary reſignation of Cuthbert, Boſa was tranſlated thither, and Wilfrid reſtored to York. 686.

Cuthbert being returned to his Monaſtery at Lindisfarn, died ſoon after. In proceſs of time, his body being removed to Durham, became ſo famous for miracles, that among all the Engliſh Saints he had the greateſt veneration paid him. 687.

Wilfrid was no ſooner ſettled in his See, but he undertook the annulling all that had been done during his diſgrace. He attempted the uniting again to York the Biſhoprick of Hagulſtad, and claimed the revenues that had been taken from his Church, and appropriated to that Biſhoprick. In fine, he pretended that all the regulations of Theodorus were null and void; and perhaps he was in the right; but his haughty way of proceeding made him meet with oppoſition from all quarters. Even Alfred his Pupil and Sovereign, not being able to bear any longer his imperious temper, drove him once more from his Church. Thus this reſtleſs Prelate was reduced to ſeek for ſhelter from Ethelred King of Mercia, formerly his enemy, but now his friend. Mercia being then divided into four Biſhopricks, and Leiceſter, one of them, happening to be vacant, Ethelred promoted Wilfrid to that See, which however he enjoyed but a very little while. His haughty temper was ſo diſpleaſing to the King of Mercia, that he diſpoſſeſſed him of it in a few months. Not content with incurring the diſpleaſure of the Kings of Mercia and Northumberland, he took occaſion alſo to fall out with Berthwald, Archbiſhop of Canterbury, and by that means forfeited his protection, which he then ſtood in great need of. The two Kings his enemies laid hold of this opportunity to humble him. They requeſted Berthwald to call a council, in order to examine into the life and actions of Wilfrid. The Archbiſhop, as matters ſtood between him and Wilfrid, readily complied with their deſire. Accordingly a council was held at Oneſtresfield in Northumberland, where Wilfrid was obliged to appear, and was charged with crimes that deſerved degradation. However, the Biſhops unwilling to carry matters to that extremity, endeavoured by intreaties and threats to induce him to reſign his Biſhoprick of his own accord. But nothing could bring him to that; he told them, it was a great piece of ingratitude in the Engliſh to uſe him in that manner, after all the ſervices he had done the Church. The Services he boaſted of were, his contributing the moſt of any towards fixing Eaſter-Day, according to the uſage of Rome, his introducing the Roman Ritual into the Churches of the North, and his bringing the Scotch Monks to conform to the Rules of the Order of St. Benedict. Upon theſe accounts, ſaid he, you ought to reward me, inſtead of threatning to depoſe me unjuſtly for imaginary crimes. But if you will dare to go on, know I'll appeal to the Pope againſt your proceedings. None other has power to condemn me, and he it is alone I acknowledge for my Judge. The Council not regarding his appeal, unanimouſly depoſed him. However, this did not in the leaſt humble him. Though he was ſeventy years of age, he reſolved to go to Rome for redreſs. The Pope, always favourable to thoſe that appealed to him, convened a Synod of the neighbouring Biſhops, wherein Wilfrid, upon his ſingle repreſentation of matters, was fully acquitted. After which, the Pope gave him recommendatory letters to Berthwald, and the Kings of Mercia and Northumberland, requiring them to reſtore Wilfrid in purſuance to the decree of the Synod. 703.

Eddius, vit. Wilf. c. 49.

As ſoon as Wilfrid was returned to England, he waited on the Archbiſhop, who finding he came with the Pope's recommendation, began to relent, and promiſe his friendſhip. On the other hand, Ethelred King of Mercia, who was now turned Monk, promiſed Wilfrid his interceſſion. But Alfred at firſt ſeemed inflexible. He ſaid he could ſee no manner of reaſon for reſtoring, upon the Pope's letter, and the ſentence of a foreign Council that knew but little of the matter, a man that had cauſed ſo many diſturbances, and after having been baniſhed ſeveral times, had at length been lawfully depoſed by a Synod. But he was not long of this mind. Soon after falling ſick, it was put into his head, that his diſtemper was a puniſhment from God, for his diſobedience to the Pope's orders; and this made ſo deep an impreſſion upon him, that he vowed to reſtore Wilfrid, in caſe he recovered. Death prevented him from performing his vow; however, he ordered Brithric, whom he left Guardian to his Son Oſred, to ſee it put in execution out of hand.

Although Alfred had been poſitively promiſed, the affair of Wilfrid ſhould be ſoon ended, it was not poſſible to think of it immediately, by reaſon of a civil war raiſed by Edulph, who had uſurped the crown. Wilfrid behaved upon this occaſion in ſuch a manner, as ſeemed to deprive him of all hopes of ever being reſtored. As he did not doubt but Edulph, who was then beſieging the King and Brithric in Bamborough Caſtle, would ſucceed in his deſigns, he went in all haſte to him, in order to make him his friend betimes, and ſecure his protection. This proceeding had like to have proved his ruin. Edulph, knowing he was hated by the Northumbrians, to do them a pleaſure, gave him a very ill reception, forbidding him ever to appear in his preſence. On the other ſide, Brithric informed of Wilfrid's conduct, loſt all kindneſs for him. However, after the war was ended by the death of the Uſurper, Brithric was prevailed upon, though with ſome difficulty, to conſent Wilfrid ſhould be reſtored. To this end a council was held near the river Nydd, where it was agreed Wilfrid ſhould be Biſhop of Hagulſtad, with which he was obliged to be ſatisfied. John, then Biſhop of that See, was removed to York, vacant by the death of Boſa.

Eddius, c. 58. 708.

Thus Wilfrid's affair, after many difficulties, was at length determined. John in 721 reſigned his Biſhoprick, and retired to the monaſtery of Beverly, of which he was Abbot. He was canonized after his death, and became very famous, by the name of St. John of Beverly. He was ſucceeded in the See of York by Wilfrid the Younger, his Chaplain. To Wilfrid the Elder, ſucceeded in his See of Hagulſtad, Acca one of the Prieſts that had attended him in his journey to Rome, where he became a great proficient in Church-Muſick, which, ſays Bede, it was impracticable for him to learn in his own country. Wilfrid the Younger was ſucceeded in the See of York by Egbert, Brother to Edbert King of Northumberland.

Bede, l. 5. c. 6. l. 5. c. 21.

It was neceſſary to be thus particular about the eſtabliſhment of the northern Biſhopricks, the ſucceſſion of the firſt Biſhops, and the alterations occaſioned by Wilfrid; without all which, it would be difficult to give a diſtinct notion of the Churches of theſe parts. Hence alſo may be ſeen, how the Archbiſhop of Canterbury had opportunity of exerciſing his juriſdiction over all England, contrary to the regulation of Gregory I. To which, the enterpriſing genius of Theodorus, and the depoſing of Wilfrid, likewiſe contributed. Had this laſt continued in the See of York, he would doubtleſs have obtained the Pall, and by that means put a ſtop to Theodorus's proceedings.

The dignity of Archbiſhop of York, and Metropolitan of the North, vaniſhed with Paulinus. After that Prelate left Northumberland, and the Northumbrians deſerted the Faith, the Monks ſent for from Scotland by Oſwald to inſtruct the people, were contented with the bare title of Biſhop, without applying to the Pope for the Pall, whoſe juriſdiction they did not acknowledge. Afterwards Wilfrid, ſucceſſor to Colman, having been depoſed, the Biſhoprick of the Northumbrians was divided into four, namely, York, Whithern, Lindisfarn, and Hagulſtad. This diviſion was a freſh obſtacle to the Biſhop of York's deſiring the Pall, his See being ſo conſiderably leſſened by it. Beſides, Boſa, John and Wilfrid the Younger, who were ſucceſſively Biſhops of York, were pious and good Men, who thought of nothing leſs than aſpiring to more honourable titles. But Egbert, who was Biſhop of York, whilſt his Brother ſat on the throne of Northumberlaud, having more ambition than his predeceſſors, improved the reſpect they had for him at Rome on account of his birth, and procured the Pall with the Archiepiſcopal dignity: By which means he acquired a juriſdiction over the three other northern Biſhops, who became his Suffragans. From that time the Archbiſhops of York began to be upon a Level with thoſe of Canterbury, and to inſiſt on Gregory's regulation, whereby it was ordered, there ſhould be an entire equality and independency between the two Archbiſhops. On the other hand, the Archbiſhops of Canterbury pleaded the juriſdiction exerciſed by Theodorus over the North, and all the reſt of England. Hence aroſe a conteſt between the two Metropolitans, which was not decided till many ages after. Alcuinus gives Egbert, whom he calls his maſter, the character of an able and learned Prelate, and takes notice of his building a library at York, and furniſhing it with a noble collection of Books. Eanbald, who ſucceeded Egbert, was living at the time of the diſſolution of the Heptarchy.

The CHURCH of WESSEX.

IT does not appear, that Auſtin ſent any of his companions to preach the Goſpel in the kingdom of Weſſex. It was not till forty years after his arrival in Britain that the Weſt-Saxons were converted by the miniſtry of Birinus. This Prieſt, zealous for the advancement of the kingdom of Chriſt, being informed there were ſtill in England nations to whom the Goſpel was unpreached, deſired Pope Honorius to ſend him thither (1). His requeſt being granted, he received the epiſcopal character, and ſet out for England, not knowing for certain on what nation providence would throw him, or on whom in particular he deſigned to lay out his charitable care. He accidentally arrived in the kingdom of Weſſex; and finding the inhabitants Idolaters, reſolved to ſtay among them and endeavour their converſion. After ſome time he had the ſatisfaction to baptize Cinigiſil the King, and Quicelm his Brother (2). Soon after Birinus found his Audience very numerous, multitudes following the example of their Kings. He continued for fourteen years to edify his converts by his diſcourſes and example, and at length, after a conſiderable progreſs, died at Dorcheſter, where he had built a Church and fixed his epiſcopal See.

634. Bede, l. 3. c. 7. 635. Aſſer. Ann. 636. Bede, l. 3. c. 7.

After Birinus's death, Weſſex was involved in freſh troubles. Cenowalch, who ſucceeded his father Cinigiſil, being as yet a Pagan, was no favourer of the Chriſtians. But what was ſtill worſe, Penda King of Mercia became maſter of the kingdom and kept it three years, Cenowalch being forced to fly into Eaſt-Anglia. It may be eaſily judged Chriſtianity, during theſe three years, made no great progreſs. Beſides Penda's being an Idolater, it is unlikely religion ſhould flouriſh in the midſt of wars and commotions. Cenowalch had the good fortune to be converted during his retreat in Eaſt-Anglia, and afterwards to be reſtored to his dominions. The peaceable times that enſued afforded him means to promote religion again in Weſſex, where, after Birinus's death, none had been very forward to go and ſtrengthen the new Chriſtians. Whilſt the King was looking out for ſome fit perſon to preach to his ſubjects, Agilbert a Frenchman, who was juſt come from his ſtudies in Ireland, paſſed through Wincheſter in his way home. Cenowalch having ſeen him, invited him to ſtay with him, and inſtruct the people. Agilbert complied with his requeſt; and being conſecrated Biſhop, went and reſided at Dorcheſter. But as he had not the gift of languages, he made but little progreſs. Cenowalch perceiving he could not learn the Engliſh tongue, and that it was impoſſible his ſubjects ſhould edify by the inſtructions of one who ſpoke to them in a foreign dialect, began to grow weary of him. At length he divided his kingdom into two Dioceſes, and leaving Agilbert at Dorcheſter, made one Wina a Saxon, that had been bred and conſecrated in France, Biſhop of Wincheſter (3). Agilbert could not bear the King ſhould make this partition without conſulting him, much leſs that he ſhould give the preference to the new Biſhop by placing him in his capital. His complaints upon this occaſion not being much regarded, he took his leave and retired into France, where he was made Biſhop of Paris. He returned afterwards into England, to aſſiſt at the council of Whitby. In the mean time, Cenowalch not agreeing with Wina, diſmiſſed him alſo.

630. 660. 666.

Weſſex remaining thus without a Biſhop (4), and Eccleſiaſticks fit for ſuch an employment not being very common in England, Cenowalch would have recalled Agilbert, who did not think proper to quit Paris for Wincheſter. However, he made an offer to the King of his Nephew Eleutherius, a Prieſt, whom he recommended, as well qualified for the epiſcopal function. Eleutherius being accepted of, and conſecrated by Theodorus, became ſole Biſhop of the Weſt-Saxons.

670.

After the death of Cenowalch, Weſſex was troubled with civil wars for ten years. Eleutherius dying during the troubles, was ſucceeded by Heda; after whoſe death, the number of Chriſtians being very much increaſed in Weſſex, it was found neceſſary to divide the kingdom

When he was promoted to his Biſhoprick, he was Abbot of the Monaſtery of Malmsbury, ſo named from Maidulph a Scotchman the firſt Abbot, and Aldhelm, his ſucceſſor (1). Forthere, who, according to Bede, was well verſed in the Holy Scriptures, was Biſhop of Sherborn after Aldhelm, and to Daniel ſucceeded Almund in the Biſhoprick of Wincheſter. From that time to the diſſolution of the Heptarchy, I meet with nothing in the Eccleſiaſtical Hiſtory of Weſſex worth notice.

The CHURCH of MERCIA.

IT was above fifty years after the converſion of Kent, that the Mercians embraced the Chriſtian Faith. Penda, who ſat on the throne of Mercia above thirty years, was of a too haughty and turbulent ſpirit to embrace a religion ſo contrary to his temper and character. However, Divine Providence ſo ordered matters, that this Prince was induced, though not to profeſs, yet at leaſt to tolerate the Chriſtian Religion in his dominions. Penda his eldeſt Son, whom he had made King of Leiceſter, being gone to Northumberland to demand Alfleda King Oſwy's daughter in marriage, could obtain her upon no other terms but his turning Chriſtian (2). Whether the young Prince was apprehenſive of the ſame obſtruction to his marriage in all the other kingdoms, which were already converted, or had a favourable opinion of Chriſtianity, he received baptiſm before he left Northumberland (3). At his return, he brought with him four Prieſts, Cedda, Adda, Beti and Diuma, to preach the Goſpel to the Mercians: Which the King his father oppoſed not, either out of complaiſance to his Son, or becauſe all religions were indifferent to him (4). Diuma, who was a Scotchman, and the only Biſhop of the four, governed the Mercian Church proſperouſly for ſome years; he and his companions having met with a plentiful harveſt in Mercia, the largeſt of the ſeven kingdoms, and the laſt that was converted. Cellach ſucceeded Diuma.

Bede, l. 3. c. 24.

After the death of Penda, Mercia was ſubject three years to Oſwy King of Northumberland: but he being a Chriſtian, religion received no detriment from that revolution. But when Wulpher aſcended the throne, being yet an idolater, he was carried by a falſe zeal to perſecute his Chriſtian Subjects, even to the putting to death two of his own Sons, who refuſed to renounce their Faith, if they may be credited who relate this fact, which does not ſeem to be well ſupported. Happily for the Chriſtians this ſtorm was ſoon blown over, Wulpher being converted preſently after.

Rob. de Swapham.

During the perſecution, Cellach retired into Scotland: So that Mercia being without a Biſhop when Wulpher embraced the Goſpel, he ſent for an Engliſh Prieſt, named Trumhere, who had been educated in Scotland, and cauſed him to be conſecrated Biſhop of Mercia. To him ſucceeded Jaruman, who had the honour of replanting the Chriſtian Religion in the kingdom of Eſſex, as will be related hereafter. Upon Jaruman's death Wulpher deſired Theodorus to ſend him a Biſhop. Theodorus gladly complied with his requeſt, as giving him a good opportunity of promoting Chad (5), whom he had deprived of the See of York, in the manner before related in the hiſtory of the Church of Northumberland. Chad being come to Mercia, fixed his See at Lichfield (6), where he died, after he had governed the Church prudently and happily for many years. I am perſwaded it will not be taken amiſs, that I refer thoſe to Bede's Eccleſiaſtical Hiſtory, who are deſirous of ſeeing a liſt of St. Chad's miracles, and the hymns the Angels ſung in the air over his houſe when he lay a dying.

Upon the death of Chad, Theodorus promoted to the See of Lichfield Winfrid a Prieſt, whom he depoſed ſoon after for daring to expoſtulate with him for aſſuming too great authority over the other Biſhops. He had ſerved another in the ſame manner in Northumberland upon the like account. Saxulph, Abbot of Medes-hamſted (7), was made Biſhop in Winfrid's room. But as the Chriſtians daily increaſed in Mercia, Ethelred, ſucceſſor to Wulfer, finding, one Biſhop was not ſufficient for ſo large a flock, divided his kingdom into four Dioceſes, the Sees whereof were eſtabliſhed at Lichfield, Worceſter, Hereford, and Leiceſter (8). Saxulph continued at Lichfield. Faddric was ſent to Worceſter, but dying before he was conſecrated, Boſelus was put in his place. Cuthwin was Biſhop of Leiceſter, and Putta of Hereford. After Cuthwin's death Leiceſter was united to Lichfield; but ſome time after they were ſeparated again upon Wilfrid's account, who was diſpoſſeſſed of the See of York, and held not this long. Hedda ſucceeded Saxulph in the Biſhoprick of Lichfield (9).

I paſs over in ſilence the particulars of no moment relating to the Mercian Churches, with the ſucceſſion of their Biſhops (10), to come at the change that happened in the reign of Offa, by the erecting of Lichfield into an Archbiſhoprick. Offa, jealous of the authority exerciſed by the Archbiſhop of Canterbury over the Churches of Mercia, and having beſides a particular quarrel to Lambert who then filled the Archiepiſcopal See, reſolved to withdraw the Churches of Mercia from his juriſdiction. To this end, he privately ſollicited Pope Adrian I. to make the Biſhop of Lichfield an Archbiſhop, and the Biſhops of Mercia and Eaſt-Anglia his Suffragans. The Pope willingly conſented to his requeſt, as glad of the opportunity, by obliging this Prince, to extend over the Church of England his juriſdiction, which was not yet thorougly ſubmitted to, or at leaſt not to that degree he deſired. With this view he ſent Gregory Biſhop of Oſtia, and Theophylact Biſhop of Todi, with the character of Legates to tranſact this affair. To prevent Lambert from taking meaſures to avoid the blow that was aiming at him, the ſending of theſe Legates was pretended to be on account of calling Synods in England for confirming the Churches in the Faith. Upon the arrival of the Legates, Theophylact ſtayed ſome time with Offa to concert meaſures how to accompliſh their deſigns, whilſt Gregory went on to Northumberland, where he convened a Synod, of which I ſhall ſpeak in another place. At his return to Mercia, the two Legates ſummoned a national council of the ſeven kingdoms at Calcuith, where King Offa was preſent. After ratifying the Canons of the Northumberland-Synod, the erecting of Lichfield into an Archiepiſcopal See was propoſed. Lambert oppoſed it to the utmoſt of his power, but all in vain. The matter having been ſettled before-hand, the authority of Offa and the Legates bore down all oppoſition. Higbert, then Biſhop of Lichfield was declared an Archbiſhop, and the Biſhops of Mercia and Eaſt-Anglia were made his Suffragans (11). He was prevented by death from receiving the Pall, but Adulph his ſucceſſor, had that honour from the Pope, who ratified what the council had done. Some are of opinion Offa purchaſed this favour with the tax of the Peter-Pence levied on Mercia and Eaſt-Anglia: but this is only a groundleſs conjecture. Lichfield enjoyed the title of an Archbiſhoprick not above fourteen years. After the death of Offa and Egfrid his Son, Cenulph was ſo far prevailed upon by the preſſing inſtances of the Archbiſhops of Canterbury and York, who repreſented to him, that according to the regulation of Gregory I, there ought to be but two Archbiſhops in England, that he wrote to the Pope with his own hand, to deſire him to put things upon the antient foot again. Adelard, Archbiſhop of Canterbury, took upon him the management of this affair at Rome, where (after a nine years ſollicitation) he obtained of Pope Leo III, that Mercia and Eaſt-Anglia ſhould again be under the juriſdiction of the See of Canterbury. From that time to the reign of Egbert nothing remarkable relating to the Church happened in Mercia, except the Councils, of which I intend to ſpeak elſewhere.

The CHURCH of ESSEX.

MELLITUS, one of the Miſſionaries ſent over to Auſtin, was the firſt that preached the Goſpel to the Eaſt-Saxons, particularly at London. As far as can be judged, he made no great progreſs among the people. Probably what ſucceſs he met with was entirely owing to the authority of Sebert King of Eſſex, and Ethelbert King of Kent (1); ſince upon their deaths, all the Eaſt-Saxon Chriſtians fell back to Paganiſm, and expelled Mellitus (2), without ever admitting him any more. The converſion therefore of the Eaſt-Saxons is not properly to be dated from this time, but rather from the reign of Sigebert the Good. This Prince living in ſtrict friendſhip with Oſwy King of Northumberland, and paying him frequent viſits, had the good fortune to be inſtructed in the knowledge of the Goſpel at his court, where he was baptized. He brought home with him Cedd, a Northumbrian Prieſt, of whom I have ſpoken before, and who being conſecrated Biſhop, heartily ſet about inſtructing the Eaſt-Saxons, among whom in a ſhort time he made a very great progreſs (3). He was the only Scotchman that after the council of Whitby was unwilling to leave his flock, though the controverſy about Eaſter was decided contrary to his opinion. Nay, he went ſo far as to blame Colman and the reſt of his countrymen, for deſerting their flocks for a matter of ſo little moment. His ſtrict adherence to eccleſiaſtical diſcipline was the occaſion of Sigebert's death, or at leaſt was pretended to be ſo, as was ſaid in the hiſtory of the kingdom of Eſſex. As Cedd went often to Northumberland, where he had ſpent great part of his life, Adelwalt King of Deira, made him a preſent of certain lands lying near Leſtingham, where he founded a monaſtery. Thither he uſed to retire and practiſe the greateſt Auſterities. Here alſo it was that he died of the plague after he had governed the Church of Eſſex ſeveral years. Bede, who gives Cedd great encomiums, and mentions his auſtere way of living, takes occaſion from thence to ſay, that Faſting was religiouſly practiſed by all who pretended to any thing of a regular life, and adds, that ſome faſted every Wedneſday and Friday, till three o'clock in the afternoon. The Saxon Homilies alſo moſt earneſtly recommend Faſting; but withal take care to warn Chriſtians againſt over-acting their part in this reſpect, as ſome did, and talk very rationally upon this article.

After the death of Sigebert the Good, and Swithelm his brother, it happened that in the reign of Sebba and Siger the plague raged terribly in the kingdom of Eſſex, particularly at London. Siger being perſuaded that the plague was ſent upon the Eaſt Saxons, as a puniſhment from the Gods for abandoning the religion of their anceſtors, returned to idolatry, and drew after him thoſe of his ſubjects who had not been thoroughly converted. But Sebba ſtedfaſtly adhered to the Chriſtian Religion. Wulpher King of Mercia, on whom theſe two Princes were then in dependance, having been informed of what paſſed in Eſſex, ſent thither Jaruman his Biſhop to endeavour to reſtore the Eaſt Saxons to the way of truth. Jaruman's pains were crowned with ſo good ſucceſs, that the people at length returned to the Faith. Shortly after Wulpher, who acted as he pleaſed in the Kingdom of Eſſex, gave the firſt inſtance of Simony in England, by ſelling the Biſhoprick of London to Wina, who had been driven from Wincheſter. He governed the Church of Eſſex till his death in 675. His ſucceſſor was Erkenwald, famous for his great affection to the city of London, as well as for the holineſs of his life, on account of which he was enrolled in the catalogue of the Saints. After his death a great conteſt aroſe between the Canons of St. Paul's at London, and the Monks of Barking, who ſhould bury him. The firſt carried their point, and interred him in their Cathedral, where it is affirmed he wrought ſeveral miracles (4). It will be needleſs to carry down the ſucceſſion of the Biſhops of London to the diſſolution of the Heptarchy, ſince nothing remarkable happened concerning them (5).

The CHURCH of EAST-ANGLIA.

THE firſt converſion of the Eaſt-Angles is ſaid to be in the reign of Redowald; but by whom is not known. There is reaſon to believe, that during this Prince's life the Chriſtian Religion made no great progreſs in Eaſt-Anglia. All that can be probably conjectured is, that Redowald, out of reſpect for Ethelbert King of Kent (at whoſe court ſome ſay he was baptized) gave leave to ſome of Auſtin's companions to preach in his dominions, and perſecuted not thoſe who had a mind to embrace the Goſpel. What is ſaid of his ſuffering the true God and the Pagan deities to be worſhipped in the ſame temple, ſeems to infer that he was not himſelf a Chriſtian (6), and that the number of converts in Eaſt-Anglia was very inconſiderable. Thus much at leaſt is certain, Chriſtianity flouriſhed not in that kingdom, in his or his Son Erpwald's reign (7). And therefore we can't be greatly miſtaken in placing the converſion of the Eaſt-Angles in the reign of Sigebert, ſucceſſor to Erpwald.

Bede, l. 2. c. 15. Bede, ibid. and l. 3. c. 18.

Sigebert, who had ſpent great part of his time in France, where he had been baptized, was thoroughly inſtructed in the Chriſtian Religion. When he returned to England to take poſſeſſion of the crown, he brought along with him a Burgundian Prieſt, named Felix, whom he got to be conſecrated Biſhop of Canterbury. Felix, upon his arrival in Eaſt-Anglia, uſed his utmoſt endeavours to bring back to the right way ſuch as were gone aſtray, and inſtruct thoſe that had not yet any knowledge of the truth. His endeavours met with ſuch ſucceſs, that in a ſhort time he had the pleaſure to ſee the Eaſt-Angles come in crowds to be baptized. In the mean time, Sigebert knowing nothing would make more for the benefit of his ſubjects, than permanent and continual inſtructions to confirm them in the Faith, erected ſchools, after the manner of thoſe he had ſeen in France (8). Some will have it (9) that the Univerſity of Cambridge owes its original to theſe ſchools; but this opinion ſeems not to be well grounded.

Whilſt Sigebert was thus employed in works of piety, he received farther aſſiſtance from one Furſeus an Iriſh Monk, who preached to the Eaſt-Angles with good ſucceſs. Bede gives him an extraordinary commendation; attributes ſeveral miracles to him, and aſſures us he was, like St. Paul, wrapt up into Heaven. This ſame Furſeus built a monaſtery at Cnobersburgh (10), which was largely endowed at ſeveral times by the Kings of Eaſt-Anglia. The troubles that aroſe after Sigebert's reſigning the crown, obliged Furſeus to retire into France, where he founded the monaſtery of Lagny in the juriſdiction of Meaux.

Felix was Biſhop of the Eaſt-Angles ſeventeen years; his See was fixed at Dummoc, a little town by the Sea-ſide, now called Dunwich (11). Here it was he had the ſatisfaction to convert and baptize Cenowalch King of Weſſex, who had fled for refuge into Eaſt-Anglia. Felix was ſucceeded by Thomas a deacon of his Church; after him came Berchtgiſlus, ſirnamed Boniface, whom Biſus ſucceeded. Biſus being grown old and infirm, Becca and Badwin were made his aſſiſtants, and Eaſt-Anglia divided into two Dioceſes. Becca reſided at Dummoc, and Badwin at Elmham, a poor village now in Norfolk. Theſe two Biſhopricks continued in being, till the Danes becoming maſters of Eaſt-Anglia, they both lay vacant for above one hundred years. After which the Dioceſe of Dummoc was united to that of Elmham: From whence the Epiſcopal See was removed to Thetford (12), and afterwards to Norwich (13), where it remains to this day.

Bede, l. 4. c. 13. IT is no wonder the kingdom of Suſſex continued ſo long after the reſt in an idolatrous ſtate, ſince it was in ſubjection to Weſſex, where the Goſpel was not preached till forty years after the arrival of Auſtin. If we may credit the author of the Life of Wilfrid Biſhop of York, the converſion of the South Saxons about the year 686, was owing to the diſgrace of that Prelate, who fled for refuge into their country. Adelwalch King of Suſſex, who received him into his protection, had already attempted the converſion of his Subjects, by founding a Monaſtery in his little kingdom (1); but his endeavours anſwered not expectation. Perhaps Wilfrid himſelf would have found it a difficult matter to have made any impreſſion upon them, had not a favourable juncture unexpectedly paved the way for him. Not long after his arrival, the country being miſerably diſtreſſed for want of proviſions, he taught the inhabitants the art of fiſhing in the Sea, their skill before going no farther than the catching of Eels. This improvement greatly relieving them, wrought ſo upon their minds, that they liſtened with the ſame attention to his inſtructions about their ſpiritual, as they had before to thoſe about their bodily wants. But to compleat the matter, ſeaſonable ſhowers, after a three years drought, reſtoring to the earth its former fruitfulneſs, they were thoroughly convinced that Wilfrid was an extraordinary perſon, and highly favoured by Heaven. At leaſt this is what the writer of his Life would fain make us believe. Wilfrid perceiving the Chriſtians daily to encreaſe, eſtabliſhed his epiſcopal See at Selſey (2), a ſmall Peninſula given him by Adelwalch. He founded there a Monaſtery alſo, which he furniſhed with the Monks he had brought with him from Northumberland. Here he uſually reſided during the time of his baniſhment. At length being recalled into his own country, Selſey remained a long while without a Biſhop, becauſe the South-Saxons, after their becoming ſubject to the King of Weſſex, were put under the juriſdiction of the Biſhop of the Weſt-Saxons. Some time after Weſſex being divided into two Dioceſes, Suſſex was annexed to the See of Wincheſter; where it continued till a Synod held in Weſſex, in the time of Daniel, decreed Suſſex ſhould be a diſtinct Dioceſe again, and the See fixed at Selſey as formerly. Edbert was the firſt Biſhop. His ſucceſſors reſided at the ſame place, down to the year 1070, when the See was removed to Chicheſter (3), where it continues to this day.

Malmſb. G. Pontif. l. 2.

As for the Iſle of Wight, after it was converted by the furious zeal of Cedwalla, it remained all along under the juriſdiction of the Biſhop of Wincheſter.

After this account of the moſt remarkable particulars relating to the converſion of the Seven Kingdoms, it will be neceſſary to take a general view of the Councils held in England, during thoſe early times of the Church.

COUNCILS.

I Have already ſpoken of the two Synods convened upon Auſtin's requeſt, in order to endeavour to bring the Britons to the obedience of the Pope. Though theſe were not properly Engliſh, but rather Britiſh Councils, I ſhall not however paſs them over without making this one obſervation. Bede, in his Eccleſiaſtical Hiſtory tells us, that Auſtin required of the Britiſh Biſhops theſe four things (4): That they would celebrate the Paſchal Feaſt the ſame day with the Romaniſts: That they would conform to the ceremonies practiſed by the Church of Rome in adminiſtring Baptiſm: That they would aſſiſt the Roman Miſſionaries in converting the Saxons: That they would ſubmit to the Papal Authority. Had Auſtin equally inſiſted on theſe four Articles, Bede would naturally have related the ſentiments of the Britiſh, concerning the three firſt, and yet we find he ſpeaks only of the laſt. Hence we may conclude, that this was the main point, and what Auſtin chiefly dwelt upon. For the ſame reaſon alſo the Abbot of Bangor anſwered only to this point, being very ſenſible, that was the principal thing in diſpute.

l. 2. c. 2.

There is no occaſion to add any thing to what has already been ſaid of the Council of Whitby or Streneaſhalh, and the other Synods that were held upon Wilfrid's account.

In 673, Theodorus, Archbiſhop of Canterbury, convened a national Synod at Hertford, at which were preſent all the Engliſh Biſhops, with a great number of other Eccleſiaſticks. The Archbiſhop, who was preſident, put the queſtion to the Biſhops, whether they were willing, the Church of England ſhould be governed by the Canons of the antient Councils. To which they all having agreed, he produced a liſt of the Canons, and pitching upon ten of them, ordered them to be read before the Council, and asked their conſent to each of them.

I. That the Feſtival of Eaſter might be uniformly kept in all the Engliſh Churches, on the firſt Sunday after the full Moon in March.

Bede, l. 4. c. 5.

II. That no Biſhop ſhould encroach upon the juriſdiction of another.

III. That Biſhops ſhould not meddle with the temporal concerns of the Monaſteries.

IV. That no Monk ſhould have the liberty to quit his Monaſtery, without leave from the Abbot.

V. That it ſhould not be lawful for any of the Clergy to abandon their Dioceſe, without the Biſhop's leave, and that they ſhould not be received into another Dioceſe, without a recommendation under the Biſhop's own hand.

VI. That Biſhops and Clergy, who are out of their Dioceſe, ought not to execute any part of their function, but ſhould be contented with an hoſpitable reception.

VII. That a Synod ſhould be convened twice a year. This Canon was altered to once a year.

VIII. That the Biſhops ſhould take their places at Councils according to their ſeniority.

IX. That new Sees ſhould be erected, as the number of Chriſtians increaſed. This was thrown out.

X. That no marriage ſhould be annulled but on account of adultery. That if a Man put off his wife, he ought not to marry another, but either be reconciled or live ſingle.

Nine of theſe Canons being agreed to, the Council denounced Excommunication and Degradation upon all that ſhould infringe them, and then broke up.

Baronius pretends, This Council was convened by the Pope's order, and that Theodorus preſided as Legate of the Holy See. But when we examine the grounds of his aſſertion, we find he builds it only upon Theodorus's ſaying in his harangue, at the opening of the council, that he was conſecrated by the Pope (5), as if that were equivalent to his being made Legate. Bede, Malmsbury, Florence of Worceſter, who ſpeak of this council, ſay not a word to ſupport the Cardinal's notion.

Theodorus ſummoned another Council or Synod at Hatfield (6) in 680, at the requeſt of the Pope, who wanted to know the ſentiments of the Church of England with reference to the Hereſy of the Monothelites (7), which then made a great noiſe in the world. The Pope had all the ſatisfaction he deſired, the Engliſh being entirely free from that error. This Synod received the five firſt general Councils (8), together with the Synod held juſt before at Rome, againſt the Monothelites.

The Council of Hatfield. 680. Bede, l. 4. c. 17 & 18. Spelman Vol. I. p. 168.

The next council was convened at Becanceld in 694 (9), by Withred King of Kent, who preſided himſelf, the council being compoſed of the Clergy and Nobility. The Conſtitutions were all drawn up in the form of a Charter, wherein the King granted ſeveral privileges to the Church, particularly an exemption from the payment of taxes and other Services and Incumbrances incident to a Lay-fee. He declares moreover that the Church has power to govern her own body, the Prerogative Royal not reaching to religious matters. This article has given occaſion to ſome to call in queſtion the genuineneſs of this council (10). They object, for inſtance, that the five Abbeſſes, who ſubſcribed this charter, not only ſigned before all the Prieſts, but alſo before Botred a Biſhop, contrary to all precedent. On the other hand, others (11) are as zealous in the defence of it, as making for the independency of the Church. It

The Council of Bergham-ſted. 679. Spelman. Vol. I. p. 194.

The next year the Synod of Berghamſted (1) was held in the reign of the ſame King. It was compoſed, like the foregoing one, of Clergy and Laity. Its canons related chiefly to the Sin of adultery, and the privileges of the Clergy. As for adultery, it was enacted, that the offender ſhould be put under penance; and if he refuſed to ſubmit to that diſcipline, he ſhould be excommunicated. If he was a ſtranger, he was to forfeit one hundred ſhillings.

As for the Clergy, it was decreed, that the Church ſhould be free and enjoy all her privileges.

That the breach of the Church's peace ſhould be puniſh'd with a fine of fifty ſhillings (2).

That the bare affirmation of the King or a Biſhop ſhould be equivalent to their oath.

That if a Biſhop, Abbot, or Deacon, is charged with any crime, and being brought to the altar, he declares ſolemnly, he ſpeaks the truth: This declaration ſhall be the ſame as his oath.

That if any Clergyman ſhould be proſecuted, the cogniſance of the cauſe belongs to the Church.

Thus by degrees the Clergy obtained their privileges, which they have but too often abuſed (3).

The two Councils that are pretended to be held at London and Alne (4) in 714, being looked upon by the beſt authorities as forged, it would be loſt time to ſay any thing of them.

The Synod of Cloveſhoo. 747. Malm. de G. Pontif. l. 4. Spelm. Conc. Vol. I. p. 242.

In 747 was held at Cloveſhoo or Cliff (5) in the kingdom of Kent a national Synod, at which Ethelbald King of Mercia was preſent, with twelve Biſhops, and a great number of Lords. Cuthbert Archbiſhop of Canterbury, who was preſident, read Pope Zachary's letter, wherein the Pope admoniſhed the Engliſh to reform their lives, and threatned thoſe with excommunication that continued in their wicked courſes. They drew up a body of twenty-eight Canons, moſt of them relating to Eccleſiaſtical Diſcipline, the Government of Monaſteries, the Duties of Biſhops, and other Clergymen, the Publick Service, Singing Pſalms, Keeping the Sabbath, and other Holidays. I ſhall mention the three following ones, as containing ſomething particular.

The Xth orders the Prieſts to be thoroughly acquainted with the doctrines of Chriſtianity, and to teach the people the Apoſtles Creed, and the Lord's Prayer in Engliſh. Agreeable to this was Bede's advice to Egbert Archbiſhop of York; that it was abſolutely neceſſary Chriſtians ſhould know what they ſaid when they prayed to God; and that they ſhould be inſtructed in their own native tongue, and therefore that he himſelf had tranſlated the Creed and the Lord's Prayer into Engliſh for the benefit of thoſe that did not underſtand Latin.

Bede, Ep. 2d Egb.

The XXVIth warns Chriſtians from vainly imagining that by giving Alms they can compound for their ſins, or diſpenſe with the Diſcipline of the Church.

The XXVIIth was made upon the account of a rich Layman, who having been excommunicated, requeſted to be admitted again into the Church, upon his having procured ſeveral perſons to faſt in his ſtead; alledging that the Penance they had undergone in his name, was more than he could have done himſelf in three hundred years. The Canon declares with great indignation againſt this intolerable preſumption, ſince at that rate, the Rich might much more eaſily get to heaven than the Poor, contrary to the expreſs declaration of our Saviour.

Spelman, p. 253.

In this Canon we have the form of a Prayer for the Dead, which runs thus: O Lord, we beſeech thee, grant that the ſoul of ſuch a perſon may be ſecured in a ſtate of repoſe, and admitted, with the reſt of thy Saints, into the regions of Light and Bliſs.

The Council of Calcuith. 785. Spelman. Vol. I. p. 291.

The Council of Calcuith or Calchite, held in 785, or according to others in 787, on account of erecting Lichfield into an Archbiſhoprick, ratified the Canons of a Synod that had been convened juſt before in Northumberland. Gregory and Theophylact, who preſided as the Pope's Legates, acknowledged in their letter to the Pope, that they were the firſt that had been ſent into England with that character. Theſe are ſome of the Canons of the Synod of Northumberland, ratified by the council of Calcuith.

I. That all in holy orders ſtrictly adhere to the Council of Nice.

II. That Baptiſm is only to be adminiſtred at Eaſter and Whitſontide, unleſs in caſe of neceſſity. That it is the duty of Godfathers to teach their Godchildren the Creed and the Lord's Prayer, both which all Chriſtians are obliged to have by heart.

VIII. The antient privileges of the Church are carefully to be preſerved.

This was a never-failing Canon in all the Councils.

IX. The Prieſts are not to eat in private, unleſs indiſpoſed. By this one would think the Clergy were not diſperſed in Pariſhes, but lived all in the Capital of the Dioceſe in common.

The Xth forbids the Clergy to perform the divine Service without Stockings, and to uſe a Chalice or Pattin of Horn.

The XIth exhorts Princes to govern their kingdoms by the directions of the Biſhops, to whom the power of binding and looſing is delivered.

The XIIth excludes Baſtards from ſucceeding to the Crown.

The XVth condemns marriages within the prohibited degrees.

The XVIth makes Baſtards, particularly the children of Nuns, incapable of inheriting.

The XVIIth urges the payment of tithes from the authority of the law of Moſes.

The XVIIIth preſſes a ſtrict performance of vows.

Some irregularities in the Subſcription Liſt in the ſeveral copies of the Canons of this council (6), have cauſed the council itſelf to be called in queſtion. But I doubt whether theſe irregularities are ſufficient to render the whole queſtionable (7).

The Synod of Finchale, Spelman, p. 304, 316.

In 798 a Synod was held at Finchale in Northumberland (8), by Eanbald Archbiſhop of York. The deſign of this meeting was to make ſome regulations with regard to diſcipline: but here occaſionally the Archbiſhop ordered the Canons of the firſt five General Councils to be read, which were unanimouſly received.

The Synod of Cloveſhoo. 800. Id. p. 318.

Another at the ſame Place. 803. Id. p. 324.

Three years after, another council was held at the ſame place, wherein, according to Pope Leo's conſtitution, and with the conſent of Cenulph King of Mercia, the Archbiſhoprick of Lichfield was reduced to a Biſhoprick, as formerly.

The Council of Calcuith. 816. Id. p. 327.

In 816, Wilfrid Archbiſhop of Canterbury, ſummoned a council at Calcuith, at which Cenulph King of Mercia and Monarch, was preſent, with all the Engliſh Biſhops except thoſe of Northumberland. There are eleven canons drawn up by this Synod. whereof the IId and Vth ſeem to be the moſt remarkable.

The IId orders all Churches to be conſecrated by the Biſhop of the Dioceſe, with the following Formalities. The Biſhop ſhall bleſs the Holy Water, and ſprinkle the Church with it, according to the directions of the Ritual. Then having conſecrated the Euchariſt, he ſhall put it in a Box with ſome Relicks to be laid up in the Church. In caſe there are no Relicks, the conſecrated Elements, being the Body and Blood of our Lord, ſhall be ſufficient. Every Biſhop ſhall be obliged to have drawn upon the Altar, or upon the Wall, the Figure of the Saint to whom the Church is dedicated.

The Vth declares againſt allowing all Scotchmen to baptize, or read the divine ſervice in England.

Spelman, p. 332, 334.

There is mention of two Councils more convened in Mercia in the reign of Bernulph, one in 821, and the other in 824. Probably the firſt is a forgery; but they are both of ſo little conſequence, as not to be worth taking notice of.

(1) This was not Berkhamſted in Hertfordſhire, as ſome have imagined, but Berghamſted, a Place in Kent. See Tyrr. Vol. I. p. 210. and Spelman Conc. Vol. I. p. 194.

(2) The ſame as the King's. See Spelman.

(3) Xth, XXVth, and XXVIIIth Articles, having ſomething particular in them, it will not be amiſs to lay them before the Reader. The Xth runs thus: If, on Saturday Evening, after Sun-ſet; or Sunday Evening after the ſame time, a Servant or Slave (Servus) ſhall do any ſervile work, let his maſter be fined eighty Shillings.

XXVth. If a Lay-man kill a Thief, let him lie without any Wiregild, that is, without any ſatisfaction being made to the Thief's relations.

XXVIIIth. If a ſtranger wanders about, and does neither hollow nor ſound a Horn, he is to be accounted as a Thief, and to be either ſlain or baniſhed. Spelman Conc. Tom. I. p. 194——197.

(4) Suppoſed to be Aulceſter in Worceſterſhire. See Spelman Conc. Vol. I. p. 212.

(5) Cliff at Hoo, is a Town on a Rock near Rocheſter. But the preſence of the King of Mercia at this, and ſome other Councils, held at Clovesho, makes it ſuppoſed that it is the ſame with Abington in Berkſhire, about the middle of the Nation, antiently written Shoveſham by miſtake for Cloveſham or Cloveſhoo.

(6) Ditcberch Biſhop Auguſtadenſis (or Hagulſtadenſis) Eccleſiæ, ſigns before Eanbald his Metropolitan of York.

(7) About the year 757, the Monks of Lindisfarn, who, from the firſt time of their inſtitution were allowed to drink nothing but Milk or Water, obtained (through the means of King Ceolwulf who was become a Monk of that Houſe) permiſſion to drink Wine or Beer. S. Dunelm, p. 139. Spelman Conc. Vol. I. p. 289.

RE-

REFLECTIONS

ON THE

Primitive State of the ENGLISH CHURCH.

I SHALL close my account of the Primitive State of the Engliſh Church, with a few remarks that may ſerve to give a juſt notion of the thing. It is a great miſtake to imagine, the Primitive Church of the Engliſh correſponded in all points with the Church founded by the Apoſtles immediately after our Saviour's death. The Chriſtian Church, in her infancy, was perfect, without ſpot or wrinkle; but in proceſs of time, ſhe loſt by degrees ſomething of her primitive purity. From the days of the Apoſtles to the VIIth century, errors and abuſes crept in, which ſtrangely disfigured her, and which daily increaſed during the VIIIth and IXth centuries, ſo that true religion by little and little degenerated into ſuperſtition. Our idea therefore of the primitive Church of England muſt be conformable to the ſtate of the Chriſtian Church at that time. I ſhall not here undertake to ſhow wherein thoſe innovations in the doctrines and ſervices of the Church conſiſted; but content myſelf with obſerving the Chriſtian Church, at the time of the converſion of the Engliſh, was far gone from its original purity. It can't, for inſtance, be denied, that the Monks, who were grown exceeding numerous all over Chriſtendom, had introduced ſeveral religious practices that were not of divine or apoſtolical inſtitution, as if our Saviour and his Apoſtles had forgot or neglected to give mankind full inſtructions in theſe matters. Theſe voluntary acts of devotion, tho' introduced with a good intent, were now carried to ſo great a height, that the generality of Chriſtians looked upon them as the life and ſoul of religion. I ſhall not inſiſt any farther on this ſubject, ſince I have no deſign to enter into the controverſy, but only to make this obſervation, That the Engliſh converted in the VIIth century, are to be conſidered as in the ſame State with the reſt of the Chriſtian World at that time, ſeeing it was not in their power to know more than their maſters taught them.

Auſtin and his companions were the firſt that preached the Goſpel to the Anglo-Saxons. However the honour of their converſion ought not to be aſcribed to them alone. The Scotch Monks of St. Columba had at leaſt as great a ſhare in it as the Italians. For after theſe laſt had begun to make Converts, the new Chriſtians being ſunk again into idolatry, the Scotch Monks were the perſons that ſet them right again, or rather that converted them anew. This was the caſe in the kingdoms of Eſſex, Northumberland, and Eaſt-Anglia, as hath been related. As for the converſion of the Mercians, the Italian Miſſionaries had no hand in it at all. And yet Auſtin had run away with the honour of converting the Engliſh, when in the main the progreſs he made was not very conſiderable. 'Tis true he preached to the Saxons of Kent, as Mellitus did to thoſe of Eſſex, and that with good ſucceſs. But then very probably this work was already begun, and even in great forwardneſs, when Auſtin arrived in England. It is hard to conceive how theſe Monks, who were forced to make uſe of interpreters, could poſſibly have converted ſuch numbers of Pagans, even to the baptizing ten thouſand in one day, in a few months after their arrival, if the Saxons had not been prepared before-hand. This conjecture is farther confirmed by the letters of Gregory I. to Theodoric King of Auſtraſia, to Theodobert his brother, and to Queen Brunichild, to deſire them to aſſiſt Auſtin in his journey to England. The Pope tells them he was informed for certain that the Engliſh earneſtly deſired to turn Chriſtians. Now is it not evident, that, if they had a ſtrong deſire to embrace the goſpel, they were as good as half converted? There is great reaſon to preſume, King Ethelbert had already ſome liking to the Chriſtian Religion infuſed into him by his Queen, and eſpecially by Luidhard, Biſhop of Soiſſons, who had attended her into England. This is what the author of The Hiſtory of St. Auſtin's Monaſtery poſitively affirms; and Malmsbury ſays little leſs, when he tells us, that Ethelbert was very deſirous to hear what Auſtin had to propoſe. Beſides, if the perſon, character and conduct of Auſtin, are conſidered, it will be hard to believe, he made the progreſs aſcribed to him. Bede, who does not ſeem willing to leſſen his reputation, ſays nothing that is very apt to raiſe in us an eſteem for his preaching. Inſtead of imbelliſhing his hiſtory with the heads of Auſtin's firſt diſcourſe before Ethelbert, he is contented with relating only the King's anſwer. This gives occaſion to ſuſpect, he was not over-ſatisfied with that harangue. Moreover, the queſtions which Auſtin wanted the Pope to ſolve, do not much redound to his honour. This, no doubt, was the reaſon why Bede abridged them as much as poſſible, even to the rendring them ſometimes ſo obſcure, that the meaning of the queſtion muſt be learnt by the anſwer.

To theſe conſiderations may be added, that Auſtin in the height of his ſucceſs, for which he is ſo greatly honoured, eſtabliſhed but two Biſhops only, Juſtus at Rocheſter, and Mellitus at London, though the Pope had expreſly ordered him to ſettle Biſhops where-ever there ſhould be occaſion. This is a clear evidence, that the progreſs aſcribed to him was not ſo conſiderable as Gregory imagines. But what can one think of this ſame Auſtin, who the very firſt year deſerts his miſſion, and goes to Arles to get himſelf conſecrated Archbiſhop, when as yet there was but a handful of Chriſtians in England, or rather in the alone kingdom of Kent? To what end the title of Archbiſhop and Primate, at a time when there was not ſo much as one Biſhop in being? What can one think moreover of the Pope's anſwer to him concerning the Biſhops of Gaul, That he allows him no manner of juriſdiction over them? May it not be preſumed, that Auſtin, not content with the Primacy of Great-Britain, wherewith the Pope had honoured him, wanted to extend his juriſdiction over Gaul too? In fine, what can one think of Gregory's letter to him, exhorting him not to be elated at the Gift of Miracles God had beſtowed on him, unleſs Auſtin had ſent him word he had wrought ſeveral? But what were theſe miracles? Would Bede, who has carefully related thoſe of Adian, Finan, Furſeus, and the other Scotch Monks, whom he looked upon as Schiſmaticks, have omitted thoſe of Auſtin? And yet he gives us only one, and that of a later date than Gregory's letter, and the moſt ſuſpicious that ever was, ſince by the confeſſion of the ſame hiſtorian, it was wrought in order to bring the Britons to the obedience of the Pope? What opinion can one have of Auſtin, when it is conſidered with what zeal he laboured to reduce the Britons under the juriſdiction of the See of Rome, whilſt five Saxon kingdoms were ſuffered to grovel in darkneſs and idolatry? To what purpoſe did he complain to the Pope of the want of labourers in ſo plentiful an harveſt, if he did not employ thoſe he already had? And if he did employ them, where are the fruits of their labours? What were their names? Where did they preach the goſpel? No hiſtorian ſays a word of theſe things; and except Juſtus and Mellitus, who preached at Rocheſter and London, it is not known where he ſent his companions, who according to the geaeral opinion, were forty in number.

Ep. l. 5. c. 58. and 59.

Again, the Converts made by theſe Italian Monks were not, 'tis to be feared, well grounded in their religion. This is a natural inference from the apoſtacy of the people of Eſſex, Eaſt-Anglia, Northumberland, and Kent itſelf, at a time when, had they been true Chriſtians, they would have given marks of the higheſt zeal. This makes one think, their converſion was without any previous inſtruction, and rather the effect of fear or complaiſance to their Kings, than of a thorough perſuaſion perſuaſien and knowledge of the truth. It is therefore ſurprizingly ſtrange, that the Converſion of the Engliſh ſhould be aſcribed to Auſtin, rather than to Aidan, to Finan, to Colman, to Cedd, to Diuma and the other Scotch Monks, who undoubtedly laboured much more abundantly than he. But here lies the caſe. Theſe laſt had not their Orders from Rome, and therefore muſt not be allowed any ſhare in the glory of this work.

Let us now reflect a little on the manner of the converſion of the Engliſh. In the beginning of Chriſtianity, and even for the firſt three hundred years, the converts generally conſiſted of people of the loweſt rank, and we hear of nothing but Perſecution and Death from the Princes and Magiſtrates. Whereas in England, the Kings were the firſt that embraced the Faith, and by their authority and example induced their ſubjects to do the ſame. In the beginning of the Church of England, we meet with no Martyrs, except the two Sons of Wulpher King of Mercia, whoſe ſtory is of very doubtful authority. Whence could proceed this difference between the Church founded by the Apoſtles themſelves, in ſo many parts of the world, and That founded in England in the VIIth Century? What is the reaſon the Devil leſs vigorouſly obſtructed the converſion of the Engliſh, than That of ſo many other nations, during the life and after the death of the Apoſtles? Theſe things afford matter for many reflections, which I ſhall not here enter into, but leave to the conſideration of the reader. I ſhall only remark, that the eaſe wherewith the converſion of the Engliſh was brought about, extremely weakens the force of the argument drawn in favour of the Chriſtian Religion, from the perſecutions of the Roman Emperors.

Penſées de Paſch.

Let a Man conſider, ſays a famous writer, the eſtabliſhment of Chriſtianity, that a religion ſo contrary to nature (1), ſhould make its way in the world, by ſuch mild and gentle means, without any violence or conſtraint, and yet ſhould be ſo firmly rooted withal, that it was not in the power of the moſt barbarous torments to compel the Martyrs to renounce their Faith; and that all this ſhould be done not only without the aſſiſtance of any Prince, but in direct oppoſition to all the Kings of the Earth, &c. It is eaſy to ſee this argument loſes much of its ſtrength when applied to the converſion of the Engliſh.

What ſtill affords further matter for our wonder is this: The Eccleſiaſtical Hiſtory ſpeaks of ſeveral Saints in different parts of the world; but withal tells us, that ſcarce one of them eſcaped being terribly perſecuted, or even loſing his life in the cauſe of Truth. Whereas in England alone, we find in the ſpace of two hundred years an incredible number of Men and Women Saints, who never knew what Perſecution meant. Moreover, if Hiſtorians may be credited, theſe Saints, for the moſt part, were endued with the gift of Miracles, though the ſwift progreſs of the Goſpel ſeemed to render them of little uſe. But what is more; a conſiderable number of theſe ſame Saints were Kings, Queens, Princes, Princeſſes, or perſons of the higheſt birth and ſtations. In the Period abovementioned we have ſeven Kings and ſeven Queens, together with eight Princes, and ſixteen Princeſſes, diſtinguiſhed with the title of Saints: Beſides ten Kings and eleven Queens, who reſigned their Crowns to turn Monks, and who, according to the notions of thoſe days, might well be ranked in the number of the Saints. If it be asked, whence is it that in the VIIth and VIIIth Centuries it was ſo eaſy for the Great to procure a Saintſhip, I can alledge no other reaſon, but that Sanctity conſiſted then in enriching the Churches and Monaſteries, which the Rich were much better able to do than the Poor.

The Engliſh were no ſooner converted, but innumerable miracles were wrought among them. They were ſo much in vogue during the two forementioned Centuries, that one or other happened (if I may ſo ſay) every day. Bede's Eccleſiaſtical Hiſtory is full of them; for he was exceeding credulous in ſuch matters, as well as Gregory I, whoſe Foible in that reſpect is viſible in his works. It is no wonder therefore the Miſſionaries he ſent into England ſhould take after him, or that the Engliſh ſhould be as eaſy of belief as their Teachers. The Benedictine Monks were the perſons that ſet all theſe Miracle on foot: Some out of pure ſimplicity, others with deſign to attract to the Monaſteries the liberalities both of High and Low. Before the Benedictines were ſpread over the Iſland, the Monks of St. Columba, leſs given to gain and worldly views, attended wholly to the ſervice of God in the places where they lived in common. But the Benedictines never reſted till they had procured great numbers of Monaſteries with large revenues, and cauſed the Papal Authority to be recognized throughout the ſeven kingdoms.

It was not however without great difficulty that the Popes extended their juriſdiction over the Northumbrians, Picts and Scots, though the Roman Prieſts and Monks laboured at it inceſſantly. The northern nations could not conceive the neceſſity of owning the Biſhop of Rome for univerſal Biſhop; and it is certain, before the Synod of Whitby, the Britons, Picts, Scots, Iriſh and Nrthumbrians unanimouſly declared againſt the Pope's authority. Bede ſays as much, when he tells us, ſpeaking of King Oſwy; He was at length convinced, that the Church of Rome was the true catholick and apoſtolical Church, though he had been educated in Scotland. As ſoon as this Prince was prevailed with, he did all he could to eſtabliſh the Papal Authority in his dominions; and Scotland at laſt was carried away with the torrent, after Egbert an Engliſh Prieſt had gained the Monks of Jona.

Upon the Engliſh ſubmitting to the juriſdiction of the Pope, all imaginable care was taken to keep them from falling off. One of the moſt effectual means made uſe of for that purpoſe, was, the not admitting into the government of the Church any but Italian Prieſts or Monks, or Engliſh ones educated at Rome or in France. This is evident from the Vth Canon of the ſecond Council of Calcuith, which forbids the allowing any Scotchman to perform divine ſervice in England. Bede plainly diſcovers the policy of Rome, when he ſays, the Pope ordered Abbot Adrian to attend Theodorus into England, that he might have an eye over him, for fear that Prelate, being a native of Cilicia, ſhould introduce into the Church of England any thing contrary to the cuſtoms of Rome.

I have but one remark more to make relating to the doctrine of the Church of England in the VIIth and VIIIth Centuries, and the beginning of the IXth. It is a great miſtake to think the Articles of Faith in the Engliſh Church were the ſame with thoſe in the Roman at this day. For inſtance, it would be very wrong to imagine the Engliſh believed, at that time, the abſolute neceſſity of Baptiſm as the Romans do at this preſent. If this doctrine had been received among them, the Council of Calcuith would not have ordered that ſacrament to be adminiſtred only at Eaſter and Whitſontide. As far from the truth is it to believe the Engliſh worſhipped Images. The contrary is evident from a letter the famous Alcuin an Engliſhman wrote to Charles the Great concerning the ſecond Council of Nice, where Image-worſhip was carried to a monſtrous height. The neceſſity of Prieſts living ſingle, is alſo a doctrine unknown to the Church of England in thoſe days, ſince it was not received there till at leaſt five hundred years after their converſion. To theſe I might add ſeveral other inſtances; but as they are not peculiar to England, I ſhall only obſerve in general, that all the innovations in the doctrines of the Church of England, from the converſion of the Engliſh to the Reformation, owe their original to Rome.

I don't find the Church of England had any thing to do in the controverſies that were on foot in the Church during the VIIth and VIIIth Centuries. Among all the Councils convened in England within that ſpace, not one decreed any thing relating to the doctrines of Religion, except the Synod of Calcuith, where the condemning the Monothelites, was ratified. Their way was to read the Canons of the General Councils, and agree to them. Thus during theſe two Centuries, it does not appear that the Church of England was troubled with Hereſies or Diſputes on the fundamental doctrines of religion. In thoſe days, the Biſhops, Prieſts and Monks were more intent upon the ways and means of augmenting their revenues, than upon the ſtudy of divinity. There were ſome alſo that were diſtinguiſhed for holineſs of life, or for zeal in propagating the Goſpel. I have already mentioned ſome few; but as I had not an opportunity of making them all known, I ſhall here ſubjoin a brief account of three or four that make a conſiderable figure in the Eccleſiaſtical Hiſtory of England.

Egbert. 716. Bede, l. 5. c. 27. l. 5. c. 10.

Egbert, an Engliſh Prieſt, retiring into Ireland to follow his ſtudies, paſſed ſome time after into Scotland, where he prevailed with the Monks of Jona to receive the rules of the Order of St. Benedict, and acknowledge the papal authority. Perhaps to this ſervice done the See of Rome, a good part of the encomiums beſtowed upon him are owing. However this be, it is ſaid that havieg a deſign to go and preach the Goſpel to the German Saxons, he was diverted from his purpoſe by an expreſs order from heaven. But, as he had the converſion of that Nation very much at heart, he pitched upon Wilbrod to go in his place.

692. Wilbrod. Bede, l. 5. c. 11.

Wilbrod being arrived in Germany, Pipin, Mayor of the Palace of France, ſent him into Frieſland, which he had lately ſubdued, to preach the Goſpel. After Wilbrod had made some stay there, he took a Journey to Rome, where he was consecrated by Pope Sergius I, Bishop of the Friesslanders. He fixed his See at Utrecht, of which he was the first Bishop.

(1) This by the By ſuppoſes the Chriſtian Religion in its primitive State to be clogged with all thoſe Abſurdities it now labours under, particularly among the Romaniſts. For ſurely nothing worſe can be ſaid of Revealed Religion, than that it is contrary to Nature, Senſe or Reaſon.

Winfrid.

Winfrid. Winfrid, an English Benedictine Monk, was sent into Germany, where he assumed the Name of Boniface. His preaching having met with great Success, he was made the first Archbishop of Mentz, and the Pope's Legate for all Germany. It is said he was the Son of a Cartwright, and that the Archbishops of Mentz for that reason bear Wheels in their Arms. Boniface was barbarously murdered by the Pagans in Friesland in 754 (1). 754.

Guthlack. Guthlack (2) was the first Anchoret in England. He made choice, for his Retirement, of a Fenny Place in Mercia, called Croyland, where the famous Monastery of that name was afterwards built (3). 754. Ingulph.

(1) Pits says, he was of Royal Extraction. There is a Collection of his Letters extant, particularly his Letter to Etheldred King of Mercia, publish'd at Mentz by Serrarius. Du Pin. Cent. VIII.

(2) He had been a Soldier seven Years, and out of Humanity us'd to return the Enemy a third part of the Plunder taken from them.

(3) As the Translator designs to take notice of all the Historians omitted by Rapin, he begins with NENNIUS, Abbot of Bangor, supposed to be one of the fifty Monks that escaped, when twelve hundred of their Brethren were slain by Adelfrid King of Northumberland. He flourish'd about the Year 620; tho' it is said in the best Copies of his Book, that he wrote in 850, in 24 Mervini Regis. There is nothing published of his but his Historia Britonum.

Next after him comes BEDE, who wrote an Ecclesiastical History of England, from Julius Cæsar's Invasion, to the year of our Lord 731, at the Request of Ceolulph King of Northumberland, to whom it was dedicated. He was born in 673, in the Precincts of the Monastery of Jarrow, near the Mouth of the Tine in Northumberland. He was bred up from his Childhood in the said Monastery, where he lived all his Life. He was ordained at nineteen a Deacon, and at thirty a Priest; from which time, till the fifty-ninth of his Age, he never ceas'd writing. His Works are printed in eight Tomes, besides his Opuscula. He died in 735, aged sixty-two. His Body was removed from Jarrow to Durham, and placed in the same Coffin with St. Cuthbert's.

Cotemporary with Bede liv'd Stephen EDDI, Heddi, or Eddius, in the Reign of Osric King of Northumberland, he died in 720. Bede says, he was the best singer in the North; on which account he was invited to York by Wilfrid the Bishop, whose Life he wrote in Latin, in somewhat a better Stile than could be expected from that Age. This Treatise, which contains several material Passages relating to the Ecclesiastical as well as Civil State, having continued in Manuscript in the Library of Sir John Cotton, and also that of Salisbury, was published by Dr. Gale in his last Volume of English Writers.

In the VIIIth Century liv'd ALCUIN, or Albin, a famous Northumbrian. He was bred a Benedictine, and was made Abbot of St. Augustine's Canterbury. He was Disciple to Egbert Archbishop of York. Being sent Ambassador by Offa to Charles the Great, that Prince got leave for him to stay at his Court, and was taught by him Logick, Astronomy, and Mathematicks. By his Persuasion the Emperor founded the University of Paris, and likewise of Pavia. He wrote a great many Books, as says Pits. He died in 804. Malmsb.

ENGLAND now grown more powerful by theUnion of the ſeven Kingdoms, ſeemed to be better ſecured than ever from foreign Invaſions. And yet, preſently after this Union it was, that the Danes began their Deſcents with a Fury, equal to that wherewith the Engliſh themſelves had formerly attacked the Britons. For above two hundred Years theſe new Enemies were ſo obſtinately bent upon the ruin of the Iſland, that it can't be conceived, either how their Country could ſupply them with Troops ſufficient for ſo long and bloody a War, or the Engliſh hold out againſt ſo many reiterated Attacks. ThisWar is to be the chief ſubject of our fourth Book, and of great part of the fifth. But before I enter upon particulars, it will be neceſſary to premiſe ſome account of theſe Danes, who in the IXth Century became ſo formidable to all Europe, and eſpecially to England.

Origin of the Danes.

Scandia or Scandinavia (1), ſituated in the North of Europe, contains a Tract of Land in length from North to South about four hundred Leagues, and in breadth from Eaſt to Weſt about one hundred and fifty. If the northern Hiſtorians are to be credited in what they ſay of the Origin of their Anceſtors, this Country was peopled ſoon after the flood, by two Nations, or rather two branches of the ſame Nation, I mean, the Goths and Swedes, who founded two large Kingdoms in this part of the World. From theſe two Nations, who were ſometimes united and ſometimes divided, ſprung, as they ſay, all thoſe Colonies, which after the decline of the Roman Empire, over-ran the reſt of Europe. But without ſtaying to examine, whether all they advance concerning the Conqueſts of theſe Adventurers is built on good Authority, I ſhall take them for Guides in what they ſay of thoſe that remained in the northern Countries.

In the reign of Eric the ſixth King of the Goths (2) Gothland was become ſo exceeding populous, that the Country was unable to maintain its Inhabitants. To remedy this Inconvenience, which daily increaſed, Eric was compelled to ſend away part of his Subjects to ſeek their fortune in the neighbouring Iſles (3). Theſe Colonies at length not only peopled the Iſlands, but alſo Jutland on the Continent, formerly known by the name of Cimbrica Cherſoneſus. The People thus ſpread over the Iſles and the Cherſoneſe, acknowledged above ſeven hundred Years the Kings of Gothland for their Sovereigns. Humel the ſixteenth King of the Goths, firſt made them independent, by letting them have for their King, Dan his Son, from whom Denmark received its name (4). Norway alſo very probably was peopled by Gothic Colonies, ſince it remained a long while under the Dominion of the Kings of Gothland. In proceſs of time, and after many Revolutions, Norway was governed by Judges independent of Gothland, till about the end of the IXth Century, when it became ſubject to a King.

Saxo Gram. Chron. Dan.

The Danes and Norwegians, being thus ſeparated from their Anceſtors the Goths and Swedes, became ſo powerful as to be in condition to make head againſt them both in ſeveral Wars. The ſituation of their Country, and the great plenty of all things neceſſary for building and equipping a Fleet, ſoon made them ſuperior at Sea to all their Neighbours. In time, they employed all their naval Forces in plundering of Ships, and ravaging the Coaſts of Europe. France, England, and the Low Countries, were moſt expoſed to their Robberies. For above one hundred and fifty Years the Sea was covered with Daniſh Pyrates. They were grown ſo powerful, that Charles the Great could never ſubdue the Saxons, whilſt aſſiſted by the Danes. Hiſtory obſerves, that this Emperor having ſent his Son Pepin to make War upon the Saxons, this Prince was prevented in his deſigns by Gothric King of Denmark's ſending a reinforcement of Danes on board three hundred Veſſels. A northern Hiſtorian affirms, that Charles the Great was never better pleaſed than at the news of Gothric's death, having deſpaired of accompliſhing his ends, as long as that Prince was alive.

Jo. Magnus, l. 17. c. 1.

As People encreaſe and multiply exceedingly in cold countries, it often happened that Denmark and Norway were overſtocked with Inhabitants, and therefore forced, in order to make room for the reſt, to ſend away large Colonies. Their natural Inclination to a Sea-faring Life made theſe Colonies readily abandon their Country, as it procured them greater Liberty of roving and playing the Pyrate, on pretence of looking out new Habitations. This was chiefly the riſe of thoſe Pyracies committed by the Danes and Norwegians, in the IXth Century, in France, England, the Low-Countries and Germany. The great Booty the firſt Adventurers brought off, tempted the richeſt and moſt powerful of their Countrymen to try their Fortune in the ſame manner. They entered into Aſſociations, and fitted out large Fleets to go and ravage foreign Countries. Theſe Aſſociations were much of the ſame nature with thoſe entered into now a-days in time of war, by the inhabitants of the Sea-port Towns in France and Flanders, and always by the Corſairs of Barbary. In ſhort, they were ſo uſed to this gainful way of trading, that very conſiderable Fleets were put to ſea. They had the Authority of their Kings for what they did, who, having always a ſhare in the ſpoils, provided them with Admirals and Generals, and when a conſiderable Booty was in view, made no ſcruple even to command them in Perſon. Theſe are the Fleets that made ſuch Devaſtations in ſeveral parts of Europe, and cauſed the Inhabitants of France, England, and the Low-Countries, to make ſad Lamentation for the miſeries brought upon them by the northern Nations (1). They were called in France, Normans, that is to ſay, Men of the North; but in England, they were generally ſtiled Danes or Goths. There is no doubt but the Swedes and Goths very often joined with the Danes in order to go ſhares in the Booty. Nay, it appears that the Frieſlanders were concerned with the Danes in ravaging the Coaſts of France and England. This doubtleſs is the reaſon the Engliſh Hiſtorians call them indifferently, Getes, Goths, Jutes, Norwegians, Dacians, Danes, Swedes, Vandals, Frieſlanders, their Armies being compoſed of theſe ſeveral Nations.

Rog. de Hov.

It is eaſy to ſee, from what has been ſaid of the Danes, that their Intent, when firſt they invaded the Coaſts of England, was only to plunder. And therefore they made War, not like regular Troops, with ſome fixed and ſettled Deſign, but like Pyrates, ſacking and deſtroying what they could not carry away. As they were divided into ſeveral independent bands, it frequently happened that no ſooner was One gone, but Another came; by which means the Inhabitants had ſcarce any reſpite from their Incurſions. This way of making War was very inconvenient for the Engliſh, it obliging them to be upon their guard at all Times and in all Places, ſince the Iſland was liable to be attacked on every Side. On the other hand, their Enemies, whoſe numbers were continually increaſing, being headed by leaders who had no authority over each other, there was no entering into Treaty with them, one Band not looking upon it ſelf bound by what another did. Thus the Engliſh having nothing to gain, but much to loſe, were at a loſs what meaſures to take againſt theſe Enemies, who carried deſolation wherever they came. I am very ſenſible the Daniſh Hiſtorians ſet theſe matters in quite another Light. They expreſs the advantages the Danes had over the Engliſh in their firſt Incurſions, by the name of Conqueſts, and ſtile the ſtruggles of the Engliſh to free themſelves from Oppreſſion, ſo many revolts.

Six. Gram. Magnus. Jornandes. Meurſius. Pontanus.

But notwithſtanding their giving things theſe ſpecious Names, their advantages are to be conſidered as before repreſented, at leaſt for the firſt hundred years after they began their ravages.

Before I leave this Subject it will be proper to obſerve that the Engliſh and Daniſh Hiſtorians give very contradictory accounts of theſe Wars. Each endeavours to the utmoſt of his Power, to magnify the advantages of his own Nation, and leſſen thoſe of the oppoſite Party. However it is but too viſible that the Danes could not have got ſuch footing in England, had not victory generally inclined to their Side. But this is not all wherein Hiſtorians diſagree. They differ chiefly in Chronological Matters, and in the names of the Perſons of whom they are ſpeaking, which muſt of neceſſity breed the greateſt confuſion in Hiſtory.

Through all theſe difficulties am I obliged to ſteer my Courſe, with all imaginable circumſpection and warineſs, leſt I ſhould be put to a ſtand by the obſtacles that every Moment occur. If the Readers do not find that Connection, and thoſe other Embelliſhments they could wiſh for, it muſt be remembered, that the narration of a War, carried on for the ſake of plunder only, is hardly capable of Connection or Embelliſhment.

After theſe Remarks, which ſeemed to me neceſſary for the better underſtanding of the Sequel, it is time to return to the Reign of Egbert, which was left unfiniſhed in the foregoing Book, where he appeared only as King of Weſſex. He is now to make his appearance as King of all England, and as real Monarch of the ſeven Kingdoms of the Heptarchy.

EGBERT, firſt King of ENGLAND.

EGBERT, firſt King of England. 828. Tyrrel. p. 254.

EGBERT, who began his Reign over the Weſt-Saxons in 800, finiſhed not his Conqueſts till 827 or 828, from which time his Title of King of England is to be dated. But to avoid miſtakes, it muſt be remembred, that the Kingdom this Prince was in actual poſſeſſion of, conſiſted of the ancient Kingdoms of Weſſex, Suſſex, Kent and Eſſex, that were peopled by Saxons and Jutes. As for the other three Kingdoms, whoſe Inhabitants were Angles, he was contented with reſerving the Sovereignty over them, permitting them to be governed by Kings who were his Vaſſals and Tributaries (2).

It has been ſeen how this Prince, before he turned his Arms againſt his Countrymen, attacked and ſubdued the Britons of Cornwal and Wales. Though his Power, after that, was exceedingly encreaſed, yet the Welſh by their proceedings plainly ſhowed they deſigned to ſhake off his Yoke. Egbert informed of their Intent, gave them no time to put it in Execution. He marched into their Country with ſo numerous an Army, that they were forced to ſubmit, without offering to come to a Battle.

The Danes make a Deſcent. 833. Ann. Sax. Malmsb. l. 2.

Whilſt Egbert was enjoying the Fruits of his Victories, the Danes, who had before made two deſcents on England (3), arrived at Charmouth (4) with thirty five Veſſels. As they met with no Oppoſition, they landed and fell to ravaging the Country. Egbert, upon the firſt news of this Deſcent, marched againſt them with what Troops he could haſtily draw together, verily believing at his approach they would repair to their Ships; which though he found they did not do, but on the contrary firmly ſtood their Ground, he reſolved to attack them. But he ſoon experienced he had to deal with much more formidable Enemies than he imagined. After a long and bloody Battle (5), he had the vexation to ſee them victorious, and his own Army entirely routed. Nay, he found himſelf ſo very hard preſſed, that he was forced at length to follow his flying Troops; being indebted to the darkneſs of the night for his very Life. This mortification, very grievous to a Prince hitherto ever victorious, cauſed him to take other meaſures for his defence againſt theſe new Iuvaders. In the mean time the Danes, having no deſign to make Conqueſts, were ſatisfied with plundering the Country, and returning to their Ships.

Egbert worſted by the Danes.

The Danes make another Deſcent. 835. Sax. Ann.

Two years after, another band of Daniſh Pyrates, having been informed by their Spies, that the Corniſh Britons (6) were extremely deſirous of throwing off the yoke of the Engliſh, went and landed in their Territories, where they were received with Joy. Being reinforced with ſome Britiſh Troops, they began their march in order to give the Engliſh Monarch Battle. They were in hopes to ſurpriſe him, but were themſelves aſtoniſhed to hear he was marching directly towards them with the ſame Intent. His former Misfortune having made him more cautious, he had kept his Army in readineſs to march upon the firſt notice of their Arrival. Accordingly being informed they were landed in the Weſt, he haſtened thither with all his Forces. He engaged them near Hengiſtdun (1) in Cornwal, and obtained a ſignal Victory, which quite effaced the diſhonour of his former Defeat.

Egbert gains a great Victory.

After this fortunate Blow, which delivered the Engliſh for a ſhort ſpace from the Daniſh Invaſions, we find but one remarkable particular in Egbert's Reign. It is ſaid that this Prince, by a publick Edict, approved by the general Aſſembly of the Nation, ordered, That for the future the name of England ſhould be given to that part of Great-Britain, conquered by the Anglo-Saxons, and erected into ſeven Kingdoms (2). But it is much more likely, he only confirmed or revived this Name, which certainly is older than the Reign of Egbert. We find in Bede's Eccleſiaſtical Hiſtory, that before that time the three Nations ſettled in Great-Britain, are indifferently called Angli or Engliſh. And indeed Bede himſelf, who wrote long before Egbert, gives his Hiſtory the title of the Eccleſiaſtical Hiſtory of the Engliſh Nation, though it much more relates to the Churches of Kent, Weſſex, Suſſex and Eſſex, than to thoſe of Mercia, Northumberland, and Eaſt-Anglia. I have already ſaid, that the change of the name of Britain into that of England, ought to be carried back to the Year 585 or 586. In confirmation of which, and to ſhew the improbability of Egbert's being the Author of this Change, I ſhall alledge the following Proofs, which to me ſeem very ſtrong. In the firſt place, Egbert had no reaſon to call the ſeven Kingdoms England, ſince he himſelf was a Saxon, and the Provinces, his own Kingdom conſiſted of, were peopled with Saxons and Jutes. Beſides, the Angles or Engliſh, inhabiting Mercia, Eaſt-Anglia, and Northumberland, were his Vaſſals and Tributaries. Now is it at all likely, that the Conqueror ſhould impoſe on his victorious Subjects the Name of thoſe they had ſubdued? This might indeed be done inſenſibly, but it is not probable a Conqueror ſhould enjoin it by an Edict; but as this amounts to no more than Conjecture, I ſhall proceed to more ſubſtantial Proofs. An Hiſtorian poſitively affirms, that a little after the founding of the ſeven Kingdoms, the name of England was given to Britain by the unanimous conſent of the ſeven Kings. But this can by no means be applied to the time of Egbert, (above two hundred and fifty Years after) ſince that Prince could not have publiſhed this Edict till after the diſſolution of the Heptarchy. Beſides, how came Bede, who lived one hundred and fifty Years before Egbert, to call the three Nations ſettled in Britain, Engliſhmen, if that Monarch was the Author of that Name? But what is ſtill more convincing, though the Subjects of Ina, King of Weſſex, were Saxons or Jutes, that Prince however, in his Laws enacted for the Weſt-Saxons, only ſtiles them Engliſhmen. If an Engliſhman, ſays he, commits Theft.——Again, If a Welſh Slave ſhall kill an Engliſhman.——Is it not plain, that unleſs this name had been common to the three Nations, Ina would not have called his Subjects Engliſhmen, but Saxons? In ſhort, it is not at all ſtrange that immediately after founding the ſeven Kingdoms, the Anglo-Saxons ſhould term their Conqueſt, England, ſince the Angles were in poſſeſſion of a larger and more conſiderable Tract of Land than both the Saxons and Jutes. But it was not natural this Name ſhould be introduced in the Reign of Egbert, when the three Kingdoms of the Angles were gone to decay, and the Kingdom of the Weſt-Saxons in a flouriſhing Condition.

Egbert confirms the changing the Name of Britain into that of England.

Proofs of his not being the firſt Author of that Change.

Jo. Sariſb.

Brompt. Leges Inæ. l. 26. lex. 78.

Egbert died in 838 (3), after he had reigned thirty ſeven Years, twenty Years as King of Weſſex only, ſeven Years with the dignity of Monarch, and ten Years as real Sovereign of all England. Redburg his Spouſe had never aſſumed the Title and Port of a Queen, becauſe of the Law made in Weſſex, on account of the death of Brithric. She is ſaid to have perſuaded the King to forbid the Welſh on pain of Death to come beyond Offa's Dike, the Boundary of Mercia and Wales.

The Death of Egbert. 838. Sax. Ann. J. Beaver.

Egbert left but one Son, named Ethelwulph, who ſucceeded him both as King of Weſſex, Eſſex, Kent and Suſſex, and as Sovereign of the other three Kingdoms. Egbert had doubtleſs another Son, ſince this was deſigned for the Church. A modern Author gives the Name of Ethelbert to Egbert's eldeſt Son; but I know not whence he had his Information. Some ſay he had alſo a Daughter called Edgith, who founded the Abbey of Polleſworth (4), but this is uncertain.

Rudb. Hiſt. Mon. Wincheſt. Tyrrel. J. Tinmuth.

By all that has been ſaid of Egbert, it is eaſy to ſee this Prince had all the Qualifications of a great Warrior. He accompliſhed his Ends, not by ſuch methods as Hengiſt and Offa had taken, but by way of Arms, which tho' no leſs Criminal, tarniſhes not the Reputation of thoſe that make uſe of it, eſpecially when crowned with Succeſs. It is a lamentable thing that Ambition, by which Princes are led to invade the Property of others, ſhould paſs in the World for a Virtue, and that an Hiſtorian, by reaſon of Men's depraved Notions, ſhould not dare to repreſent it in its true colours, ſince, generally ſpeaking, they are your ambitious Princes that are honoured with the Sirname of Great.

2. ETHELWULPH.

ETHELWULPH, 2d King of England. 838. An. Sax. H. Hunt. l. 5.

ETHELWULPH, Egbert's only Son, came to the Crown after his Father's Death. Some ſay he was forced to have a Diſpenſation from the Pope, becauſe he was in Holy-Orders. But it is not very likely, that after the Death of his elder Brother, Egbert would ſuffer him to be bred a Churchman, ſince he had no other Son to ſucceed him (5).

The Danes land at Southampton. Sax. Ann. Huntingd. l. 3.

Ethelwulph was hardly warm in his Throne, when a Fleet of Danes (6) appeared near Southampton. After they had roved up and down for ſome time, they landed and ravaged the flat Country. Ethelwulph, a lover of Peace and his Eaſe, ſent Wulfherd his General againſt them, who beat them back to their Ships. But the King had not reaſon long to rejoice at this Victory. Before his Army returned, News was brought him, that more Daniſh Forces, having landed at Portland, were plundering and deſtroying the Country. Though he had no reaſon to be diſpleaſed with Wulfherd, (7), he ſent Earl Ethelhelm to command the Army, who was ſhamefully beaten and put to flight (8). Herbert the ſucceeding General was ſtill more unfortunate, for he was not only vanquiſhed, but loſt his Life in the Battle. Theſe two Victories gave the Danes opportunity to overrun ſeveral Counties, particularly Kent and Middleſex (9). Canterbury, Rocheſter, and London were great ſufferers on this occaſion, the Enemy committing unheard-of Cruelties before they returned to their Ships.

Some make Witglaph King of Mercia die this Year 839. Others place his Death two Years ſooner in 837. But this difference is of little moment, this Prince making but a very mean Figure after he became Vaſſal to the King of Weſſex (10). Berthulph his Brother ſucceeded him.

Deſtruction of the Picts.

This year (or as ſome ſay the year before) was very remarkable for the entire deſtruction of the Picts. After a long War with the Scots their neighbours, they loſt two ſucceſſive Battles, which diſabled them from making any farther Reſiſtance. Keneth II. King of Scotland, exaſperated againſt them for having ſlain his Father, and inhumanly mangling his corps, told the Scots they ought not to loſe the preſent opportunity of rooting out a nation that had been their perpetual Enemies. His advice was approved of, and executed with ſuch a barbarous Fury, that from that time nothing remains but the bare memory of that miſerable Nation, which had ſo long flouriſhed in Great-Britain. It is chiefly owing to his extirpating the Picts, that Keneth II. was looked upon by the Scots as an illuſtrious Prince, and one of the Founders of their Monarchy.

The Danes continuing their Incurſions, Ethelwulph, who was naturally ſlothful, thought himſelf unable to govern alone all his dominions, expoſed as they were to the perpetual Inſults of Foreigners. This conſideration, and perhaps his tender Affection for Athelſtan his natural Son (1), made him reſolve to reſign to him the Kingdoms of Kent, Eſſex, and Suſſex (2), with the Title of King of Kent, reſerving to himſelf the Sovereignty of all England, with the Kingdom of Weſſex.

841. Ethelred King of Northumberland. G. Dunelm. M. Weſt.

ANDRED King of Northumberland died in 841, and was ſucceeded by Ethelred his Son.

Roderic, ſirnamed Mawr, (i. e.) the Great, was then King of Wales. This Prince, to whom the Britiſh Hiſtorians give the higheſt Commendations, attacked Berthulph King of Mercia with great ſucceſs. As little inclined to War as Ethelwulph was, he was obliged to march in perſon into Mercia, to ſtop the progreſs of the Welſh prince. He eaſily ſaw the dangerous conſequence of ſuffering the Welſh to recover any part of the country taken from them by the Engliſh. And therefore, without ſtaying to be ſollicited, he went and joined Forces with the King of Mercia. Whilſt Roderic had to deal with Berthulph alone, he imagined he was powerful enough to diſpoſſeſs him, if not of the whole, yet at leaſt of good part of his Kingdom. But when he found Ethelwulph engaged in the quarrel, he deſiſted from his Enterprize and ſued for Peace, which he obtained without any difficulty, both the Sovereign and his Vaſſal deſiring only to live in peace and quiet. This ſame Roderic left three Sons, among whom he ſhared his dominions, which by that means were divided into the three Kingdoms of Venedotia, Demetia, and Powis.

Ethelred King of Northumberland expell'd and reſtor'd. M. Weſt.

Ethelred, who aſcended the Throne of Northumberland in 841, was driven out of the Country three years after, by one of the Factions that for a long time prevailed by turns in that Kingdom, and Redowald put in his place. The new King being ſlain ſhortly after by the Danes, in a deſcent made on Northumberland, Ethelred was recalled by his Party, who were now become powerful enough to ſupport him in the Throne.

845. The Danes defeated. Sax. Ann. Fl. Wig.

The Danes never failed to viſit England once a year, purely for the ſake of plunder. In 845 the Earls Enulph and Oſric, with Biſhop Alſtan, gave them battle near the River Parret (3), and obtained a ſignal Victory, which probably was the reaſon the Engliſh remained unmoleſted for ſome years.

Osbert King of Northum. 848. G. Dunelm. Fl. Wig.

The King of Northumberland reigned but three years after his Reſtoration. The oppoſite Party having put him to death, a Lord, named Osbert, was placed on the Throne. The troubles and diviſions in that Kingdom gave the Danes opportunity of making frequent Incurſions. Whenever they came, they were ſure of being welcome to the weakeſt Party. Neither of the Factions ſcrupling to join with the Danes in order to get uppermoſt.

851. The Danes land in Weſſex, and are defeated. Sax. Ann.

Whilſt the Danes were thus employed in the North, the Southern Provinces enjoyed ſome Tranquility. But at length, in 851, they landed on the Coaſt of Weſſex, where they committed unſpeakable Cruelties. After ravaging the Country, they were met as they were returning to their Ships with their Booty, by Earl Ceorle, Ethewulph's General (4), who waited for them at Wenbury (5). Being incumbred with their Spoils, they fought in ſuch diſorder, that they were entirely routed. Some time after, King Athelſtan going on board his Fleet, fought the Danes near Sandwich, and took nine of their Ships. He could not however prevent another Band from wintering in the Iſland of Shepey.

Aſſer. vit. Alf.

The ill Succeſs the Danes met with, did not in the leaſt diſcourage them. The next Spring they came up the Thames with three hundred Sail (6), and nothing being able to oppoſe them, landed near London, where they began their uſual Ravages. The two Kings, not expecting this ſudden Invaſion, did not dare to take the Field, till they had an Army capable of withſtanding them, which they endeavoured to have with all poſſible expedition.

852. Another Deſcent of the Danes. Aſſer. Huntingd.

Whilſt the two Princes were making preparations, the Danes made uſe of their time to plunder: They were not content with ravaging the Country, but attacked the Towns, which, for the moſt part, not being in condition to ſtand a Siege, were forced to open their Gates to their mercileſs Enemies. London and Canterbury were great ſufferers on this occaſion. Having pillaged theſe two Cities, they marched into Mercia, and overthrew an army led againſt them by Berthulph, in defence of his Country (7). Nothing more oppoſing their progreſs, they would have over-run all England, if the news that Ethelwulph and Athelſtan deſigned to intercept them in their return, had not made them halt. They repaſſed the Thames, with deſign to give the two Kings battle, now encamped at Okely in Surrey. They committed in their march ſuch barbarities, that the very mention of them would ſtrike one with horror. In ſhort, they engaged the two Kings in the very place where they had encamped in expectation of the Enemy. Here a bloody Battle was fought, wherein the Engliſh at length were victorious, and made ſo terrible a ſlaughter of the Danes, that very few eſcaped.

Buthred King of Mercia. Sax. Ann. Huntingd. Fl. Wig.

After the Battle of Okely we hear no more of Athelſtan, and therefore preſume he did not long ſurvive that great Victory, to which his Valour greatly contributed. Although Ethelwulph had ſeveral Sons born in wedlock, that were old enough to aſſiſt him in the Adminiſtration of Affairs, yet he would not give Ethelbald his eldeſt, Athelſtan's Kingdom. Beſides his having no great Affection for him, he dreaded his reſtleſs and turbulent Spirit. The young Prince, who thought himſelf no leſs worthy of a Crown than Athelſtan his Baſtard-brother, was very much diſguſted at this pretended Injuſtice.

ETHELWULPH alone.

Character of Ethelwulph, and his two Favourites.

ETHELWULPH was extremely addicted to Religion, both by Temper and Education. He would willingly, if permitted, have ſpent whole Days together in converſation with the Monks, whilſt the Danes were ranſacking his Kingdom in a mercileſs manner. The Victory of Okely procuring him ſome reſpite from thoſe formidable enemies, he was at liberty to follow his natural Inclination. He had two Favourites who equally ſhared his Affection and Confidence. They were both Biſhops, but of very different Characters. The firſt named Swithin, Biſhop of Winchester, was continually entertaining the King upon the Vanity of all worldly Glory, and the Joys of Heaven. The ſecond called Alſtan, Biſhop of Sherborn, was not at all pleaſed with the King's giving himſelf up wholly to his Devotions. He could have wiſhed he would have exerted himſelf more vigorouſly in repulſing the Danes, and employed his time in making preparations againſt their next return. To that end he never ceaſed animating him, by laying before him the glorious Deeds of his Anceſtors, particularly thoſe of his Father Egbert, in which he was moſt nearly concerned. He was not ſatisfied with ſtirring him up by lively Exhortations, but furniſhed him alſo with Money to haſten his warlike Preparations.

H. Hunt. G. Malm. l. 2. c. 2. & de Pontif.

Theſe two Prelates bore an abſolute ſway over the King, who was naturally of a ſlothful and indolent Temper. The one had the aſcendant in Peace, the other in War. Alſtan kept his ground a long while, by reaſon of the frequent Invaſions of the Danes, which robbed the King of great part of the time he would have employed in his Devotions. But as ſoon as he found he was like to enjoy ſome Quiet, he was entirely guided by the Biſhop of Wincheſter. This Prelate, taking advantage of the King's religious Diſpoſition, ſo engroſſed him to himſelf, that Alſtan, whoſe advice was not ſo conformable to the King's Inclination, found his credit by degrees to diminiſh. Swithin, all in all with the King, confirmed him more and more in his natural Biaſs to a religious Life. Above all, he inſtilled into him an extreme affection for the Church and Clergy, wherein the main of Religion was then made to conſiſt. By his advice it was that this Prince, as it is pretended, granted to the Church the Tithes of all his Dominions (1). Hitherto the revenues of the Church were not very conſiderable; but by this new grant they were increaſed to that degree, that Ethelwulph's ſucceſſors had frequent occaſion to wiſh, he had left the Clergy in their former State.

853. Alfred ſent to Rome. Fl. Wig. Aſſer.

To this zeal for Religion it was owing alſo that he ſent to Rome his youngeſt Son Alfred, then about five Years of Age. As he was very fond of this Child, he imagined, no doubt, the Pope's Bleſſing would be ratified in Heaven, and procure him great Happineſs. If we may believe certain Hiſtorians, Leo IV, did not only bleſs the young Prince, but gave him alſo the ceremony of the Royal Unction (2). But this appears to have no foundation, unleſs it is pretended the Pope knew by Revelation, that Alfred ſhould one Day come to the Crown, though the youngeſt of four Brothers. Beſides, Alfred had not the Title of King till long after, when the Crown was devolved to him by the Death of his three elder Brothers. There are ſome who, on ſuppoſition of this ſame Unction, maintain that the Pope only anointed him with Chriſm at the ceremony of his Confirmation, which gave occaſion for ſome to imagine that Alfred received the Royal Unction before-hand, becauſe he was one Day to aſcend the Throne of England (3).

853. He goes himſelf to Rome. Aſſer. S. Dunelm. Malmſb.

Ethelwulph's great zeal for Religion would not let him be eaſy, without the ſatisfaction of paying a viſit to the Pope in perſon, and receiving his Benediction. As England was then in profound Peace, he reſolved upon going to Rome, and accordingly did ſo in 855 (4). At his arrival, Leo gave him an honourable Reception, and in return met with all the reſpect and ſubmiſſion that could be expected from ſo devout a Prince. During his ſtay at Rome, he diligently viſited the Churches, Chapels, Holy Relicks, and every thing capable of feeding his Devotion. The Engliſh College, founded by Ina and enlarged by Offa, having been burnt down [the Year before] he cauſed it to be rebuilt in a more magnificent manner than before; and deſiring to endow the College with greater revenues than his Predeceſſors had done, extended the Tax of Peter-Pence all over his Dominions, which till then had been levied only in Weſſex and Mercia. He obliged himſelf moreover to ſend to Rome yearly the Sum of three hundred Mancus's [or Marks] (5), two hundred whereof were to be expended in Wax Tapers for the Churches of St. Peter and St. Paul, and the remaining one hundred for the Pope's private uſe. Theſe are the Liberalities, that gave occaſion to certain Hiſtorians to aſſert, that Ethelwulph made his Kingdom tributary to the Holy See. But what wrong uſes ſoever might be made of them in Time, it is certain they were no more originally than charitable Donations to the Churches and Engliſh College.

Sigonius de Reg. Ital.

Ethelwulph having ſatisfied his Devotion and Curioſity by a twelve Months ſtay at Rome, returned home through France, where he married Judith, the Daughter of Charles the Bald (6), a young Princeſs of twelve Years of Age (7). This unſuitable as well as unſeaſonable Match, he having already ſeveral Children, was made another pretence for the Conſpiracy forming againſt him in England.

He marries Judith, Daughter to Charles the Bald. Sax. Ann. Malmſb.

Whilſt Ethelwulph was buſied at Rome in Acts of Devotion, Alſtan Biſhop of Sherborn, formerly his Favourite, but ſince the loſs of his Credit, his Enemy, took advantage of his Abſence to ſeduce Ethelbald his eldeſt Son, by way of Revenge (8). This young Prince, being of an evil Diſpoſition, was already very angry with his Father, for not inveſting him with the Kingdom of Kent after Athelſtan's Death; and therefore very readily cloſed with Alſtan's pernicious Counſels. The Prelate repreſented to him, that Ethelwulph lived more like a Monk than a King, and by his negligence would, it was to be feared, expoſe his Kingdom to Dangers and Ruin; that ſince he delighted ſo much in converſing with the Monks, it was fit he ſhould paſs the reſidue of his Days in a Monaſtery, and leave his Kingdom to a Son, more capable than himſelf of governing it. The young Prince, burning with deſire and impatience to enjoy the Crown, was ſhaken with this Diſcourſe. As his Heart was not ſound, there was no need of repeating it often in order to gain him: The news of Ethelwulph's Marriage coming juſt at that very time, put the finiſhing ſtroke to the Matter. He thought he had reaſon to fear that, if there ſhould be any Children by this ſecond Marriage, they would be able to diſpute with him the ſucceſſion to the Crown, by help of the King of France. Theſe conſiderations moved him to cabal with the Nobles how to prevent the King's return. Alſtan, author of the Plot, did all that lay in his power to gain the Nobles and People to the Prince's Intereſt, and it was not long before he formed a powerful Party in his favour. Ethelwulph, informed of theſe Proceedings, immediately left France, and arrived in England, before his Son had taken all neceſſary meaſures to hinder his landing. However, Ethelbald purſued his Deſign, and openly declared his Intent to dethrone his Father. As Ethelwulph had dignified his new Wife with the Title of Queen, in conſideration of her illuſtrious Birth, Ethelbald made uſe of that pretence to give ſome colour to his Revolt. He alledged, that by the expreſs terms of the Law made upon the account of Brithric's Murder, the Weſt-Saxons were abſolved from their Oath of Allegiance to the King. All things now tended to a Civil War, which could not but prove fatal to England, ſince, beſides other Miſchiefs, it would undoubtedly bring on freſh Invaſions from the Danes. But ſome of the wiſeſt of the Nobility of both Parties, foreſeeing the Calamities that might enſue, by their mediation endeavoured to bring matters to an Accommodation. Though right and juſtice were entirely on the King's ſide, yet he conſented to peaceable Meaſures. But as he was old and eaſy-natured, and his Son highly threatned his oppoſers, the Balance very much inclined to Ethelbald's ſide. By the Treaty, which was managed by the Umpires, Ethelwulph was obliged to reſign to his Son the ancient Kingdom of Weſſex, and to ſit down contented with that of Kent for himſelf, under which were compriſed alſo Eſſex and Suſſex. Some of his Courtiers adviſed him not to ſign ſo partial and unequal a Treaty; but he would not hearken to them. He told them, he did not ſet ſo high a value on the Dominions allotted to his Son, as to purchaſe them at the Price of a Civil War; and though it might be in his Power to recover them, yet his death would ſoon put his Son in poſſeſſion again.

ETHELWULPH in Kent. ETHELBALD in Weſſex.

Ethelbald's Character.

ONE would think Ethelwulph foreſaw his death was not far off, ſince he out liv'd this Partition but two years, which he ſpent in a manner worthy of a Chriſtian Prince, in doing Acts of Charity, adminiſtring Juſtice to his Subjects, and endeavouring, by the force of his Example, to induce them to lead Lives conformable to the Precepts of the Goſpel. Ethelbald, on the contrary, depending upon many years to come, thought only of ſpending his days in licentiouſneſs and debauchery.

Edmund King of Eaſt-Anglia Ann. Sax. Fl. Wig. J. Tinmouth in Sanctis.

The Saxon Annals tell us, that about this time, Edmund, a youth of fifteen years of Age, was crowned King of Eaſt-Anglia. He was Son to Alcmund, a Prince of the Royal Blood, who fled into Germany when Offa ſeized upon Eaſt-Anglia. It is not ſaid whether this was done with the conſent of Ethelwulph and Ethelbald, or whether taking advantage of the diſſenſion between the Father and Son, the Eaſt-Angles reſolved to have a King of their own. Edmund was guided, during his Youth, by the advice of Biſhop Humbert, who took care to form him to a virtuous Life, and inſtil into him Sentiments of Juſtice and Equity, of which his Subjects reaped the benefit. I paſs over in ſilence all the Miracles that are ſaid to attend his birth, and ſhall ſpeak elſewhere of his tragical end, honoured with the name of Martyrdom.

Ethelwulph, finding death approaching, made his Will (1), wherein he diſpoſed of his dominions to Ethelbert his ſecond Son, and after his deceaſe to Ethelred his third Son, and after him to Alfred his youngeſt. I am not ſure, whether it was cuſtomary then for the Kings to diſpoſe of their Dominions by Will, or whether Ethelwulph was the firſt that did ſo. However this be, it is certain Ethelwulph's Sons ſucceeded one another by virtue of this Will. Wherein he alſo order'd his Heirs to maintain one poor Perſon for every Tithing in his Hereditary Lands. He died ſoon after in 857, having reigned twenty years (2), leaving behind him four Sons and one Daughter, who was married to Buthred King of Mercia, and died at Pavia in 888. Ethelbald, eldeſt Son of Ethelwulph, being already in poſſeſſion of the Kingdom of Weſſex, Ethelbert his Brother had only for his ſhare Kent, Eſſex, Surrey and Suſſex, compriſed under the name of The Kingdom of Kent. As for Ethelred and Alfred, his other Sons, they were at firſt but ill provided for; but in the end they mounted the Throne alſo. Beſides Athelſtan ſpoken of before, ſome give Ethelwulph another natural Son called Neot, who was afterwards Profeſſor at Oxford. But I very much doubt whether Neot was his Son. It is more likely he was only his Relation, of the Blood-Royal of Weſſex.

Malmſb. l. 2. c. 3. Aſſer. Ann. Ingulph.

ETHELBALD's Reign was remarkable neither for any event of moment, nor for any Action of his own, worth recording. All Hiſtorians agree, that he was a Prince of little Merit, and of an evil Diſpoſition. He is ſaid by the Engliſh Hiſtorians to make no ſcruple of marrying Judith of France his Father's Widow. But the French writers mention not this Marriage. They tell us her Marriage with Ethelwulph not being conſummated by reaſon of her Youth, ſhe returned to France, from whence ſhe was carried away by Baldwin Iron-hand Earl of Flanders. Perhaps they knew nothing of her ſecond Marriage; or, it may be, did not think proper to mention it, as reflecting on the Family of Charles the Great. Be this as it will, the Engliſh Hiſtorians ſpeak of it as certain. And one of them adds (4), Ethelbald was brought to a Senſe of his Fault, by Swithin Biſhop of Wincheſter, and underwent a ſevere Penance for it. This Penance, which probably conſiſted in ſome Grants or Donations to the Monaſteries, made an Hiſtorian (5) ſay, his Death which happened in 860, was exceedingly lamented. He had reigned two Years in Weſſex during his Father's Life, and about two Years and a half after his Deceaſe. Ethelbert his Brother, already in poſſeſſion of the Kingdom of Kent, ſucceeding to Weſſex, by virtue of their Father's Will re-united the two Kingdoms.

He dies in 860.

The Danes return to England. Sax. Ann.

THE Danes, having left England for ſome years unmoleſted, immediately after Ethelbert's Coronation renew'd their Invaſions (1). As they had not been heard of for ſome time, they were almoſt forgotten, and conſequently no preparations were made to repulſe their Attacks. This neglect gave them great advantages, and helped them to penetrate as far as Wincheſter, the Metropolis of Weſſex, which they reduced to aſhes. They would have proceeded to much greater Miſchiefs, had not Oſric and Ethelwulph, two Weſt-Saxon Earls, with ſome Troops drawn together in haſte, beat them back to their Ships.

They burn Wincheſter.

They are repulſed.

Another Deſcent.

Another time they came in Autumn, and landed in the Iſle of Thanet, where they winter'd in order to begin their Incurſions in the Spring. Ethelbert, very uneaſy at their being ſo near him, but not knowing how to help it, offer'd them a Sum of Money to go off quietly (2). They accepted of his offer; but when they had finger'd the Money, they ruſhed into Kent and deſtroyed all (3) with Fire and Sword, Ethelbert not being in condition to be reveng'd of them. However, having learnt by this Treachery, that nothing but Force could free him from his Enemies, he ſet about levying an Army, to intercept them in their retreat, and prevent them from carrying off their Booty. The dread of theſe preparations made them embark with their plunder ſo haſtily, that it was not poſſible to hinder them.

Ethelbert gives them Money to go off.

Ethelbert's Reign, which laſted but ſix years, affords little matter for Hiſtory. He died in 866 (4), leaving two Sons, Adhelm and Ethelward, who did not ſucceed him, his younger Brother Ethelred aſcending the Throne by virtue of Ethelwulph's Will.

He dies in 866.

5. ETHELRED I.

THE Reign of Ethelred was ſhort and troubleſome. From his Coronation to his Death, he had one continued Conflict with the Danes. They began with attacking Northumberland, which at length they became Maſters of. They proceeded next to Eaſt-Anglia, which they alſo ſubdued. And after extorting Money from the Mercians, they enter'd Weſſex. Notwithſtanding the valour of Ethelred, and the many battles he fought, he had the vexation at his Death to leave them in the heart of his Kingdom, and in condition of ſoon compleating the Conqueſt of the whole. Theſe are the principal Events during this Reign, the moſt remarkable Circumſtances whereof I am going to relate.

Malmſb. l. 2. c. 3.

The Authority reſerved by Egbert over the Kingdoms of Mercia, Eaſt-Anglia, and Northumberland, and enjoyed alſo by his Son Ethelwulph, was now much weakened, by reaſon of the frequent Invaſions of the Danes. Whilſt the Kings of Weſſex were employed in the defence of their own dominions, it was hardly poſſible for them to think of improving their Sovereignty over the three Kingdoms of the Angles, to whom Egbert was willing to leave a ſhadow of Liberty. And therefore, by degrees, the Northumbrians, as moſt remote from Weſſex, had freed themſelves from Servitude. The Factions that had long reign'd among them were grown cooler, and ſo far agreed at laſt, as with unanimous conſent to place Osbert on the Throne. This happy Union would have reſtored Northumberland to its ancient ſplendor, if an unexpected Accident had not revived their Diſſenſions, and plunged the Country into a gulph of remedileſs Miſery. The occaſion of theſe new Troubles, which proved not only deſtructive of Northumberland, but fatal to all England, was this (5).

The Northumbrians ſhake off the Yoke of the King of Weſſex.

Freſh Troubles there, which draw the Danes thither.

The Cauſe of theſe Troubles.

Osbert, who kept his Court at York, returning one day from hunting, had a mind to refreſh himſelf at the Houſe of a certain Earl named Bruern-Bocard, Guardian of the Coaſt againſt the Irruptions of the Danes. The Earl happening to be from home, his Lady, to whoſe charming Beauty was joined the moſt engaging Behaviour, entertained her Sovereign with the reſpect due to his Quality. Osbert, raviſh'd at the ſight of ſo much Beauty, became in an Inſtant deſperately in Love with her, and reſolved, let the Conſequence be what it would, to gratify his Paſſion without delay. Accordingly, on pretence of having ſome matters of Importance to communicate to her, in the Abſence of the Earl, he led her inſenſibly into a private Room, where after ſeveral attempts to bring her to comply by fair means, he fell at length to downright Force. Intreaties, Tears, Cries, Reproaches, were ineffectual to put a ſtop to his raging Paſſion. After the commiſſion of this infamous Deed, he left the Counteſs in that exceſs of Grief and Vexation, that it was not poſſible for her to hide the cauſe from her Husband. So outragious an Affront is hardly ever forgiven. Though Osbert was King, and Earl Bruern his Subject, he reſented ſo highly this Injury, that he reſolved not to ſtick at any means to be revenged. He had a great Intereſt with the Northumbrians, and the baſe Action of Osbert was naturally apt to alienate the minds of his Subjects from him. Accordingly, by the management of the Earl, the Bernicians in a little time revolted; and looking upon Osbert as unworthy to govern them, elected another King named Ella, whom they placed on the Throne, with reſolution to ſupport him in it. Thus the old Diviſions, which ſeemed to be quite extinguiſhed, were kindled afreſh; and Northumberland once more divided between two Kings and two Factions, who continually aiming at each other's Deſtruction, were but too ſucceſsful in their Endeavours.

Ella choſen King of Bernicia. Sax. Ann.

A Civil War was the fatal conſequence of this diſcord. The two Kings frequently ſtrove to decide their Quarrel by Arms; but the equality of their Forces preventing the ſcale from inclining to either ſide, they both maintained themſelves in the Throne. The injured Earl, one would think, ſhould have been ſatisfied with Osbert's loſing half his Dominions. But his revenge ſeemed to him incomplete, whilſt he ſaw him on the Throne of Deïra. Mean while, deeming it very difficult to carry it any farther, without a foreign Aid, he fatally reſolved to go and procure the Aſſiſtance of the Danes. This was not the firſt time the like Injury had produced the like Effect. Spain, under the Dominion of the Moors, felt at that very time the miſchiefs an affair of this nature had occaſioned. As ſoon as the Earl arrived in Denmark, he immediately applied to King Ivar [or Hinguar] (6), and giving him a particular Account of the diſtracted State of Northumberland, intimated to him, that if he would improve the preſent Juncture, he might with eaſe become Maſter of the Kingdom. Ivar very readily came into an Enterprize, to which he was prompted by the deſire of Revenge as well as Ambition. Regnerus, his Father, having been taken Priſoner in England, was thrown into a Ditch full of Serpents, where he miſerably periſhed. So barbarous a treatment having inſpired Ivar with a furious hatred againſt the Engliſh, he embraced, without heſitation, the preſent opportunity of being revenged.

(5) Tho' Rapin, as the moſt probable Opinion, makes Osbert's raviſhing Earl Bruern's Lady the occaſion of the Danes coming to Northumberland, there is alſo another reaſon given of that, and the barbarous Murder of Edmund. The Story goes, that Lodebrock King of Denmark going a Hawking in a Boat was driven out at Sea by a Storm, and caſt upon the Engliſh Coaſt near Yarmouth. He was ſeiz'd and brought to Edmund's Court, then King of Eaſt-Anglia, who finding him a great Sportſman, was pleaſed with his Company. Bern, the King's Faulconer, perceiving himſelf outdone in his own Buſineſs by this Stranger, drew him into a Wood, on pretence of ſhewing him Game, and barbarouſly murder'd him. Lodebrock's Dog, almoſt ſtarv'd, comes to the Palace, and being fed, goes away again. The Dog doing this ſeveral times, made the King's Servants follow him, and thus were brought to a Sight of the Corpſe. Bern was tried for the Murther, and being found guilty, was condemned to be put into Lodebrock's Boat, and committed to the Mercy of the Sea, without Tackling or Proviſion. He had the good Fortune to be carried to the Daniſh Shoar. The Boat being known, Bern was apprehended and examined about Lodebrock. He told them, that being caſt on the Coaſt of Eaſt-Anglia, he was put to death by King Edmund's Order. Upon which, Ivar and Hubba, Lodebrock's Sons, ſail'd for Eaſt-Anglia, with a numerous Army, but were forc'd by bad Weather into Northumberland. Brompton. M. Weſt. Ingulph only ſays, that they ſlew him upon account of the Faith of Chriſt, and for his ſtanding up in the defence of his Country, p. 24.
(6) Pontanus, in his Hiſtory of Denmark, places not Ivar among the Kings of that Country: But Meurſius aſſures us, that this Prince was crown'd in 836, wherein he agrees not in his Chronology with the Engliſh Hiſtorians. Rapin.

With

With this view he concerted with Earl Bruern all neceſſary meaſures to put their deſign in execution. In the Spring he entered the Humber with a numerous Fleet, which ſpread a Terror all over England. He was conducted by Bruern, and attended by his Brother Hubba, the moſt valiant Perſon of his Time. As the Northumbrians had received no Intelligence of this Invaſion, they were in no readineſs to diſpute his landing. So Ivar without any difficulty became maſter of the northern ſide of the Humber (1). From whence he marched directly (2) to York, where Osbert was preparing an Army to oppoſe him.

In this great extremity Osbert applied to Ella, though his Enemy, for Aſſiſtance. Ella, conſcious of his cruel Treatment of Ivar's Father, and dreading the Son's revenge, very willingly agreed to ſuſpend their private Quarrel, and join their Forces againſt the common Enemy. Accordingly, he proceeded with all poſſible Expedition to bring him a powerful Reinforcement. If Osbert could have reſolved to ſtay in York till Ella's Arrival, who was upon the March, he would doubtleſs have embarraſſed the King of Denmark, who by that means would have been forced to oppoſe the Enemy in two Places at once. But his great courage would not ſuffer him to take ſo good a Reſolution. Perhaps it was with regret that he ſaw himſelf conſtrained to have recourſe to his Enemy, or it may be, was afraid of ſome Treachery. However this be, without expecting Ella's approach, he ſallied out of York, and attacked the Danes ſo vigorouſly, that they could hardly ſtand the ſhock, and were very near being put in diſorder. But their obſtinate reſiſtance having at length cooled the Ardour of their Enemies, they preſſed them in their turn, and compelled them at laſt to retire in confuſion into the Town (3). Osbert inraged to ſee a certain Victory, as he thought, ſnatched out of his hands, uſed his utmoſt endeavours to rally his Troops, but was ſlain in the retreat with abundance of his Men.

This Victory having opened the Gates of York to the Danes, they entered the Town to refreſh themſelves, whilſt Ella was advancing in hopes to repair the loſs occaſioned by Osbert's Precipitation. Ivar having juſt triumphed over one of the Kings, and not believing the other to be more formidable, ſaved him ſome trouble, by going to meet him. This Battle was no leſs bloody than the firſt, nor leſs fatal to the Engliſh. Ella loſt his Life, and his Army was entirely routed. Some ſay, this Prince was not ſlain in the Battle; but being taken Priſoner, Ivar ordered him to be flead alive, in revenge for his Father's Death. The Field of Battle was called Ellefcroſt, that is, Ella's Overthrow.

After thoſe two ſignal Victories, Ivar without any difficulty, took poſſeſſion of all Northumberland. But this not ſatisfying his Ambition, he marched into Mercia, plundering and ravaging without mercy, whatever came in his way. Buthred King of Mercia, having had time to prepare, had called to his aſſiſtance Ethelred his Brother-in-law, who was come to join him with all the Forces of Weſſex. Ivar was now advanced as far as Nottingham (4), in expectation to ſurprize the King of Mercia; but when he was informed Ethelred had joined him, he ſtopp'd ſhort, being ſurprized to find his Forces inferior to thoſe of the Engliſh Princes. The two Armies ſtood near one another for ſome time, expecting every moment to engage. But the conſequence of a Battle, which in all likelihood would determine the Fate of both ſides, kept them in ſuſpence. At laſt, having faced one another a good while, they parted without fighting. Buthred choſe rather to bribe the Enemy to retire, than hazard a battle, the ſucceſs whereof was doubtful. Beſides, he was ſenſible there was nothing to be got by the Danes, though Fortune favoured him, whereas his all was at ſtake in Caſe of a Defeat (5).

Ivar, from the time he arrived in England, had cruelly ravaged all the Places wherever he came, particularly the Monaſteries, where the Engliſh endeavoured to conceal the moſt valuable Effects. It may eaſily be conceived, the idolatrous Danes had no great regard for the Nuns, and that Multitudes of them were expoſed to their brutal Luſt. We have a remarkable Story upon this Subject: The Abbeſs of Coldingham (6), upon the Approach of the Daniſh Army, prevailed with her Nuns, to cut off their Noſes and Upper-Lips, in order to ſcreen themſelves from the outrages they were threatened with. This notable Expedient, it is true, preſerved their Honour, but coſt them their Lives. The Soldiers beholding, contrary to their expectations, ſuch monſtrous Viſages, ſet fire to the Monaſtery, cauſing them in the Flames to compleat the Sacrifice of their Perſons, which they had already begun offering to God.

Ivar not having all the Succeſs he expected in Mercia, turned his Arms another way, where in all likelihood he ſhould meet with leſs Oppoſition. He left Hubba his Brother in Northumberland, and embarking with the flower of his Troops, made a Deſcent on Eaſt-Anglia (7), where Edmund was King, of whom I have already ſpoken. This young Prince, more uſed to Acts of Devotion, than to the exerciſe of Arms, having given the Danes Battle, was eaſily overthrown and compelled to ſave himſelf by Flight. He thought of concealing himſelf in a Church, but being diſcovered, was brought before Ivar at Hegilſdon (8). The Conqueror offered to leave him in poſſeſſion of his Kingdom, provided he would acknowledge him for Sovereign, and pay him Tribute. Edmund refuſing theſe Terms, Ivar ordered him to be tied to a Tree, and ſhot at with arrows, and then to have his Head cut off. Humbert Biſhop of the Eaſt-Angles was alſo put to Death by Ivar's Order. Edmund's Head being found ſome time after, was interred with his Body at St. Edmund's Bury, ſo called from him. Whilſt the Roman Catholick Religion flouriſhed in England, great Numbers of Miracles were pretended to be wrought at his Tomb. I do not know by what accident his Corps came to be at Toulouſe, where it is ſaid to be diſcovered in 1667.

Ivar being thus Maſter of Eaſt-Anglia, appointed a Daniſh Captain, one Godrim or Gothurn, Governor of it. Afterwards, having recalled his Brother Hubba from Northumberland, to be near his Perſon, he made Egbert, by birth an Engliſhman, but entirely at his devotion, King of that Kingdom.

The good ſucceſs the Danes had met with, during this War, inſpiring them with hopes of becoming Maſters of all England, they began to form new Projects. Ivar (9), having perfect Information of the State of the Iſland, found he muſt begin with Weſſex, in order to accompliſh his deſigns. He was in hopes, could he once ſubdue that Kingdom, the reſt would follow of courſe. On the other hand, he was ſenſible that all his Conqueſts elſewhere would be unſecure, as long as the King of Weſſex was in condition to aſſiſt his Neighbours. Theſe Conſiderations having determined him to attack Ethelred, he embarked his Troops and ſailed for the Coaſt of Weſſex, where landing his Army, he advanced as far as Reading. Ethelred, who had foreſeen his deſign, marched his Army towards that quarter, accompanied by Alfred his Brother. It would be tedious, and perhaps impracticable, to relate the particulars of this War (10). It is ſufficient to ſay in few words, that within the compaſs of one Year, Ethelred fought nine pitched Battles, and upon all occaſions gave ſignal proofs of his Courage and Conduct, tho' Fortune did not always prove favourable. In the Spring of the Year 869, the Daniſh Army putting out to Sea, landed at Huberſtan, and deſtroyed the whole Country, and Bardney Monaſtery in particular, killing every one of the Monks. Then, about Michaelmas, they paſſed into Keſteven, and there deſtroyed every thing that came in their way. About a Year after Earl Algar, and ſome others, aſſembled an Army, and coming to an Engagement with the Heathens, defeated them, and ſlew three of their Kings [or Chiefs] but Algar himſelf was ſoon after ſlain. Whereupon the Danes continued their Ravages, and plundered and burnt the Monaſteries of Croyland, Peterburgh, and Ely; killing every Perſon they met there. But, four Days after, they defeated the Danes at Aſton near Wallingford; and Baſreg, [ſo in the Originals] the two Sidrocs, and ſeveral thouſands of Danes were then ſlain. Ethelred seems not to be entirely free from blame, for ſuffering the Danes to over-run Northumberland and Eaſt-Anglia, without endeavouring to ſtop their progreſs. But probably this Prince, ſurprized at the defeat of the two Kings of Northumberland, and the ſwift progreſs of Ivar's Arms, did not think himſelf in condition to repair the misfortunes cauſed by the diſſenſions of the Northumbrians. Beſides, he did not care, doubtleſs, to expoſe in the defence of Northumberland and Eaſt-Anglia, the Forces he foreſaw he ſhould want for the preſervation of his own Kingdom. It may be farther ſaid in his Juſtification, that the Terror, ſpread over all England, put it out of his Power perhaps, to diſpoſe of his Army as he could have wiſhed. This Terror was ſo great, that it was no eaſy matter to prevail with the Engliſh to march againſt ſo formidable Enemies, till compelled to it in their own neceſſary defence.

Ethelred's Piety. Aſſer de Altr. Reb. Geſt. p. 7.

Tho' Ethelred was noted for his great Bravery, yet his Piety is ſaid to ſurpaſs even his Valour. An Hiſtorian tells us, that being at Prayers on a Day of Battle (3), he reſolved not to move till the Service was over, tho' the Fight was begun, and the Danes had ſome Advantage. He adds, God rewarded his Piety with a ſignal Victory that Day.

Ethelred left ſeveral Children, of whom Alfred, the great Grandfather of Ethelwerd the Hiſtorian, was one. Some ſay alſo he had a Daughter called Thyra, married to Frotho VI. King of Denmark. Ethelred's Sons were deprived of the Crown for the ſame reaſons the Sons of his elder Brother Ethelbert were ſet aſide, I mean, Ethelwulph's Will. After his death, Alfred his Brother was placed on the Throne without any one's queſtioning his Title.

During Ethelred's reign, the Danes demoliſhed the famous Monaſteries of Croyland, Ely, Peterborough or Medeſhamſted, beſides that of Coldingham before mentioned. It is chiefly on the deſcription of what befel the Abbies that Hiſtorians have enlarged, whilſt doubtleſs, they omitted Events more remarkable, and more worthy the notice of a curious Reader.

6. ALFRED the Great.

ALFRED the Great.

ALFRED was no leſs infeſted with the Danes than his Predeceſſor. This Prince, as well as his Brother Ethelred, had frequent occaſion of exerciſing his Valour, Firmneſs, and all the other Virtues Heaven had adorned him with. Their Fortune however was different; as Ethelred was never reduced to ſo deplorable a Condition as Alfred, ſo on the other hand, he was never raiſed to that height of Glory. Divine Providence ſeems to have ſhown in the Perſon of Alfred, with what eaſe God caſts down and ſets up Princes, according to his good Pleaſure. This is what I am going to ſhow in the Life of Alfred, taking for my principal Guide a celebrated Hiſtorian, who has given an exact account of his Actions.

Spelman.

The State of the Kingdom.

Ethelred had left the Affairs of his Kingdom in a deplorable Condition. The Danes, already maſters of Northumberland and Eaſt-Anglia, were in the very heart of the Kingdom of Weſſex. Notwithſtanding the many Battles Ethelred had fought with them, they were in poſſeſſion of ſeveral Towns, and not only kept their footing in the Country, but had reaſon to hope they ſhould ſoon go thro' with the Conqueſt of it. Alfred had ſcarce been a Month on the Throne (4), when he found himſelf obliged to take the Field (5) againſt theſe formidable enemies, who were advanced as far as Wilton (6). Thither it was that he marched to attack them the firſt time, after his Brother's death (7). He flattered himſelf for ſome time that Victory would incline to his ſide; but the Scene changing on a ſudden in favour of the Danes, he was forced at length to leave them maſters of the field of Battle. However, his loſs was not ſo conſiderable, as to make him deſpair of being revenged. As the Danes had alſo loſt abundance of Men, he laboured inceſſantly to put his Army in condition to give them Battle again, before they ſhould be reinforced. They were aſtoniſhed at his Expedition, and tho' victorious, ſued for Peace, finding they were unable to continue the War. How much ſoever Alfred confided in his Troops, who appeared eager to engage, he thought proper to embrace the preſent opportunity of getting rid of his Enemies, without hazarding a ſecond Battle. As they offered to march out of his dominions, on condition he would moleſt them in no other part of England, he gladly accepted their offer, looking upon it as very advantageous, in his preſent Circumſtances. And indeed, this Treaty gave him time to prepare againſt a freſh Invaſion, which he had all the reaſon in the World to expect. But had he been bent upon engaging again and loſt the day, his whole Kingdom would infallibly have fallen into the hands of his Enemies.

The Battle of Wilton, wherein Alfred is worſted. Sax. Ann. Aſſer.

He makes a Treaty with the Danes. Aſſer.

The Danes quitting Weſſex retired to London (8), which they had taken during the late War. Ivar was gone back to Denmark, having left the Command of the Army to his Brother Hubba, who being tied up from attacking Weſſex, turned his Arms againſt Mercia. Buthred knowing he was unable to reſiſt, ſince Alfred was bound not to ſend him any Succours (9), thought it his wiſeſt courſe to buy off the Danes with a ſum of Money, and ſave his Country from their Depredations. Upon the receipt of the Money, they marched towards Northumberland, deſigning to take up their Quarters with their Countrymen. But Proviſions running ſhort, by reaſon of the Devaſtations themſelves had made there, they were under a ſort of neceſſity to return into Mercia (10). Before they left Northumberland, they depoſed Egbert whom they had placed on the Throne, and put Ricſige, a Daniſh Earl, in his room (11). Buthred finding they were come again into his Dominions, complained of their breach of Faith; but without minding his Complaints, they obliged him to give them another conſiderable Sum to ſave his Country from the Deſtruction it was threatened with. But no ſooner was the Money paid, but they fell to plundering and ravaging, and let Buthred know that even his own Perſon was in Danger. The fear of falling into their hands obliged him to abandon his Kingdom, and retire to Rome, where he ſpent the reſidue of his Days in the Engliſh College. Mercia being thus left without a King, and Alfred under an obligation to ſend no Aſſiſtance, the Danes without difficulty became maſters of that ſpacious Kingdom. Tho' the new King was an Engliſhman, yet holding the Kingdom in truſt only, till his maſters ſhould otherwiſe diſpoſe of it, he reſolved to make uſe of his time to fill his Coffers: So that the Mercians ſuffered as much by the continual Rapines and Extortion of their Countryman, as they would perhaps have done by the hands of a Foreigner.

inch of ground with them, they were forc'd to make an Alliance with Alfred, till a favourable opportunity presented itself of executing their designs upon that Kingdom. Mean while, they fell to manuring their Lands, and began to consider the country, they had so often and so terribly laid waste, as their own. England being thus divided between the English and Danes, Peace and Tranquility seemed to be going at last to be restored. The Danes appear'd satisfied with their Lot, and Alfred thought himself happy in the preservation of his paternal Dominions. But the Calamities England was afflicted with, were far from being at an end.

Whilst Alfred flatter'd himself with the enjoyment of some quiet, new troubles were preparing for him in Denmark. Halfden, a Danish General, had fitted out a Fleet, with which he came and made a descent on East-Anglia (1). The Season being far advanced, he lay still all the Winter, expecting the Spring in order to invade Wessex. The Arrival of Halfden with fresh Danish Troops, ought to have put Alfred upon his guard, since it was but too plain they were designed against him. However, trusting to the Treaty he had lately made with the Danes, he remained unconcern'd, of which Halfden did not fail to take the Advantage. In the beginning of the Spring, he put to Sea, and went and took by surprize Warham-Castle (2), the strongest Place in all Wessex. The English hitherto seemed not to know what sort of Enemies they had to deal with. They considered the Danish Irruptions as a regular War, wherein the whole Nation was concern'd. Accordingly they imagin'd that a Treaty concluded with one Band or Party, was obligatory to all the rest. But the Danes had other Thoughts of these Matters. They enter'd, with the consent of their Kings, into private Associations to man out Fleets and go shares in what Booty they could get in England and other Countries. For this reason, the several Bands were independent of one another, each thinking themselves bound by no other Treaty but what they entered into themselves. Alfred had made an Agreement with Hubba; but Halfden did not look upon himself as included in it. However, the English considering the surprize of Warham as a real Treachery, called Heaven and Earth to witness the Violation of the Treaty. But Halfden, regardless of their Complaints, was about to penetrate farther into Wessex, had not Alfred prevented him by entering into a particular Treaty with him (3). The Author of his Life says, the Danes swore by the Holy Relicks of the Church, that they would never set foot again in Wessex (4). Probably it cost the King dear to bring them to these Terms. It is something strange that Alfred should insist upon Mens swearing by the Holy Relicks, who being yet Pagans, could not think themselves more strongly bound by this, than their usual Oath, by their Bracelets. Perhaps his Reason was, that in case they should break their Oath, he thought Heaven would the more assuredly punish them for it. However this be, they made no more conscience of this, than of their former Oaths, but broke it even before they were out of Wessex. As they were marching towards Mercia, they met a Body of English Horse, who were riding in a careless Manner, by reason of the Treaty's being concluded, and unexpectedly setting upon them, slew the greatest Part of them (5). The Horses they took upon this occasion, were of service to carry them with the more speed towards the Western Parts of Wessex, where they laid Siege to Exeter (6).

876. The War is renewed.

Alfred finding it was in vain to conclude Treaties with such perfidious People, resolved to take more effectual measures to secure himself from their Treachery. To this purpose, he convened a general Assembly, and in a pathetick Speech plainly shewed them, they had nothing to trust to but their Valour and Courage, to deliver them from their Miseries; that upon so urgent an occasion there was a necessity of venturing their Lives in defence of their Country, and of sacrificing Part of their Estates to preserve the rest; in fine, that a generous Resolution was the only means left to avoid the Calamities their Neighbours were fallen under. These remonstrances having produced the Effect he expected, an Army was levied, with which he engaged the Enemy seven times in one Campaign. But as fortune was not equally favorable to him in all these Ingagements, he was once more constrained to treat with the Danes. Though he could have no great dependance upon their Promises, it was the best way he could take to put an end to this dangerous War. The new Treaty, by which the Danes were obliged to return no more into Wessex, was better kept than the former.

Alfred makes a new Treaty with the Danes. Sax. Ann. Asser. vit. Alfr.

The West-Saxons looked upon the Retreat of these formidable Enemies as a great Deliverance. But they were not yet at the end of their Miseries. This band, that had struck them with such Terror, were scarce gone, when a new swarm arrived under the command of Rollo, the famous Norman General, that became afterwards the scourge of France. By good fortune, Alfred was prepared to receive them. After some attempts, Rollo despairing of procuring a settlement in England, resolved to go in quest of one in France. In all probability, finding the best Part of England in possession of his Countrymen, and Alfred ready to dispute the rest with him, he imagined he had a better prospect in France. Some affirm, it was revealed to him in a dream what great Success he should meet with on the other side of the Water.

Rollo arrives in England. 876. Asser. An.

Goes to seek his Fortune in France.

After Rollo's departure, Alfred enjoyed some Repose, which afforded him leisure to think of means to prevent these frequent Invasions. He found no better or readier way than to equip a good Fleet, and engage the Danes before they came to land, where they generally had the Advantage. As hitherto, the ingaging them at Sea had not been thought of, their Ships were only fit for Transports, whereas those, now built by Alfred, were contrived on purpose for Service. It was not long before he reaped the Fruit of this wise Precaution. His Fleet meeting with six (7) Danish Vessels, gave chace to them, and one of the largest being taken, the Soldiers and Mariners were thrown overboard. This first Engagement was followed by a much more considerable one. An hundred and twenty Sail of Danish transport Ships making to the Shore in order to land their Men, the King's Fleet attacked them, and sunk the greatest part of them. The next year another Danish Fleet sailing Westward, met with so violent a Storm, that all the Ships perished, except a few which fell into the hands of the English.

Alfred fits out a Fleet. Asser. vit. Alf. Sax. Ann. Asser.

Alfred encouraged by these Successes, resolved to attack the Danes in the West, where they had fortified themselves by the taking of Exeter. Besides, the Cornish Men had all along sided with them. He executed this resolution with that Courage and Success, that in the end he obliged the Danes to give him Hostages, and entirely abandon Wessex. They retired into Mercia (8), where being weary with leading such unsettled lives, they were incorporated with their Countrymen, who were in possession of that Kingdom. After that, they deposed, with one consent, Ceoluph, and divided the Land among themselves (9). What kind of Government they established we know not; the English Historians, passing over in silence the Civil Affairs of the Danes, relate only their Wars. Thus an end was put to the Kingdom of Mercia, after having subsisted near three hundred Years.

The year before (10), the Kingdom of Northumberland had met with the same Fate. Halfden, who was gone thither, made Egbert King in the room of Ricsige, who died in 876. The new King or Vice-Roy was of no long Continuance. In the first year of his Reign, Halfden dethroned him, and divided the Land among his Countrymen: Which no doubt gave occasion to the Danes in Mercia to do the same thing. Thus the Kingdom of Northumberland, which had lasted three hundred and thirty years from the time of Ida the first King, was cantled out among the Danish Officers. It proved a very difficult matter to drive them thence, as will be seen hereafter.

(1) This does not appear from the antient Historians: On the contrary they affirm, That Anno 875, the Danes left Repton, and dividing themselves into two Bands, one part went along with Halfden to Northumberland, and wintered there near the Tine: These plundered the Picts and Strecledenses, i. e. the Inhabitants of Galway; and Halfden making himself Master of Northumberland, divided it amongst his Followers, who began to cultivate it. The other Body of Danes, with their three Generals Godrun, Oscytel, and Anand, went and wintered at Cambridge, where they staid about a twelve month; and the next year went out privately from Cambridge, and seized Warham Castle; without any mention of Halfden's being concerned in that Expedition. On the other hand, they, who had ſhared the Lands of the other Kingdoms among them, perceiving their Countrymen envied their good Fortune, were apprehenſive they might think of diſpoſſeſſing them, if they were not otherwiſe provided for. This place was ſurrounded with a large Moraſs, through which there was but one narrow Foot-Path leading to the Neat-herd's Cottage, that was hid by Buſhes and Briars. In this place the King lay concealed for ſome time, from his Friends as well as Enemies, without being ſo much as known by the Neat-herd's Wife, who employed him about her little houſhold Affairs (6). This was a wretched Situation for a Prince. But God, who deſigned only to exerciſe his Patience, left him not long in theſe Circumſtances. He had not been ſix Months in his Retreat, when the Scene was ſhifted by a lucky and unexpected Turn in his Affairs. It is pretended that this happy Change was revealed to him in a Dream by St. Cuthbert, formerly Biſhop of Lindisfarn, who appeared to him and told him, he ſhould ſuddenly be raiſed to an infinitely more glorious State than that from whence he was fallen. But without inſiſting on theſe idle Tales of the Monks, who could not find in their Hearts to paſs over an extraordinary Event without introducing ſome Apparition or Miracle, I ſhall relate how this great Revolution was brought about by means of a deſperate Undertaking.

Hubba ravages Wales, and enters Weſſex. Sax. Ann. Aſſer. Hubba, who command the Daniſh Troops in the abſence of his Brother Ivar (7), had invaded Wales, and deſtroyed all with Fire and Sword. After which he entered Devonſhire in the Kingdom of Weſſex, with the ſame Intent. At his Approach, the Earl of Devon (8) with a handful of brave Men, retired into Kinwith Caſtle (9) to avoid the firſt Shock of the Daniſh Fury. Hubba was not long before he laid Siege to the Caſtle, not doubting but the Gariſon, being few in Number, would ſoon be obliged to ſurrender. The Earl of Devon, finding all the Defence he could make would be to no purpoſe, took a ſudden Reſolution. He repreſented to the Beſieged the Danger they were in of falling into the hands of their mercileſs Enemies, and aſſured them they had but one way to eſcape, which was, by opening themſelves a paſſage with their Swords thro' the Enemy's Army. He told them the Enterprize was not ſo raſh and deſperate as they might imagine; that undoubtedly the Danes were very negligent and ſecure, not regarding a handful of Men pent up within Walls; that therefore what he propoſed was far from being impracticable, provided they gave the Enemy no time to prevent it; that after all they ventured only their Lives and Liberties, which would be in much greater danger by ſtanding a Siege. This Remonſtrance had ſuch an effect upon the Beſieged, that without farther deliberation, they ſallied out Sword in hand upon the Danes, and by their ſudden and furious attack put them immediately in extreme diſorder. This happy beginning made them forget their firſt deſign, and inſpired them with a reſolution to purſue their Advantage. They continued therefore to preſs the Danes with a freſh Impetuoſity, without giving them time to recover themſelves, and having at length entirely diſperſed them, made a dreadful ſlaughter of them (10). Hubba was ſlain (11), and his famous Standard, called Reafan, or the Raven, fell into the hands of the Engliſh. The Danes had a Notion, there was a ſecret virtue in this Standard, which Ivar's Siſters had wrought with their own hands (12). By the help of a ſtrong fancy, or the deluſion of the Devil, they imagined they ſaw this Raven before a Battle, clap his Wings in token of Victory, or hang down his Head, as a preſage of their Defeat. This at leaſt is what Hiſtorians tell us, adding, that the loſs of their Standard did not a little contribute to diſhearten them afterwards.

Hubba ſlain, and his famous Standard taken. Aſſer. vit. Ælf.

The news of this defeat, and the death of the Daniſh General, having reached Alfred in his Retreat (13), he immediately conſidered how to turn this ſeaſonable Defeat to his Advantage. He ſent word to his Friends, where he was, to the end they might come and conſult what was to be done in this Juncture. After he had conferred with them, he gave them orders to draw together in ſeveral Parts of the Kingdom, ſmall Bodies of Troops, which at a minute's Warning might be ready to join one another (14). The moſt difficult as well as moſt important Point was, to know exactly the poſture of the Enemy, that meaſures might be concerted accordingly. Alfred, not knowing who to pitch upon for this neceſſary Service, took the boldeſt Reſolution that ever entered into the thoughts of a Prince, which was, to go himſelf into the Daniſh Camp, and be informed by his own Eyes of the condition of the Enemy. To this end, having diſguis'd himſelf and taken a Harp in his hand, as if he had got his livelihood by playing on that Inſtrument, he entered the Daniſh Camp, and ſtay'd there ſeveral days, obſerving, to the utmoſt of his power, every thing he wanted to know. Among other things, he took notice, that whereas generally the Danes were wont to encamp and intrench themſelves on a Hill, they had neglected to do ſo now. They had not ſo much as placed any advanc'd Guards to ſecure the Avenues to their Camp, as having nothing to fear, ſince the Enemy had no Army in the Field (15). Having obſerv'd every thing, he returned to his Friends at Athelney, and appointed Selwood Foreſts (16) for the general Rendezvous of all their Troops. This Affair was tranſacted ſo ſecretly and expeditiouſly, that in a little time the King at the head of an Army (17) appeared near the Danes before they had the leaſt Intelligence of the matter. They were in the utmoſt Conſternation when they ſaw on a ſudden the Engliſh Army approaching to attack them. Alfred was unwilling to give them time to come to themſelves; and therefore briefly exhorting his Troops not to have the leaſt dread of an Army already vanquiſh'd by their Fears, gave the Signal of Battle. The Danes, tho' aſſaulted thus unexpectedly, defended themſelves however with a greal deal of Courage. But whether they had not time to draw up their Troops in order, or the loſs of their Standard had poſſeſſed them with a notion that their Gods were averſe to them, they were at length entirely routed, and almoſt their whole Army cut in pieces: The few that eſcaped betook themſelves to a Caſtle, where they were immediately beſieged. Alfred taking advantage of their Conſter-

Grants the Danes advantagious Terms.

He confirms to the Danes the poſſeſſion of Eaſt-Anglia, and gives them Guthurm for King.

This great Victory ſet Alfred at the height of his wiſhes. He had, by one ſingle Battle, driven out the Danes, and recovered his Kingdom, and ſaw every day his Subjects flock to him, whom fear had diſpers'd or conſtrain'd to ſubmit to the Enemy. He gave Guthurm and his Officers a very civil Reception, and kept his Word faithfully with them. All the Hiſtorians agree, that he inveſted the Daniſh General with the Title of King of Eaſt-Anglia (4). But it is not known, whether he did this by virtue of ſome private Treaty made before with him, or deſigned by it to gain his Affection to that degree that he might entirely confide in him. However this be, it is certain Guthurm held with the Title of King, the Kingdom of Eaſt-Anglia, which was wholly inhabited by Danes, and whereof Ivar had made him Governor. He divided the Lands among his Countrymen, and exerciſed the Regal Authority, as long as he lived. Some, particularly Aſſerius, add, that Alfred gave Guthurm the Kingdom of Northumberland alſo. But this is very improbable, ſince the Danes had long been Maſters of Northumberland, and had ſhared the Lands among themſelves (5). The caſe was not the ſame with reſpect to Eaſt-Anglia, where the Danes had no fix'd abode, and which was ſtill conſider'd as part of the Engliſh Monarchy, tho' the Danes were moſt powerful there. So that Alfred did nothing more than confirm them in the poſſeſſion of that Kingdom, by granting them a King of their own Nation, who was to be his Vaſſal (6).

All the Danes own Alfred for their Sovereign.

In all that has hitherto been ſaid it may be obſerv'd, that at the time of the laſt Battle, there were in England two ſorts of Danes, thoſe that were already ſettled, and thoſe that were endeavouring to procure themſelves Habitations. With theſe laſt it was properly that Alfred treated. As for the others, having ſeen their Brethren ſo roughly handled, they thought themſelves happy in the enjoyment of their Poſſeſſions. As the Event was uncertain, they choſe rather to ſit down contented, and acknowledge Alfred for their Sovereign, than run the risk of loſing their all, by continuing the War. Accordingly, the Danes ſettled in the three Kingdoms of the Angles, ſubmitted to Alfred, and ſwore Allegiance to him. It was however next to impoſſible that all ſhould be equally ſatisfied with their Lot. Several accepted of the Terms of the laſt Treaty, only becauſe they knew not where to go, having elſewhere neither Houſe nor Home. If they ſeemed deſirous to turn Chriſtians, it was to procure a Subſiſtence, in expectation of a favourable opportunity to return to their old courſe of Life. That this was the caſe, evidently appeared from
879. what followed. When it was leaſt expected, the moſt conſiderable among them, headed by one Haſtings, earneſtly ſollicited Guthurm to renew the War in Weſſex (7); but not prevailing (8), they put to Sea, and went and ravaged the Coaſt of Flanders. Shortly after, another and

Theſe two Bands thus united over-ran Brabant, Hainault, Flanders, Picardy, and Artois, acting unheard-of Cruelties. After which, being again divided into two Bodies, one of them ſailed back for England, in hopes of plundering the Country, where they imagined they ſhould come unexpected. Having landed in Kent, they marched towards Rocheſter, with deſign to ſurprize the City. But Alfred, who, contrary to their expectation, had his Army in a readineſs, ſpeedily marching that way upon the firſt notice of their arrival, his approach made them fly to their Ships in ſuch haſte, that they left their Plunder behind them (9). The vigilance of this Prince having prevented their deſigns upon England, they returned to France, and rejoining their Companions, continued their Devaſtations in that Kingdom.

Hitherto the Engliſh had been only upon the Defenſive. 882.
Alfred increaſes his naval Forces. Sax. Ann.

Expoſed to the continual Invaſions of the Danes, and uncertain where the Enemy would land, they were generally ſurprized, before it was in their power to defend themſelves. The Sea-Coaſt remaining uninhabited, there was nothing to hinder theſe Rovers from landing where they pleaſed. Alfred being in Peace, which he had never enjoyed 'till now, reſolved to put his Affairs in better order. His firſt care was to equip a conſiderable Fleet, the advantage of which he had already experienc'd. As ſoon as his Fleet was in a condition to ſail, the Admiral had orders to cruiſe along the Coaſts, and attack all the Daniſh Ships in what place ſoever he ſhould meet them. He ſurprized ſixteen in the Port of Harwich (10) in Eaſt-Anglia, of which taking ſome and ſinking the reſt, he brought off a conſiderable Booty (11). Guthurm incenſed at this act of Hoſtility in one of his Habours, and as it were before his Face, ſuffered the Parties concerned to endeavour to retrieve their Loſſes, and even furniſh'd them with means. It was not long before they found an opportunity of attacking in the night the King's Ships (12), and had ſome advantage over them. However, the Fleet kept the Rovers in awe, and freed England from their ravages.

Alfred fits out a Fleet.

Sax. Ann.

Alfred having thus ſecured the Sea-Coaſts, diligently ſet about fortifying the reſt of the Kingdom with Caſtles and walled Towns, which he ſtood in great need of. He repaired thoſe that were gone to ruin (13), and built others in ſo ſtrong a manner, that they could not eaſily be aſſaulted. In a word, there was not a Paſs or Avenue capable of being fortified, but what was defended by ſome Works, to prevent the ſudden Incurſions of the Danes. But however, he could not be entirely guarded againſt them, without one important Place, the poſſeſſion whereof would be of great conſequence to him in all reſpects. This was the City of London, conſiderable both for largeneſs and ſituation, and which being in the hands of the Danes would give them a free paſſaſſe into Weſſex, whenever they had a mind to invade his Dominions. This conſideration made him reſolve to inveſt it, knowing the Gariſon to be weak and unable to ſtand a long Siege. Accordingly, the Beſieged were in a little time obliged to capitulate. He was no ſooner maſter of this great City, but he very much added both to its ſtrength and beauty (14). He committed the Government of it to Ethelred, who had married his Daughter Elfleda, or rather gave it him in Fee, with the Title of Earl of Mercia (15). Some will have it he conferred on him the Title of King; but I doubt they have no ground for what they advance. By creating Ethelred Earl of Mercia, he did not inveſt him with power over any part of Mercia, but only over London. All the reſt of Mercia was in poſſeſſion of the Danes, over whom he aſſerted no other right but that of Sovereignty, to which they had lately conſented. Ethelred therefore was honour'd with an empty Title, 'till ſuch time as by his Valour he became maſter of good part of that Province.

in the Iſland; who ſeeing all the Precautions taken by this wiſe Prince, were much more diſpoſed to remain in ſubmiſſion. They even permitted ſeveral of the Engliſh, whom they had driven from their habitations, to return and live among them under the King's Protection (1).

England is in quiet twelve years.

Then it was that Alfred had the ſatisfaction to ſee Peace and Tranquility reſtored, after ſo many years of Troubles. This happy calm laſted twelve years (2), during which this Monarch had leiſure to rectify the diſorders introduced by ſo long a war both in Church and State. As I deſign hereafter to give a particular account of the Regulations made by this Prince during the Peace, I ſhall paſs over theſe twelve years, and finiſh the relation of his Wars. It ſuffices at preſent to ſay, that in this Interval he laid out his conſtant Endeavours in procuring the good and benefit of his Subjects, till he was interrupted by freſh Invaſions, of which I am now going to ſpeak.

893. The Danes renew their Invaſions; Sax. Ann. Flor. Wig. Huntingd.

The Danes, who, under the conduct of Haſtings, ravag'd for twelve or thirteen years together France and the Low-Countries, were not ſatisfied with the prodigious Booty they had gained. According to the cuſtom of Pyrates, as they prodigally ſquandered away what they had acquired without pains or labour, they were always under a neceſſity of renewing their Ravages in order to have wherewithal to ſubſiſt. However, diſheartned by two terrible checks given them by Eudes and Arnulph Kings of France and Germany, they reſolved to return into England, not ſo much for the ſake of ſettling there, as plandering the Iſland. To that purpoſe, they fitted out three hundred Ships, which they divided into two Fleets. With the firſt, conſiſting of two hundred Sail (3), they arrived on the Coaſt of Kent (4), and took Appledore (5). This place, which was then very conſiderable, made them maſters not only of that Province, but alſo of Suſſex and Surrey. The other Fleet commanded by Haſtings (6), entered the Thames and landed at Middleton (7). It would be difficult to deſcribe the Miſeries inflicted on the Inhabitants of theſe unfortunate Provinces by the Barbarians. But when we conſider, they were idolatrous Rovers and Pyrates, we ſhall eaſily conceive they made no ſcruple of committing the moſt enormous Crimes. Alfred was then in Eaſt-Anglia, on account of Guthrum's death (8). As he had received no Intelligence of their deſigns, he had made no Preparations for his defence. All he could do for the preſent was to take a new Oath of Fidelity from the Eaſt-Anglian Danes, which they regarded only whilſt he ſtayed with them. After his departure, being no longer reſtrained by his preſence, they went and joined Haſtings, in order to go ſhares in the Plunder. Alfred, amidſt all theſe dangers was not however diſcouraged. He drew together what Troops he could, and marched againſt the Danes who were pillaging Kent. But being informed by the way, that another Body of Danes had entered Weſſex, he altered his courſe, and advanced towards theſe laſt, as judging them moſt dangerous. The Danes, who were now before Exeter, haſtily raiſed the Siege, and went and vented their Fury in ſome other Place.

and take Appledore and Middleton.

The Danes of East-Anglia join them.

Confuſion in the Hiſtory of thoſe Wars.

It is impoſſible to give the particulars of this War, ſo confuſedly are they related by the Hiſtorians. The Reaſon no doubt was, becauſe there were ſeveral Bands of Danes ravaging England, one in Kent, and another in Weſſex, and roving continually from place to place. This is what the Engliſh Hiſtorians could not have a very diſtinct knowledge of, ſince a War undertaken ſolely for Plunder, muſt needs be very irregular. Accordingly we find in their Hiſtories, the ſame Leaders, ſometimes in one Province, ſometimes in another, without being able to perceive when or how they got thither.

The Danes go off on a ſudden.

We are ignorant alſo by what fortunate Accident Alfred ſaw himſelf freed on a ſudden from his cruel Enemies, who were ſpread over his whole Kingdom. Thus much however is certain, after they had reduced England to a deplorable State, the laſt comers retired, though Hiſtorians have not been pleaſed to tell us the cauſe of their retreat. I am apt to believe their ſudden departure was owing to the Plague, which raged then in England, and ſwept away great numbers of Danes as well as Engliſh. To this may be added, their having plundered the Country in ſuch a manner, that there was nothing left to pillage. The greateſt part of the Daniſh Rovers returned to France, under the command of Haſtings; but they did not ſtay there long. Preſently after, Haſtings had new Projects on foot. The Terror he had every where ſpread along the Sea-Coaſts having put all upon their Guard, he reſolved to ſteer his Courſe where he was not expected, and ſailed for the Mediterranean. Whilſt there, he found means, by an impious and perfidious Stratagem, to become maſter of Luna, ſituated on the Coaſt of Tuſcany. He pretended to be mighty deſirous of turning Chriſtian, and was actually baptized by the Biſhop, whom he had ſent for. Some days after, the Biſhop was told, his new Convert was departed this Life, and died like a good Chriſtian, earneſtly deſiring to be buried in the Church of Luna, to which he had bequeathed a conſiderable Legacy. By this Device, a great number of Danes, on pretence of attending the Corpſe, entered the City, and immediately fell to murdering and plundering the Inhabitants.

Haſtings retires to Chartres, and ends his days thereabouts.

Haſtings, after ſo much miſchief done to England, France, and the Low-Countries, choſe at length for his Retreat, the City of Chartres (9), which Charles the Simple preſented him with, on purpoſe to keep him quiet. Here it was he ended in Peace, a Life almoſt wholly ſpent in plundering the maritime Countries of Europe. The Danes, that refuſed to follow him when he left England, put themſelves under the command of one Sigefert ſettled in Northumberland. For ſome time, theſe likewiſe committed ravages on the Coaſt of Weſſex (10), without venturing however to advance into the Country, by reaſon of their ſmall number, and at laſt they retired to ſeek their Fortune elſewhere.

The Kingdom is freed from the Danes.

Alfred, being at length freed from his Enemies, paſſed the reſt of his days in profound Tranquility. Hitherto I have conſidered this Prince as a Warrior only, ſometimes victorious, and ſometimes vanquiſhed; but, whether proſperous or unfortunate, ſhewing on all occaſions ſignal marks of valour and military Conduct (11). It is now time to diſplay his other Virtues, and ſet him in another Light. Henceforward he is to appear as a juſt, learned, and religious Prince, a lover of his Subjects, and an indefatigable promoter of Arts, Sciences, Juſtice and Religion. But, not to confound his Political with his Moral Virtues, I ſhall begin with what he did for the good of his People, as Sovereign, and then ſpeak of his private Life, and manner of regulating his domeſtick Affairs.

The Danes acknowledge Alfred for their Sovereign.

As ſoon as the Danes, ſettled in England, found they were deprived of the aſſiſtance of their Countrymen, they bethought themſelves how to ſecure their preſent Poſſeſſions. The continuation of the War was ſo far from being likely to increaſe their Advantages, that they had reaſon to fear they ſhould by that means loſe what they already poſſeſſed. But ſuppoſing they were able to maintain their ground by force of Arms, yet a War, which obliged them to have always their Swords drawn, and preventing them from manuring their Lands, could not but be very prejudicial to them. Theſe conſiderations induced them at length to ſubmit to the Dominion of Alfred, and acknowledge him for Sovereign of all England. Hiſtorians do not inform us whether he was obliged to uſe Force to bring them to this: But it is certain, his authority was acknowledged, as well in Northumberland, Mercia, and Eaſt-Anglia, as in Weſſex (12). The Welſh themſelves, who had been terribly plundered by the Danes, finding they were in no condition to reſiſt, became his Tributaries (13). It is further added, the King of Scotland paid him Homage alſo. But this is too diſputable a Point to be affirmed for Truth (14).

Alfred makes a Body of Laws.

The first thing Alfred had in his thoughts, the moment he saw himself thus peaceful and absolute, was to make use of his power for the good and benefit of his Subjects. As the Laws, during the Wars, had been very much trampled upon, and were become almost unknown to the People, he laid out his pains for some time, in making a Collection of the best Laws he could find. He inserted some of the Judicial Laws (1) of the Old Testament, and several of those formerly enacted by Ina King of Wessex, and Offa King of Mercia (2) in their respective Kingdoms. To these he added many of his own, adapted to the Circumstances of his People. Throughout these Laws may easily be observed, an ardent zeal for Justice, and a sincere desire of rooting out Oppression and Violence (3). They were indeed mild, if compared to those of later Ages, seeing they punished most Offences by Mulcts and Fines (4). But the strictness wherewith Alfred caused them to be observed, counterbalanced their Lenity. If with respect to private Persons the rigour of the Law was somewhat abated, it was not so with regard to corrupt Magistrates; to such Alfred was ever inexorable. He was very sensible it would be in vain to oblige his Subjects to an exact observance of the Laws, if care were not taken that the Magistrates should give them a good example. History takes notice of his executing four and forty Judges within the space of a Year, for not doing Justice (5).

Institution of Juries.

These Precautions seemed to be sufficient to hinder the Poor and Low, from being oppressed by the Rich and Great. But as Alfred was sensible, the Spirit of oppression naturally grew upon Men in Authority, he studied to prevent that Inconvenience. To that end, he ordered, that in all Criminal Actions, twelve Men, chosen for that purpose, should determine concerning the Fact, and the Judge give sentence according to their Verdict. This Privilege, enjoyed by the English to this day, is doubtless the noblest and most valuable, that Subjects can have. An Englishman accused of any Crime, is to be tried only by his Peers, that is, by Persons of his own Rank. By this means, he is out of all danger of being oppressed, how powerful soever his accusers may be. These twelve Men, chosen out of many others, with the approbation of the Person accused, are called by the collective name of Jury. These are properly the Persons, by whom the life or death of the party accused is determined. Happy the People that enjoy so glorious a Privilege!

Division of the Kingdom into Shires, Hundreds and Tythings.

The Wars had caused such disorders and licentiousness in the Kingdom, that Vagabonds and Vagrants every where abounded, who committed all manner of Crimes with impunity, their poor and mean condition screening them from Justice. As they had no settled abode, upon committing any Offence they shifted their quarters, and went where it was difficult to discover them. Alfred beholding with Indignation honest Men thus exposed to the insults of Villains, was extremely desirous to put a stop to so great Mischief. Having consulted those whom he judged capable of giving him good Advice, he took the following method to prevent any Person from living in his Dominions, without being obliged to give an Account of his Actions. He divided all England into Shires (6) or Counties, the Counties into Hundreds, and the Hundreds into Tithings. This being done, all the Inhabitants of the Kingdom were obliged to belong to some Tything; whoever did not, were looked upon as Vagabonds, and as such denied the protection of the Law. Every Householder was to answer for his Wife, his Children under fifteen years of Age, and his Domesticks. If any one by his way of living fell under suspicion, he was obliged to give security for his good Behaviour: In case he could find none, the Tything threw him into Prison, to prevent their being liable to the penalty he should incur by any Offence (7). Thus the Householders being responsible for their Families, the Tything for the Householders, the Hundreds for the Tythings, and the Counties for the Hundreds, every one was watchful over his Neighbours Actions. If a Stranger guilty of any Crime made his Escape, information was taken of the House where he lodged, and if he had been there three days, the Master of the Family was condemned to pay his Fine. But in case he had not stayed so long as three days, the Householder was acquitted upon making Oath he was not privy to his Crime. I might add here abundance of particulars not so entertaining to Foreigners, as to the English, who behold with pleasure in these regulations, the origin of those Laws they so happily live under at this present Time. But it suffices to say, these wise Institutions produc'd such good Order and Tranquility as the like had never before been known in England (8).

Alfred regulates the Militia.

In short, to prevent the Kingdom from being infested any more by foreign Enemies, Alfred disposed the Militia in such manner as enabled him to make head against an Invasion, in case the Danes should renew their Incursions. He kept in each County a body of Troops always ready to march under the conduct of the Earl or Governor. Upon the first notice of an Invasion, the Earls had orders to join Forces at certain Places, under the command of a Generalissimo appointed by the King. By this means, together with a numerous Fleet, which was always either ready to put to Sea, or cruising round the Island, he kept the foreign Danes so in awe, that during the rest of his Reign, they durst not attempt to make a Descent. And for the same reason, those that were settled in the Island, found themselves constrained to be quiet.

He causes trading Ships to be built.

When by these wise regulations Alfred had provided for the Safety of the State, he endeavoured to make the People relish the Fruits of Peace, by introducing Trade and Commerce. He ordered a good number of Merchant-ships to be built, which he let out to the principal Merchants, for the encouragement of Traffick. So that by degrees the English were in a condition to repair by this means the losses occasion'd by so long a War. It is affirmed that some of these Merchants traded as far as the East-Indies, from whence they imported several things, before unknown to the English (9).

Alfred invites several learned Men into England. Asser.

After this great Prince had thus regulated Matters, he turned his thoughts to the Arts and Sciences, which the Wars had almost entirely frightned from the Land. To this end he invited over from foreign Countries learned Men, to whom he gave Pensions, and dispersed them in the several Dioceses, to instruct the People. But not satisfied with this, and desirous of having in his own Kingdom a Nursery of Learning, he founded four Schools, or Colleges at Oxford. In the first, the Abbot Neots and Grimbald read Divinity. In the second, Asserius, a Benedictine Monk, taught Grammar and Rhetorick. In the third, John, a Monk of St. David's, set up a Chair for Logick, Arithmetick, and Musick. In the fourth, Johannes Scotus professed Geometry and Astronomy. This last was surnamed Erigena, that is, the Irishman, from the word Erin or Irin, the true name of Ireland. He was also called Scotus no doubt upon the same Account, the Inhabitants of Ireland being then termed Scots. It is related of this Johannes Scotus, so famous in the republick of Letters, that he was stabbed to death by his Pupils with Pen-knives. But some say, he taught in Malmsbury-Abby, and not at

(2) And likewise Ethelbert King of Kent, who was the first that reduced the Saxon Laws into Writing.

(3) If King Alfred, as is supposed, drew up a compleat Body of Laws, 'tis now lost; for those lately publish'd by Dr. Wilkins, (who has given us all the Laws extant from Ethelbert, the first Christian Lawgiver in England, down to the Magna Charta of Henry III) fall short of an entire System of Law. Alfred's Laws are rank'd under two Heads, 1. The Laws of Alfred, forty in Number. 2. The League between Alfred and Gutburm, which seems to be no more than Articles of Pacification, and Conditions on which Gutburm was to hold East-Anglia. The 37th Law secures the Entail of Estates, and enacts, That those who have Bock-land (or Estates in Land) left them by their Parents, should not annihilate it from their Heirs, provided there could be proof made that he that first granted the Estate, settled it upon condition of Non-alienation. Another Law forbids, the buying a Man, a Horse, or an Ox, without a Voucher to warrant the Sale. The Occasion of this Law was this: When the Danes first settled in England, it was a common Practice between the two Nations, not only to steal Horses and Oxen, but also Men and Women, and sell them to one another. By which means, Owners not only lost Cattle, but Men were wrongfully made Slaves. To remedy which this Law was enacted. Afterwards Fairs and Markets obtained the same Privilege, of Vouchers. But as to Horses, the Frauds were so common, that the Statute of 31 Eliz. 12. reviv'd the express Law of Alfred.

(4) The 40th Law sets a certain Value upon every Limb and Member, as well as upon every Person, from a King to a Bond-Slave.

(5) He us'd to re-examine the Causes tried in his Absence, and in case he found any Injustice done out of Favour or Interest, he punished the Judges severely. If they pleaded Ignorance, he sharply reprimanded them, and ask'd how they durst presume to take a Commission to determine about Life and Property, when they knew themselves so wretchedly unqualified! and ordered them either to know better or quit their Post. Thus the Earls and Great Men, rather than be turn'd out of their Office with Disgrace, applied themselves to Study. See Mirror of Justice, c. 20. and Malm. l. 2. p. 25. Brompton says, Justice was so strictly administred in Alfred's Reign, that though there were gold Bracelets hung up at the parting of several Highways, no Man durst touch them, p. 818.

(6) From the Saxon Word Scyre, i. e. to branch or divide. Spelman says, that Alfred was not the first that divided the Kingdom into Shires, but only fix'd their Number and Limits. Rapin.

(7) There is much the same Regulation in China. See Hist. of Menaaca. Rapin.

(8) Spelman ascribes also to Alfred the Institution of Sheriffs, Under-Sheriffs, and Original Writs, &c. p. 113, 114.

(9) It is not likely they traded to the Indies by Sea, at a time the Mariner's Compass was not found out. Rapin. You have a large Account of this Matter in Spelman's Life of Alfred, l. 2. c. 28. Malmsbury says, he sent a Present to the Indies in honour of St. Thomas. Sigelin Bishop of Sherborn was employed to deliver it, who performed the Voyage successfully, and brought back precious Stones, Perfumes and other Commodities, which were then great Curiosities in England. It was thought Alfred caused with these Diamonds a more August and Imperial sort of Crown than had been used before to be composed. For in the arched Roof in the Cloisters of Westminster-Abby, where the ancient Regalia of the Kingdom are kept, upon a Box, the Cabinet of the most ancient Crown, there are these Words, Hic est principalior Corona cum qua coronabantur Reges Alfredus, Edwardus, &c. This Crown is of a very ancient Work, with Flowers adorned with Stones of somewhat a plain Setting. Spelman.

Oxford.

Oxford (1). We find moreover among the learned Men encouraged by Alfred, Plegmund a Mercian, who became Archbiſhop of Canterbury, and ſome others, whoſe Names, as they will not ſerve to make them more known, it is needleſs to repeat. It is alſo unneceſſary to ſtay to examine, whether the Colleges founded by Alfred were the firſt Foundations of the Univerſity of Oxford, or whether before that, there were at a Place called Greeklade the like Schools, which were removed from thence to this City. Beſides that the diſpute would lead me too far, it would be of little uſe to examine it throughly, conſidering how few are concerned in it. It is enough to obſerve, that from theſe ſmall beginnings, the Univerſity of Oxford, famous throughout all Europe, has grown up to its preſent Height.

Brompt.

Original of the ſeveral Councils.

Though Alfred was very capable himſelf of knowing the beſt means of promoting his Deſigns for the good of his People, yet he conſulted others, eminent for their Abilities, and paid a great deference to their Opinions. He had ordered matters ſo that all reſolutions relating to the publick were to paſs thro' three ſeveral Councils. The firſt was a Cabinet Council, to which none but thoſe the King had a particular Eſteem for, were admitted. Here all Affairs were firſt debated that were to be laid before the ſecond Council, which conſiſted of Biſhops, Earls, Viſcounts, Judges, and ſome of the principal Thanes, called afterwards Barons. This reſembled the preſent Privy-Council. None belonged to it but thoſe the King was pleaſed to appoint. The third was a general Council or Aſſembly of the Nation, called in Saxon, Wittena Gemot, to which Quality and Offices gave a right to ſit, independent of the King. This Aſſembly, ſtiled at preſent the Parliament, a name taken from the French, was compoſed of the two Archbiſhops of Canterbury and York, the Biſhops, Earls, Viſcounts or High-Sheriffs of the Counties, and the Thanes of the firſt rank or Barons. It is now diſputed with great warmth, whether the People had a right to ſend Repreſentatives to this Aſſembly. But this point ſhall be diſcuſſed in another Place. However this be, we behold in theſe three Councils the original of the Cabinet and Privy Councils, as well as the Antiquity of Parliaments. Theſe Councils, and particularly the Wittena Gemot, which was conven'd generally once a Year, being for the moſt part held at London, it is eaſy to conceive that the City received by it a greater air of ſplendor than before. The Danes, who had been Maſters of it for ſome time, had demoliſhed it in ſuch a manner that it was hardly to be known. It was a pleaſure to Alfred to beautify it and augment its Privileges. The Figure it afterwards made, and ſtill continues to make, is in ſome meaſure owing to the care of this Prince (2).

Alfred introduces the way of building with Brick and Stone. Aſſer. vit. Alfr.

Matters of greater moment being ſettled as well as could be deſired, Alfred, ever mindful of what might be advantagious to his People, believed he ought not to be forgetful of one thing in itſelf uſeful and to the Kingdom very ornamental; and that was to induce the Engliſh to build their Houſes for the future in a ſtronger and more regular manner, than they had been uſed to. At that time, there were ſcarce any but Timber-Houſes. It was a rarity to ſee a Houſe built with other Materials. Alfred having raiſed his Palaces with Stone or Brick, the Nobility by degrees began to follow his Example. But this Cuſtom did not become general 'till ſeveral ages after. The Monaſteries, we may believe, that were deſtroyed by the Danes, and afterwards rebuilt, had their ſhare of this Improvement, as places that were held in a ſtill greater veneration in the following than in the preſent Century. The religious Houſes however did not begin to be inhabited again 'till the following Reigns. At the time I am ſpeaking of they were almoſt forſaken, for the Lands deſigned for the maintenance of the Monks being waſted by the Daniſh Wars, there was ſcarce a Man to be found willing to embrace a monaſtick Life; which is a clear Evidence, that it was not ſo much Devotion, as the hopes of being maintained without Labour, that filled the religious Houſes. During the Reign of Alfred, the backwardneſs to a monkiſh Life was ſo great, that the King was forced to ſtock the Monaſteries with Foreigners, there being ſcarce ſuch a thing as a Monk in the Kingdom. But after his Death, when the Lands were reſtored to the Monaſteries, the zeal for that way of Life began to rekindle. Whereas in Alfred's Days, there were more Monaſteries than Monks, in a few years after the Monks were grown ſo numerous, and encreaſed daily in ſuch a manner, that there were not religious Houſes enough to contain them.

Aſſer.

Hitherto we have conſidered Alfred ſo taken up with the care of the publick, that he ſeems to have had no time or leiſure for his own private concerns. But we muſt have a very different Idea of this Prince. He was one of thoſe happy Geniuſes that ſeem born for whatever they do, and are continually employed, without appearing to be ſo. He knew too well the value of time, to loſe any part of it. So far was he from being like moſt Princes, who imagine their high Station gives them a Privilege of ſpending all their time in diverſions and trifles, that he endeavoured to improve every moment. Whilſt he lay concealed in the Iſle of Athelney, he made a vow to dedicate to the Service of God, the third part of his time, as ſoon as he ſhould be reſtored to a State of Tranquility. Accordingly he was punctual to his Vow, and allotted eight hours every day to acts of Devotion, eight hours to publick Affairs, and as many to ſleep, ſtudy, and neceſſary refreſhment. As the uſe of Clocks and Hour-Glaſſes was not as yet introduced into England, he meaſured the time by means of Wax-Candles, marked with circular lines of divers Colours, which ſerved as ſo many Hour-lines (3). And to prevent the wind from making them burn unſteadily, it is ſaid he invented the expedient of encloſing them in Lanthorns (4). But it is a queſtion whether this Invention be of ſo modern a date.

His private Life.

The Diſtribution of his Time.

Aſſer.

Origin of Lanthorns in England.

His Charities were very extraordinary conſidering his Revenues, and ſo much the more praiſe-worthy, as they were done privately, or at leaſt without Oſtentation. He educated, at Court or at Oxford, a great many young Noblemen, who were inſtructed in all things neceſſary to render them one day ſerviceable to their Country. But this was not his only method to cauſe the Arts and Sciences to flouriſh: His own Example greatly contributed towards it, for never was Prince more given to his Studies. The progreſs he made in Learning, notwithſtanding his being ſo long employed in his Wars and the adminiſtration of the Government, demonſtrate how well he improved his Intervals from publick Buſineſs. The Author of his Life aſſures us, he was the beſt Saxon Poet of his time, an excellent Grammarian, Orator, Philoſopher, Architect, Geometrician, and Hiſtorian. He compoſed ſeveral Works, that were in great Eſteem. Among others, he tranſlated into Saxon, Gregory's Paſtoral, Boetius de Conſolatione (5), and Bede's Eccleſiaſtical Hiſtory (6). What a ſhame and reproach was it for the Engliſh Nation to be ſo ignorant, when they had ſo learned a King at their Head? This excellent Prince complained bitterly (7) that from the Humber to the Thames there was not a Prieſt that underſtood the Liturgy in his Mother Tongue, and that from the Thames to the Sea, there was not one that knew how to tranſlate the eaſieſt Piece of Latin. This univerſal Ignorance, and the little reliſh the Engliſh had then for the Arts and Sciences, cauſed the King to ſeek all occaſions, of earneſtly inviting into his Dominions Foreigners that were eminent in their Profeſſions. He took particular care to have always about him the moſt noted Workmen and Architects, and to keep them employed, with the ſole view of improving their Skill. He placed in the Chairs at Oxford, Men famous for their Learning, and allowed them handſome Salaries. His aim was to ſtir up the Emulation of the Engliſh, and provoke them to uſe their Endeavours to come out of that ſtate of groſs ignorance they were in. The Fame of his great Wiſdom and Piety reaching as far as Rome, the Pope ſent him a large Quantity of Relicks, and upon his account granted ſome new privileges to the Engliſh College. Abel Patriarch of Jeruſalem, willing alſo to ſhow him marks of his Eſteem, ſent him a preſent of Relicks, which the King received with great Satisfaction.

Theſe being lighted one after another, did orderly burn four Hours apiece, that is, every three Inches an Hour, ſo that the whole ſix Candles laſted juſt twenty four Hours, the watching of which was committed to the Keepers of his Chapel, whoſe Office it was to put him in mind how each Hour paſſed. Spelman.

(4) Glaſs was then a great Rarity in England, ſo that the King was forc'd to order ſome fine white Horn to be ſcraped ſo thin as to become tranſparent, and put into cloſe Frames of Wood, which defended the Candles from the injury of the Wind. Thus Lanthorns, tho' of vulgar Uſe and Eſtimation, were the Invention of a King. Spelman. Aſſer. vit. Alfr. p. 20.

wait monthly by turns: A Cuſtom, which tho' not practiſed then in other Courts, was afterwards followed by other Princes. As for his Revenues, he divided them in two Parts, one whereof was wholly aſſigned for charitable uſes, and ſubdivided into four Portions. The firſt for Alms to the Poor: The ſecond for the maintenance of the Monaſteries he had founded: The third for the Subſiſtence of the Profeſſors and Scholars at Oxford: The fourth for poor Monks, as well Foreigners as Engliſh (1). The other half was thrown into three diviſions; one was expended in his Family; another in paying his Architects, and other curious Workmen; and the reſt was beſtowed in Penſions upon Strangers, invited to his Court for the encouragement and inſtruction of his Subjects. When I ſpeak of his Revenues, I mean his own hereditary Eſtate. It was not cuſtomary in thoſe days, for Princes to levy Taxes upon the People, in order to ſquander the Money in Luxury and Extravagancies.

What has been ſaid of this illuſtrious Prince, may ſuffice to make known the principal events in his Reign, and to give an Idea of his perſonal Qualities. I might add many more particulars, ſince his Life alone affords matter for a large Volume. But I believe I may venture to ſtop here, without injuring the memory of this Monarch, who is juſtly diſtinguiſhed with the Sirname of Great. No Hiſtorian charges him with any Vice, but all unanimouſly agree to repreſent him as one of the moſt glorious Princes that ever wore the Crown (2).

He died in 900, and in the 52d year of his Age, after a reign of twenty-eight years and ſix months (3), the greateſt part whereof was ſpent in wars and troubles, and the reſt in peace (4). His Hiſtory ſhews, that both in War and Peace, he govern'd with prudence and ſteadineſs. But what chiefly diſtinguiſhes him from the generality of Princes, was his ſincere and conſtant love for his People. Of this he gave demonſtration, not by words only, as is too commonly the caſe, but by real and ſubſtantial deeds. Accordingly never was Prince better beloved by his Subjects. No doubt this mutual Affection contributed to deſtroy in the Danes, ſettled in England, all hopes of ſhaking off his Yoke, when once they had ſubmitted to it. 900. His Death.

Alfred had ſeveral Children by Alſwitha his Queen. Some of them, particularly Edmund his eldeſt Son, whom he deſigned for his Succeſſor, died before him. Of thoſe that ſurviv'd him, Edward mounted the Throne after him. Ethelward, who was bred a ſcholar at Oxford, was a very learned Man, and died in the fortieth year of his Age, in 922. Elfleda, his eldeſt Daughter, Wife to Ethelred Earl of Mercia, became very famous in her Brother Edward's Reign. Alſwitha or Ethelſwitha, called alſo Eltrude by the Flemiſh Writers, married Baldwin Earl of Flanders. Ethelgitha, who choſe to be a Nun, was made Abbeſs of Shaftſbury Nunnery, founded by the King her Father (5). His Children. Aſſer.

The State of the Kingdom. 900.

WHEN Edward aſcended the Throne, England was almoſt equally divided between the Engliſh and Danes. The Danes inhabited Northumberland and Eaſt-Anglia, from whence they had driven the Engliſh during the wars. The Engliſh were ſtill in poſſeſſion of Weſſex, containing the ancient Kingdom of Eſſex, and all the Country lying South of the Thames. As for Mercia, it was peopled with a mixture of Danes and Engliſh, but in ſuch manner, that the Engliſh were ſuperior in the South and Weſt Parts, and the Danes in the Eaſt and North. During the latter part of Alfred's Reign, the Danes had remained very quiet, out of fear of provoking that Prince to invade their poſſeſſions. Beſides, they were very well pleaſed to enjoy ſome repoſe, in order to fortify their Settlements in England. For this reaſon, the retreat of their Countrymen was to them rather an occaſion of Joy than Sorrow. Indeed, they could never have attained to their ends, if the War had been continually renewed by the arrival of other Danes, who under the name of Friends, would have been as incommodious to them as to the Engliſh themſelves. The retreat of theſe dangerous Gueſts, and the profound Tranquility ſpread over the whole Kingdom, by Alfred's juſt Adminiſtration, having given them time to cultivate their Lands, and augment their Riches by Commerce, they began to entertain thoughts of ſhaking off the Engliſh Yoke. Accordingly, they embraced the firſt favourable occaſion to excite new Troubles in England, not doubting in the leaſt but they would prove the means of putting their deſign in Execution.

Ethelward pretends to the Crown. 901. Sax. Ann. A. Hunt. l. 5.

I have obſerved that King Ethelbert, elder Brother to Alfred, left two Infant Sons. Ethelward, the eldeſt, being grown, at the death of Alfred, to Man's Eſtate, thought it time to aſſert his right to the Crown. He pretended, that Ethelwulph his Grandfather could not with Juſtice ſettle the Kingdom upon all his Sons ſucceſſively, to the prejudice of the Children of the eldeſt. That granting he had a power to do this, there was no reaſon the Succeſſion, after the death of the four Brothers, ſhould continue in the Family of the youngeſt, when the Heirs of the ſecond were alive. That beſides, at moſt he could but intail the Kingdom of Kent, which he was in poſſeſſion of, and not the Kingdom of Weſſex, which belonged not to him when he made his Will. Theſe reaſons appeared very plauſible; yet Ethelward could meet with no encouragement from the Engliſh. Doubtleſs, the great Veneration they had for Alfred's Memory, made them adhere to his Son, or it may be, they did not queſtion Ethelwulph's power of ſettling the Succeſſion as he pleaſed. The ancient Hiſtorians not having expreſſed themſelves clearly upon this point, it would be difficult to decide the matter by the publick Laws of the Saxons, which are not ſufficiently known. And therefore, to confine my ſelf to the bare relation of Facts, I ſhall only ſay, that Ethelward, finding his Countrymen unwilling to ſupport his Title, was forc'd to apply to the Danes, who probably had put him upon this undertaking.

Ethelward began his deſign upon the Crown, with ſeizing Winburn, a fortified Town in Dorſetſhire (6). He expected to be attacked; but hoped, if that place made never ſo little Reſiſtance, the Danes would keep Edward ſo much employed in other parts, that it would not be poſſible for him to retake it (7). But his hopes were all in vain. Edward came upon him with ſuch Expedition, that he was like to have ſurprized him in Winburn, before he had taken neceſſary meaſures for his defence. He had hardly time to get out of the Town (8) and fly to the Danes (9), who were now up in Arms. Upon this Prince's coming among them, they proclaimed him King of England, pretending, as they were in poſſeſſion of half the Kingdom, they had as much right to make a King as the Weſt-Saxons. Ethelward takes Winburn. Sax. Ann. Huntin. l. 5. Brompt. Loſes it again, and flies to the Danes, who proclaim him King. Sax. Ann.

The retreat of Ethelward among the Danes, made the King ſenſible he was going to be involved in a troubleſome War, the conſequences whereof were to be dreaded. Not that he thought himſelf unable to withſtand the Danes ſettled in England, but was apprehenſive the foreign Danes would take this opportunity to plunge the Kingdom again into its former Calamities. This Conſideration made him reſolve to do his utmoſt to put an end to the War, before the Danes had time to ſend for their Countrymen to their Aſſiſtance. Immediately after the taking of Winburn, he marched towards Northumberland (10), at the head of his Army, which daily encreaſed, by Troops coming in from all Parts. The Danes were aſtoniſhed at this Expedition, and finding themſelves in no condition to reſiſt him, were conſtrained to abandon and baniſh from their Country, the Prince they had undertaken to protect. They had ſoon reaſon to repent of eſpouſing his Cauſe, or not defending it better. This fruitleſs attempt of 902. The Danes abandon him. Brompt.

He was ſatisfied with repairing ſome Fortreſſes in Mercia, in order to confine them within narrower Bounds (1). Ethelred Earl of Mercia, and the Princeſs Elfleda his Wife, were very ſerviceable to the King in this War, by making head againſt the Mercian Danes, and preventing the Welſh from coming to their Aid. It is related of Elfleda, that having had a very hard Labour with her firſt Child, ſhe made a reſolution never to come into the like Caſe again, and was as good as her Word. From thenceforward ſhe wholly devoted herſelf to Arms, and like a true Amazon, gave proofs of her courage in all the King her Brother's Wars with the Danes. Mean while, Ethelward, though abſent, was not idle. Upon leaving England, he applied to France, and obtained a powerful aid of Normans. With theſe forces he landed in Eſſex (2), and eaſily became Maſter of that Kingdom. Edward, not expecting his Enemy could have been ſo ſoon ready to make a freſh attempt, had taken care only to guard Mercia againſt the Northumbrian-Danes, imagining Eſſex to be in no danger. The arrival of the Normans rouzed the Danes of Northumberland and Eaſt-Anglia, and cauſed them to reſolve to make a diverſion in favour of Ethelward. Accordingly they take up arms again, and throwing themſelves into Mercia, ravage the Country inhabited by the Engliſh in a mercileſs manner (3). Edward, not without extreme regret, ſaw himſelf forced to bear their Inſults, till he could draw his Troops together, which he had diſmiſſed, as believing he ſhould not want them ſo ſoon. The moment he was at the head of his Army, he made the Danes pay dear for the miſchief they had done the Engliſh. In this War he gained ſo many Victories, that the Danes loſt all hopes of throwing off the Engliſh yoke, and his Couſin of mounting the Throne. At length Ethelward being ſlain in Battle (4), and the Daniſh forces conſiderably diminiſhed, they were not able to carry on the War with that vigour they begun it. However, they continued it two years after Ethelward's Death. But having in vain endeavoured to repair their Loſſes, they ſued for Peace (5); which Edward readily granted them, on condition they would acknowledge him for Sovereign as they had done his Father, and the Normans forthwith return to France.

Then it was that Ethelred, who had all along bravely ſeconded the King his Brother-in-law, became in reality Earl of Mercia; but was not long ſo. He was taken out of the World by Death, almoſt as ſoon as that whole Province was united under his Government. This Earl was not barely Governor or Viceroy of Mercia: He had ſome particular Power, the nature of which it is very difficult to learn from the Hiſtorians that ſpeak of it. Malmsbury ſays he held the Country as a Fief of the Crown, much in the ſame manner as the German Princes hold their Territories of the Empire (8). Of this, Elfleda his Widow's ceſſion to the King her Brother of the Cities of London and Oxford, is a farther Proof. If Ethelred had been only Governor or Viceroy, Elfleda would have had no right to reſign theſe two Places, ſince they would not have belonged to her (9).

Elfleda having taken upon her the Government of Mercia, after Ethelred's Death, followed the example of her Father and Brother, in fortifying Towns, to take away from the Danes all hopes of ſettling in Mercia again. Among the Places ſhe repaired, or fortified, theſe are the Chief, Warwick, Tamworth, Wedensbury, Charbury, Eadsbury, and Cheſter (10). This laſt had lain in ruins for ſome Time (11). When Elfleda had taken theſe Precautions, ſhe carried her Arms into Wales (12), and after ſeveral victories, obliged the Welſh to become her Tributaries. Sax. Ann. Malmſb. Huntingd.

The year 915, as ſome affirm, is memorable for the founding of the Univerſity of Cambridge by King Edward. But all agree not in this Matter. Some maintain the Origin of this famous Univerſity is of a much later date. Others, on the contrary, carry its Antiquity a great deal higher, and attribute the founding of it to one Cantaber, a Spaniard, three hundred and fifteen years before the birth of our Saviour. Some again, cutting off almoſt a thouſand years of this Antiquity, are contented with aſſerting, that Sebert, who reigned in Eſſex in the beginning of the VIIth Century, was the firſt Founder. I ſhall not take upon me to decide this Diſpute, rendered very warm by the emulation between Oxford and Cambridge. It is ſufficient to have briefly mentioned the diverſity of opinions in this matter. However, I cannot forbear obſerving, that if the Univerſity of Cambridge was in being in King Sebert's Time, or even in Alfred's, it is very ſurprizing, that neither Bede in his Eccleſiaſtical Hiſtory, nor Aſſerius in his Life of Alfred, ſhould take the leaſt notice of it.

915. The founding of the Univerſity of Cambridge.

From the year 910, when the War between the Engliſh and Danes was rekindled, to the year 922, we find in Hiſtory nothing but a long ſeries of Battles, the relation whereof muſt be unpleaſant to the Reader (13). I ſhall therefore without any ſcruple paſs them over in Silence, and mention only the moſt remarkable Conſequences.

The Princeſs Elfleda, Siſter to King Edward, died during this War (14), leaving an only Daughter, named Elfwina, then marriageable. Elfleda, as was ſaid, ſucceeded her Husband in the Sovereignty of Mercia: I ſay Sovereignty, becauſe it was certainly more than a bare Government. But not to give wrong notions of this matter, it will be proper to conſider the ſtate of Mercia at the Time I am ſpeaking of. Hiſtorians not having clearly expreſſed themſelves, have left us very much in the dark as to this Point. It muſt be remembred, that Ethelred, with the Title of Earl of Mercia, was in poſſeſſion only of London and its Territory, or at moſt of the County of Middleſex, and that London, the Capital formerly of the Kingdom of Eſſex, was become the Metropolis of Mercia. Afterwards, Ethelred's narrow territories being much enlarged by his conqueſts upon the Mercian-Danes, Alfred's preſent to his Son-in-law was become ſo conſiderable, as to raiſe the jealouſy of the new King, and make him apprehenſive of Ethelred's ſucceſſors growing too powerful.

ful. However, whilſt Elfleda lived, Edward ſeemed not to be jealous of her Proſperity, and had no thoughts of diſpoſſeſſing her of what ſhe had gained in great meaſure by her own Valour. But after her Death, he did not think fit to leave her daughter Elfwina in poſſeſſion of a Demeſn, which put it in her power to raiſe new troubles in England by ſome ill-contrived Match. And indeed, there are Hiſtorians who affirm, the young Princeſs had reſolved upon marrying a Daniſh Prince (1), and that therefore her Uncle deprived her of her Dominions. He was afraid no doubt, ſhe would introduce the Enemies of the Kingdom into thoſe very Places, that with ſo much difficulty had been wreſted out of their Hands. However this be, after Elfleda's Death, he ſeized upon Mercia, and carried his Niece with him into Weſſex. In all likelihood ſhe paſſed the reſt of her days in a Nunnery. Whether Elfwina's deſign of marrying a Dane was matter of fact, or an invention to vindicate the King's proceedings againſt his Niece, it equally proves what was before obſerved, that Ethelred and Elfleda were proprietors of Mercia. If they had been no more than Governors, Edward would have had no occaſion to alledge her intended marriage as a reaſon to deprive her of the Government; as, on the other hand, there would have been no neceſſity of inventing ſuch a Pretence, ſuppoſing there was no Foundation for it. I have enlarged a little on this Subject, becauſe of the great variety of opinions concerning the Right of Earl Ethelred.

Edward is apprehenſive his Niece will deliver Mercia to the Danes; and therefore ſeizes upon it himſelf. J. Bevour. Sax. An.

In their wars with Edward, the Danes daily loſt ground, whilſt the King, who knew how to improve his Advantages, puſhed them inceſſantly without giving them time to breathe. By which means he at length compelled them to ſubmit, and own him once more for their Sovereign. The Mercian-Danes were the firſt that threw down their Arms. The Eaſt-Angles followed ſoon after, and ſubmitted without Terms. The Northumbrians were the laſt, as being the moſt powerful, almoſt all Northumberland being inhabited by Danes. The progreſs Edward had made in the other Provinces, convinced them, it would be better to ſubmit than continue a war, which muſt end in their ruin. They were then governed by three Kings. Sithric and Nigel his Brother reigned beyond the Tine, and Reginald, who reſided at York, ruled all the Country between the Tine and the Humber. Some time after, Sithric having ſlain his Brother Nigel, became ſole King of the North.

921, & 922. The Danes ſubmit to Edward. Flor. Wig. Sax. Ann. Malmſb. M. Weſt.

The ſtate of the Welſh depended in ſome meaſure on that of the Danes. As long as the Danes were in Arms, the Kings of England left the Welſh peaceably to enjoy their Liberty. But as ſoon as they had nothing to fear from the North, they ſeldom failed to attack them. At ſuch a juncture it was, that Elfleda, aſſiſted by the Troops of the King her Brother, compelled them to become her Tributaries. After her death the Welſh endeavoured to free themſelves from the Tribute ſhe had laid upon them, and to keep Edward employed, ſent a powerful Aid to the Danes. Edward, having then other affairs upon his hands, took no notice of it: but as ſoon as he had concluded a Peace with the Danes, marched againſt Rees ap Madoc (2) King of Wales, who was aſſiſted by Leoffreth a Daniſh General. After ſeveral indeciſive Skirmiſhes, Edward at laſt obtained a ſignal Victory, which reduced the Welſh King to a neceſſity of ſuing for Peace, with a promiſe of paying the uſual Tribute. In fine, the Britons of Cumberland, who had put themſelves under the Protection of the Danes, ſubmitted alſo to Edward. Some Hiſtorians pretend, the King of Scotland following their Example, did Homage for his Kingdom to the King of England. But the Scots not only deny the Fact, but maintain it could not poſſibly be, ſince the word Homage was never uſed in Great-Britain 'till after the Norman Conqueſt. But this reaſon is not deciſive, for the thing ſignified by that Term might be in uſe under another name. And indeed, the Sovereignty of Alfred and Edward over the Northumbrian Danes and the Mercians in the time of Ethelred and Elfleda, was nothing elſe but a right of Homage from thoſe Countries, though perhaps the word was not then in uſe.

Edward was enjoying the Fruits of his Victories, feared and reſpected by all that could give him any umbrage at home, and greatly eſteemed by all Princes abroad, when death took him out of the World in 925, after a reign of twenty four years (3). He gained as great a Reputation by his Arms as the King his Father, ſince, like him, he gave Law to all England, and procured the Kingdom a reposé. But if he equalled the great Alfred in military Virtues, it muſt be owned he was far ſhort of his illuſtrious Father in all other reſpects (4).

925. Edward's Death.

He had Children by three Wives, the firſt named Egwina, a Shepherd's Daughter, was only a Concubine. An Hiſtorian relates concerning this Woman, a ſort of Romance, which, on account of the Sequel, it will be neceſſary to inſert. I call it a Romance, ſince by the Author's own confeſſion, it has no better Foundation than ſome old Songs handed down to his time (5); much the ſame with your Spaniſh Romances, wherein are related ſeveral Stories of their ancient Kings. The Hiſtorian ſays, Egwina, a Shepherd's Daughter, as ſhe lay aſleep in the Fields, dreamt that the Moon ſhone out of her Womb ſo bright that all England was enlightned by the Splendor. Some time after, ſhe took occaſion to relate her Dream to an old Woman that had been King Edward's Nurſe. This Woman, who pretended to interpret Dreams, imagining there was ſomething extraordinary in this, took Egwina into her Houſe, and educated her not as a Country Wench, but as a Perſon of Quality. Egwina anſwered all the old Nurſe's care and pains about her, and in time became an accompliſhed Beauty. Whilſt ſhe was in the Houſe of her Benefactreſs, Prince Edward, before he was King, happening to paſs by the place where his Nurſe lived, made her a Viſit. He caſt his Eyes on Egwina, and immediately fell deſperately in Love with her. His paſſion was ſo violent, that in the moſt moving and affecting manner he ſollicited the Nurſe to put him in poſſeſſion of the charming Egwina. The old Woman, who had a great affection for Edward, and had always the Dream in her Thoughts, yielded to his requeſt, and brought Egwina to conſent to what he deſired ſo paſſionately. From that Time, Edward was extremely fond of Egwina, and had by her three Children, of whom Athelſtan, the eldeſt, ſucceeded him. Alfred the ſecond died before his Father. The third was a Daughter, called by ſome Editha, by others Beatrix.

The Story of Edward and Egwina. Malmſb. Brompt.

Children of Edward by Egwina.

By another Wife, Edward had two Sons and ſix Daughters, Elfward the eldeſt Son died at Oxford a few Days after his Father; ſo that he had no time to taſte the ſweets of a Crown. Edwin the ſecond was deprived of his juſt Rights, and came to a tragical End, as ſhall be related hereafter. Of the ſix Daughters, ſome were married to powerful Princes, by the care of their Brother Athelſtan, and others became Nuns. Elfleda the eldeſt was Abbeſs of Ramſey (6). Ogina was married to Charles the Simple, King of France, and was Mother of Lewis d'Outre Mer. Edilda paſſed her Days in a Monaſtery. The fourth, of the ſame Name, was married to Hugh the Great, Earl of Paris, Father of Hugh Capet. Edgitha was Wife of Otho Emperor of Germany. Edgiva the youngeſt eſpouſed Lewis the Blind, King of Provence, who had a Son by her, named Conſtantine.

Children by another Wife.

By Edgiva his third Wife, Edward had two Sons and two Daughters. Edmund and Edred the two Sons were both Kings of England. Edburga was a Nun, and her Siſter Edgiva was married to Lewis Prince of Aquitain.

Children by his third Wife.

It is very probable, this Edgiva was confounded with her Siſter of the ſame name by the ſecond Wife, who was married to Lewis King of Provence, becauſe there was then no Prince of Aquitain mentioned in Hiſtory.

The Daniſh Hiſtorians give Edward another Daughter named Thyra, who, as they affirm, was Wife of Gormon III, one of their Kings. It is ſtrange they ſhould ſpeak ſo poſitively of a Princeſs of England, unknown to all the Engliſh Hiſtorians.

During the reign of Edward the Elder, Rollo chief of the Normans in France, had gotten ſuch firm footing in Neuſtria, that it was not in the Power of the French to drive him thence; Charles the Simple, then King of France, was forced, in order to free himſelf from the continual fears of ſo troubleſome a Neighbour, to give him a grant of that part of Neuſtria he was poſſeſſed of, lying between the Seine and the Epte, with the Title of Duke of Normandy. The conditions were, that Rollo ſhould do Homage to the Crown of France, be baptized and marry Giſelle the King's Daughter. Rollo died, according to Mezerai, in 917. Some place his death in 924, and others with ſtill leſs reaſon in 928. William his Son, by Poppa Daughter of the Earl of Bayeux, was his Succeſſor.

8. ATHELSTAN.

925. Athelſtan is elected King of England. Sax. Ann.

ELSWARD, Edward's eldeſt Son, ſurviving his Father but a few Days, and the reſt of the legitimate children being all under Age, Athelſtan, Son of Egwina, was placed on the Throne, with the Conſent of the Clergy and Nobility. Though this Prince had a mixture of Baſe and Royal Blood in his Veins, the laſt had ſo far the aſcendant, that the blemiſh of his Birth was entirely effaced by his noble Qualities. Alfred his Grandfather had conferred the honour of Knighthood upon him, by girding him with a Sword according to the Cuſtom of thoſe days. Edward his Father had committed the care of his Education to Earl Ethelred his Brother-in-law, and the Princeſs Elfleda his Siſter, who did their utmoſt to train him up to Virtue. As he had been preſent at all their Councils, and attended them in all their warlike expeditions, he had acquired ſo great experience both in Military and Political Affairs, as joined to his natural Parts, gained him the eſteem of all the World. So that when he mounted the Throne, he was not only of a fit age, being then in his thirtieth year, but alſo very capable to govern. Hiſtory does not inform us what determined the Engliſh to give the Crown to this Prince, notwithſtanding his illegitimate Birth (1). However, his Father thought this defect a ſufficient Reaſon to ſet him by, and name for his Succeſſor another of his Sons born in Wedlock, though younger than Athelſtan. In all likelihood, after the death of Elfward, Athelſtan's mature Age and noble Qualities gained him the preference before Edwin, the eldeſt of the legitimate Sons, but too young to govern (2).

Malmſb. l. 2. c. 6.

A Plot againſt the King. Malmſb.

This Election however was not pleaſing to all. Some of the principal Lords diſdaining to be governed by a Baſtard conſpired to dethrone Athelſtan, and place Edwin in his room. Alfred, chief of the Conſpirators, had even taken private meaſures to ſeize Athelſtan at Wincheſter, and put out his Eyes. This Plot being diſcovered, he was apprehended by the King's Order, but would confeſs nothing. He obſtinately perſiſted in proteſting his Innocency, and offered to purge himſelf by Oath in the preſence of the Pope. Although this way of juſtifying himſelf was far from being a proof of his Innocence, Athelſtan was ſatisfied with it, and ſent him to Rome, to take his Oath before Pope John. Perhaps he was unwilling to begin his Reign with Blood, or it may be, was apprehenſive, the treating too ſeverely a perſon of the firſt Rank, would draw upon him the ill-will of the Nobles. Shortly after, word was ſent him from Rome, that Alfred having ſworn his Innocence before the Pope, ſuddenly fell into a fainting fit, which laſting three days, ended with his Life; and that the Pope, convinced by this accident of Alfred's Perjury, had ordered his Body to remain in the Engliſh College 'till the King's pleaſure ſhould be known. Athelſtan, pleaſed with being thus rid of his Enemy without having directly contributed to his death, conſented he ſhould have Chriſtian burial. However, his Lands were confiſcated, and given to Malmsbury Monaſtery. The King took care to inſert in the Grant the whole Conſpiracy, to teſtify to the world that he dedicated to God what was his own.

The Danes begin to ſtir.

In the mean time, new troubles were preparing for the King. As the Danes, ſettled in England, had been ſubdued by force, they thought it lawful to make uſe of the ſame means to ſhake off their yoke. The death of Edward, and the conſpiracy of Alfred, affording them, as they imagined, a favourable opportunity to revolt, they had begun to take ſuch meaſures as obliged Athelſtan to march into their Country. He would doubtleſs have met with more reſiſtance, had he given them time to make greater Preparations. But as they had not yet drawn their Forces together, they were ſo ſurprized by the arrival of the King on their Frontiers, that without endeavouring to defend themſelves, they returned to their Allegiance. Sithric, one of their Kings (3), went and ſued for Peace, upon what terms the King was pleaſed to impoſe. Athelſtan being deſirous to live in Peace with the Danes, that he might have time to eſtabliſh himſelf in the Throne, not only pardoned his Revolt, but gave him his Siſter Editha in Marriage, on condition he would receive Baptiſm (4).

Athelſtan marches into Northumberland.

They are forced to ſubmit. Malmſb. Fl. Wig.

The troubles in the North being thus appeaſed, Athelſtan marched back to Weſſex, where advice was brought him ſoon after of Sithric's Death, who by a former Marriage had left two Sons (5), Anlaff and Godfrid. As the Hiſtories of thoſe times are not very particular, we are ignorant of the reaſon of Athelſtan's reſolving to deprive theſe two Princes of their Father's Dominions. However that be, as ſoon as he heard of Sithric's Death, he returned at the head of his Army into Northumberland. His March was ſo expeditious, that Anlaff and Godfrid (6), as well as Reginald, another Daniſh King reſiding at York, had ſcarce time to eſcape falling into his hands. Their haſty flight gave him opportunity of becoming maſter of all Northumberland, except the Caſtle of York.

Athelſtan's ſecond expedition to the North. Sax. Ann. Malmſb. Huntingd. Hoved.

He ſeizes all Northumberland.

Though he had taken care to ſecure his Conqueſt, by placing ſtrong Gariſons in all the Towns, he was uneaſy at the eſcape of the three Daniſh Princes. He would have been very glad to have them in his power; but, with regard to two, the thing was impoſſible. It was not known what was become of Reginald, and Anlaff was fled into Ireland, where it was no eaſy matter to come at him. Athelſtan therefore was forced to be ſatisfied with requiring Conſtantine King of Scotland to deliver up Godfrid, who had retired into his Dominions. Conſtantine being ſenſible, he was not in condition to deny any thing to a Prince at the head of ſo powerful an Army, promiſed to deliver the Prince into his hands, and give him a meeting at Dacor (7). But whilſt he was preparing for his Journey, Godfrid made his eſcape, either through the negligence or connivance of Conſtantine, who however went to meet Athelſtan accompanied with Eugenius King of Cumberland. Athelſtan admitted Conſtantine's excuſes for the Daniſh Prince's eſcape. But if the Engliſh Hiſtorians are to be credited, he obliged both the Kings to do Homage for their Kingdoms (8). However, the Scots poſitively deny that England had ever any right of Sovereignty over Scotland 'till the twelfth Century. But this diſpute, which was never decided, will for the future be dropt, ſince England and Scotland make now but one Kingdom.

An interview of the Kings of England and Scotland. Malmſb.

Remarks on the pretended homage of Conſtantine. Buchanan.

Before Athelſtan quitted the North, Godfrid made an Attempt upon York, by means of the Caſtle, where he had ſtill ſome Friends (9). But miſſing his aim, he put to Sea, where for ſome time he exerciſed Piracy. At length, tired with that way of Life, he ſurrendered himſelf to the King of England, who received him kindly, and allowed him a handſome Penſion. Some time after, upon ſome diſguſt or ill-grounded ſuſpicion, he withdrew again, and was never more heard of.

Godfrid's deſtiny.

Anlaff, a Prince of greater Abilities than his Brother, took better meaſures for his Reſtoration. He had retired into Ireland, where being informed that the King of Scotland was diſpleaſed with Athelſtan, believed he might make uſe of this opportunity to perſuade him to eſpouſe his Cauſe. To that end, he came into Scotland and intimated to Conſtantine, that he had reaſon to fear the worſt from the King of England. He repreſented to him, that Athelſtan having by ſurprize ſeized upon Northumberland, without any the leaſt pretence, might proceed in the ſame manner with regard to Scotland, and therefore it was abſolutely neceſſary to prevent him. To this he added the offer of a powerful aid from Ireland, aſſuring him, with that increaſe of ſtrength he might eaſily drive Athelſtan out of Northumberland, and free himſelf from a troubleſome and dangerous Neighbour, by reſtoring that Kingdom to the Danes, who would ſerve as a barrier againſt England. Anlaff found no great difficulty to prevail with the King of Scotland, who, beſides his being ſecretly exaſperated at the haughty reception he met with at the late Interview, was grown uneaſy at Athelſtan's Succeſſes, and apprehenſive of being invaded himſelf. Mean while Athelſtan, having viewed his Garriſons, and taken all the Precautions he thought proper to ſecure his late Conqueſts, was returned into Weſſex, where he remained in Peace, not knowing what his Enemies had plotted againſt him. Shortly after, he was engaged in a War with Howel King of Wales. This new Enemy was raiſed by Conſtantine, to keep him employed againſt the Welſh, whilſt he and Anlaff ſhould invade Northumberland. Athelſtan, by his expedition, broke all the meaſures of the King of Scotland. The moment he was informed of the Motions of the Welſh, and the Aid ſent them by Conſtantine, he marched into Wales, and giving Howel Battle obtained a complete Victory (1). After this happy Succeſs, he augmented the Tribute paid by that Prince to England (2).

This War being thus ended, Athelſtan approached the Borders of Scotland, to make Conſtantine repent of his aſſiſting the Welſh. As ſoon as he entered the Enemy's Country. he took ſome Towns, and gave the Scots reaſon to dread more conſiderable Loſſes. As Anlaff was not yet arrived with the promiſed Supplies, Conſtantine durſt not venture to engage alone in this War againſt ſo powerful an Enemy, who was already in his Dominions, and in condition to carry on his Conqueſts much further. Wherefore, to gain time till the Iriſh joined him, he ſued for Peace. Athelſtan readily granted his requeſt, being extremely deſirous to make that Prince his Friend, for fear he ſhould countenance the Inſurrections of the Northumbrians. For this reaſon he reſtored to him all the Places he had conquered in Scotland, in expectation of gaining by this Generoſity a Prince whoſe Friendſhip it was his Intereſt to cultivate. Some Hiſtorians however affirm, Athelſtan obliged Conſtantine to do him Homage for Scotland. But this is what the Scots will never allow.

938. Conſtantine renews the War.

Athelſtan's Generoſity was not ſufficient to hinder Conſtantine from purſuing the Execution of his firſt Projects. He rather haſtened his Preparations the more, being extremely vexed, he ſhould be forced to receive Obligations from a Prince whom he always conſidered as his Enemy. Mean while, Athelſtan was returned to Weſſex, where he hoped to enjoy ſome Repoſe, as he ſaw nothing about him likely to give him any Diſturbance. But he met at home in his own Family with what troubled him more than any thing the War could occaſion.

Athelſtan puts his Brother Edwin to Death, Brompt. Malmſb.

A certain Court-Lord, Enemy to Prince Edwin the King's Brother, accuſed the young Prince of being concerned in Alfred's Conſpiracy. The King too readily gave Ear to this Accuſation. He was eaſily induced to believe that a Prince in whoſe favour the Conſpiracy was formed was not innocent. It may be too, he was not ſorry to find him guilty, as it gave him an Opportunity to diſpatch him out of the way. However, he would not put him to death publickly, but ordered him to be expoſed to the Fury of the Waves in a Veſſel without Sails or Rudder. The young Prince went on board proteſting his Innocence, but finding the King inexorable, he caſt himſelf headlong into the Sea (3). Athelſtan at firſt was ſecretly pleaſed with this Occaſion to deſtroy his Brother; but the moment he had gratified his Paſſion, was ſeized with grievous Remorſe. To quiet his Conſcience he was adviſed to atone for his Crime by ſome meritorious Act. With this View he founded the Abby of Middleton in Dorſetſhire (4), where Prayers were offered to Heaven, Day and Night, for him and his Brother's Soul. The Hiſtorians add (5), that, not content with this, he ſubmitted to a ſeven Years Penance, but do not inform us wherein it conſiſted. Edwin's Accuſer had not reaſon long to rejoice at the Succeſs of his malicious Calumnies. One day as he waited at Table with the King's Cup, one of his Feet ſlipping, he would certainly have fallen, had he not by the Nimbleneſs of the other recovered himſelf. Whereupon he jokingly ſays, See how one Brother helps another. This Jeſt coſt him his Life. Athelſtan, who overheard what he ſaid, taking it for a Reproach or Banter upon him, ordered him to be executed immediately, and thus revenged his Brother's Death by That of his falſe Accuſer (6).

Conſtantine and Anlaff invade Northumberland Sax. Ann. Huntingd. Ingulph. Hoved.

Whilſt theſe things paſſed at Court, Conſtantine continued his Preparations for the execution of the Project concerted between him and Anlaff. This laſt, whom ſome groundleſly ſtile King of Ireland, had found means to engage in the League, the Iriſh, Welch, and Northumbrian Danes, who ardently deſired to have a King of their own Nation on the Throne. Anlaff appeared as head of this League, though Conſtantine was no leſs concerned in it, the War being carried on chiefly at his Expence. This Project was managed ſo privately, that Anlaff entered the Humber with a Fleet of ſix hundred Sail, and invaded Northumberland before Athelſtan had any Intelligence of his Motions. With ſo conſiderable Forces, and the Aſſiſtance of the Danes ſettled in thoſe Parts, he eaſily became Maſter of ſeveral ſmall ill-guarded Towns. But the fortified Places that were well garriſoned by the Engliſh, ſtopped his Progreſs, and gave Athelſtan time to draw his Army together. He uſed ſo great expedition, that he ſurpriſed the two confederate Princes. They were now upon the March towards Bernicia, in order to conquer it for the King of Scotland, but found they were obliged to turn back and oppoſe King Athelſtan, who was very near them, when they imagined him as yet employed in his Preparations. The two Armies met at Brunanburgh (7), where a bloody Battle was fought. Victory declared for Athelſtan, and the Allies loſt Conſtantine King of Scotland, ſix other Iriſh or Welſh Kings, and twelve Earls and General Officers. This Victory was chiefly owing to the Valour of Turketul, the King's Couſin, who was afterwards Abbot of Croyland. Athelſtan after winning this Battle, eaſily extended his Conqueſts farther into Scotland, and chaſtiſed the Welſh by raiſing their Tribute to twenty Pound weight of Gold, three hundred of Silver, and twenty five thouſand Head of Cattle. Beſides, they were pent up beyond the Wye, and loſt all the Country between that River and the Severn. As for the Northumbrian Danes, who had openly ſided with the Allies, Athelſtan for a Puniſhment encreaſed their Yoke, and kept for the future a ſtricter hand over them. After he had ſettled the Affairs of the North, he marched againſt the Corniſh Britons, who had likewiſe aſſiſted the Confederates. He took Exeter, formerly deſtroyed by the Danes, and cauſed it to be carefully repaired and fortified. From that time, the Britons were forced to retire beyond the Tamar, which ſerved for a Boundary to the two Nations. They were, before this Expedition, mixed with the Engliſh in ſome of the Weſtern Counties.

Miracles done in favour of Athelſtan. Brompt. Fordun, l. 4. c. 23.

In almoſt every page of the Hiſtories of thoſe Days, we meet with Miracles wrought in favour of the Friends and Protectors of the Monks. Athelſtan who had been a good Benefactor to them, with intent to atone for the murder of his Brother, was a great favourite with them. Accordingly they have not failed to give him the uſual marks of their Gratitude. They ſay, at the word of St. John of Beverley, he ſtruck his Sword three Yards deep in a ſolid Rock, which yielded like Butter. They tell us alſo, that having loſt his Sword in the Battle of Brunanburgh, another from Heaven came and ſheathed itſelf in his Scabbard. But it would be loſt time to relate all the Miracles the Monks have thought fit to ſtuff their Hiſtories with. It will not be amiſs however to note, that the Cuſtom of embelifhing all remarkable Events with Miracles, was in faſhion for ſeveral Ages.

He avoids being ſlain by the Advice of a Soldier. Malmſb. l. 2. c. 6.

I ſhall conclude the Reign of Athelſtan with an Incident, the beſt Hiſtorians have thought worth their Notice. A few days before the Battle of Brunanburgh, Anlaff wanting to know the Poſture of the Enemy, went into the Engliſh Camp diſguiſed like a Harper, as Alfred the Great had formerly done. But notwithſtanding his Diſguiſe, he was known by a Soldier, who however ſuffered him to go away

(5) Brompt. and Malmſb.

(6) As the Affair of Edwin is the only thing that ſullies the Memory of Athelſtan, Malmsbury, who relates it, diſbelieves the whole Story, becauſe of his great Kindneſs to his other Brothers and Siſters, and owns it was grounded only on ſome Old Ballads. Huntingdon ſpeaks of the Loſs of Edwin by Sea, but mentions it as a ſad Accident, and a great Misfortune to Athelſtan. Brompton indeed delivers it as a certain Truth. But Buchanan the Scotch Hiſtorian (ſuch was his Malice to this King's Memory) makes Athelſtan not only to have procured the Death of his Brother Edwin, but alſo of his Father King Edward, whom he therefore fancies to have been call'd the Martyr; and not content with this neither, adds, that he put to Death his Brother Edred alſo. More Miſtakes can ſcarce be committed in ſo few Lines; for in the firſt Place, it is agreed by all our Hiſtorians, that King Edward died a natural Death; and as for him whom he calls the Martyr, he was Son of King Edgar, nor did he begin to reign till above a hundred and fifty Years after. But as for what Buchanan objects againſt ſome of our late Hiſtorians for making Conſtantine to do Homage for Scotland to Athelſtan, he ſeems to be in the right. See Note above.

(7) Suppoſ'd to be Bromford, near Bromridge, in Northumberland; though ſome think it was ſomewhere nearer the Humber. undiſcovered. As ſoon as the Soldier thought him ſafe, he told Athelſtan what had happened, and adviſed him to remove his Tent, judging Anlaff had ſome deſign upon that Quarter. He excuſed himſelf for not having diſcovered this Secret ſooner, by ſaying, he had formerly given his Military Oath to Anlaff, and therefore could not reſolve to betray him. Athelſtan forgave him, and followed his Advice, which he ſoon found to be of great conſequence. The next Night the Daniſh Prince, with a Body of choſen Troops, attacked the Engliſh Camp, and penetrated to the very place where he had ſeen the King's Tent. A Biſhop (coming to the Camp that Night, and) accidentally pitching his Tent in the ſame place, was ſlain with all his Followers.

941. Athelſtan's Death.

Athelſtan out-lived the Victory of Brunanburgh but three Years. He died a natural Death in 941, in the forty ſixth year of his Age, and the ſixteenth of his Reign (1). Hiſtorians have dilated on the glorious Succeſs of his Arms, but much more on the Miracles Heaven wrought in his favour. But without inſiſting on the wonders his Hiſtory abounds with, I ſhall content my ſelf with giving him this Commendation: His Merits made him to be equally feared by his Neighbours, beloved by his Subjects, and reſpected by the greateſt Princes in Europe (2). The Emperor Otho, and Hugh the Great his Brothers-in-law, gave him frequent demonſtrations of their Eſteem, by making him conſiderable Preſents. The noble Matches he made for thoſe of his Siſters who preferred the Marriage-ſtate to a Cloyſter, are clear Evidences of his great Reputation in the World. His Siſter Ogina, Widow of Charles the Simple, King of France, being obliged to fly for refuge into England with her Son Lewis, who from thence had the Sirname of Outremer, he gave them an honourable Reception and furniſhed them with all things neceſſary during their Exile. It is even affirmed, his Application and Credit did not a little contribute to the reſtoring the King his Nephew to the Throne of his Anceſtors. Tho' he ſeemed to be intirely engroſſed by military Affairs, he found time however to cauſe Juſtice and Civil Government to flouriſh in his Dominions; witneſs the excellent Laws he from time to time added to thoſe of Alfred his Grandfather. It appears from theſe Laws, ſeveral whereof are ſtill extant, that his Intent was, all Perſons, Eccleſiaſtical as well as Civil, ſhould be ſubject to them. He was no Friend to thoſe Privileges and Immunities, the Clergy have ſo much improved, and which very often ſerve only to authorize Wickedneſs, and prove a Sanctuary to Criminals.

His Character. Malmſb. Ingulph.

Amongſt all the Monuments of his Piety, which for the moſt part conſiſted only in building and endowing Monaſteries, according to the Cuſtom of thoſe Days, the Tranſlation of the Scriptures into Saxon, the then vulgar Tongue, is one, the Uſefulneſs whereof appears to be leaſt dubious. He took particular care to have it well done, employing thoſe that were deemed the moſt learned Perſons in the Kingdom. Hence it is evident, how much the State of Learning had been improved by the wiſe regulations of the Great Alfred, ſince in his time it would have been impoſſible to find any Engliſhman capable of undertaking a Work of that nature. He gets the Bible tranſlated into Saxon.

9. EDMUND I.

Edmund I.

ATHELSTAN left England in profound Tranquility. The Welſh paid their Tribute regularly. Anlaff, after his Defeat, was retired into Ireland, where he ſeemed to lay aſide all Thoughts of any further Projects; and the Danes remained in ſubjection. But as ſoon as this Prince was laid in his grave, theſe laſt prepared for a Revolt. Edmund's Youth made them hope, they ſhould at length be able to accompliſh their long projected Deſign of having a King of their own Nation, and throwing off the Engliſh Yoke. Anlaff having perfect Intelligence how they ſtood inclined, reſolved to make uſe of this Juncture to recover the Crown of Northumberland. But as he was ſenſible this grand Undertaking could not be executed without a foreign Aid, he found means to perſuade Olaus, King of Norway, to eſpouſe his Cauſe, who promiſed to aſſiſt him to the utmoſt of his power. With the Troops lent him by this Prince, he once more entered Northumberland, and appearing before York, the Gates were opened to him, by means of the good underſtanding between him and the principal Inhabitants. The Example of the Metropolis was followed by moſt of the other Towns, whoſe Garriſons were either expelled, or cut in pieces by the Citizens, who were generally of Daniſh race. Anlaff, not content with being maſter of Northumberland, marched into Mercia (3), where his Countrymen received him with open Arms, and aſſiſted him in recovering ſeveral places which Edward the Elder had formerly taken from them.

and makes great Progreſs.

942. Tho' Edmund was not above ſeventeen or eighteen Years of age, the Progreſs of the Enemy was ſo far from daunting him, that it rather made him more eager to decide by a Battle, to whom a Country, ſo often and ſo long contended for, ſhould belong. As ſoon as he had drawn all his Forces together, he reſolutely marched towards the North, though he well knew the Superiority of his Enemy. On the other hand, Anlaff hearing Edmund was advancing with long Marches to give him Battle, went to meet him with the ſame Reſolution. The two Armies meeting near Cheſter (4), came to an Engagement, wherein Victory held the Balance ſo even, that when Night came, neither could boaſt the leaſt Advantage. Both Sides prepared to renew the Fight as ſoon as Day ſhould appear. But the Archbiſhops of Canterbury and York (5), who were in the two Armies, laboured ſo earneſtly to make Peace, that a Treaty was begun that very Evening, and concluded by break of Day. This Peace was the more eaſily made, as neither of the Parties could inſiſt upon any Advantage gained in that Day's Action, ſince neither of them could know either their own or the Enemy's Loſs. By this Treaty, Edmund was obliged to deliver up to the Danes all the Country lying North of the Roman High-way, called Watlingſtreet, which divided England into almoſt two equal parts, running from North Wales to the moſt ſouthern parts of Kent, quite to the Sea. Edmund was not at all pleaſed with theſe Terms, but was in a manner forced to accept them by the Nobles that were in his Army. The Lords, weighing the hopes of recovering what was loſt, with the Apprehenſion of being ſtill greater Loſers, judged it better to end the War on theſe Conditions, than continue it with the Hazard of what might happen. Doubtleſs the Remembrance of the Calamities England was formerly expoſed to, made them the more willing to come to this Reſolution. Accordingly, Anlaff was put in poſſeſſion of the Kingdom of Northumberland, whoſe Bounds by this Treaty were enlarged with ſeveral Counties which his Father Sithric had never enjoyed. Edmund and Anlaff divide England between them.

A doubtful Battle produces a Peace.

S. Dunelm. Hoved.

The Northumbrian Danes had not reaſon long to rejoice at the Reſtoration of Anlaff, which they had ſo ardently deſired. This Prince having contracted a large Debt with the King of Norway for the Troops he had lent him, was willing to pay it. To this end, he laid heavy Taxes on the People, by which he forfeited their Affection. The Inhabitants of the ancient Kingdom of Deïra were the firſt that revolted, and having ſent for Reginald, his Brother Godfrid's Son, crowned him King at York. Reginald was no ſooner on the Throne, but he made Preparations for the War againſt his Uncle, who was alſo preparing to diſpoſſeſs him. The Quarrel between theſe two Kings, put Edmund upon marching towards the North, at the head of an Army, as well to improve the preſent Opportunity, if there was any Appearance of Succeſs, as to appeaſe the Troubles there, being apprehenſive they might give occaſion to the foreign Danes to return into England. He arrived upon the Borders of Northumberland when the Uncle and Nephew, wholly intent upon their private Quarrel, thought of nothing leſs than repulſing the Engliſh. Probably, he might with eaſe have made himſelf maſter of that Kingdom; however, he was ſatisfied with procuring Peace between the two Kings, in ſuch a manner that Reginald was to keep the Crown he had lately received. 944. Diviſions in Northumberland. This forced Peace laſted not long, Edmund was hardly return'd into Weſſex, when the two Daniſh Princes took up Arms with one Conſent to free themſelves from his Yoke, having engaged the Mercian Danes and the King of Cumberland to eſpouſe their Quarrel. Whereupon, Edmund immediately marched into Mercia, and before the Danes there could be joined by the Northumbrians, took from them Leiceſter, Stafford, Derby, Nottingham, and ſome other Places of leſs Note. Then advancing with the ſame Expedition towards Northumberland, he ſurprized the two Kings before they had drawn their Forces together. This ſudden Attack threw the Northumbrians into ſuch diſorder, that the two Kings fearing to fall into the hands of Edmund, believed it their only Refuge to abandon the Iſland, where they could not poſſibly remain in Safety, ſo cloſely were they purſued. Their Flight depriving the Danes of all Hopes of withſtanding Edmund, they threw down their Arms, and ſwore Allegiance.

945. Edmund ſubdues Cumberland and gives it to the King of Scotland. Sax. Ann. Jordan. l. 4. c. 24.

Before he returned to Weſſex, Edmund reſolved to puniſh the King of Cumberland, who, without Cauſe, had ſided with the Danes. He eaſily ſubdued that little Kingdom, whoſe Forces bore no Proportion to his. However, he kept it not for himſelf, but thought it more for his Advantage to preſent it to the King of Scotland, in order to attach him to his Intereſt, and prevent him from aſſiſting the Northumbrians (1). However, he reſerved the Sovereignty of it, and obliged that Prince to do him Homage, and appear at the King of England's Court, at the time of the ſolemn Feſtivals, if ſummoned. This perhaps is what gave occaſion to ſay, that from thenceforward the Kings of Scotland were Vaſſals to the Kings of England. They were certainly ſo with regard to Cumberland; but it does not follow from hence they did Homage for the Kingdom of Scotland.

Edmund's Succeſſes, his Valour and Abilities, rendered him famous both at Home and Abroad. The King of Denmark, though frequently ſollicited by the Danes in England, did not think proper to aſſiſt them againſt a Prince of ſo great Reputation, and from whom there was ſo little to be got.

Edmund was not wholly employed in military Affairs; there are ſome of his Laws ſtill in being, which demonſtrate how deſirous he was of his People's Welfare and Happineſs. Having obſerved, Pecuniary Puniſhments were not ſufficient to put a ſtop to Robberies, which were generally committed by People who had nothing to loſe, he ordered, that in Gangs of Robbers, the oldeſt of them ſhould be condemned to the Gallows. This was the firſt Law in England that made it Death to rob or ſteal.

The Laws of Edmund. Brompton.

Probably this Prince would have render'd his People happy, had his Reign been longer; but a fatal Accident robbed him of his Life, when he began to enjoy the Fruits of his Victories. One day, as he was ſolemnizing a Feſtival (2) at Pucklekirk in Glouceſterſhire (3), he ſpied Leolf, a notorious Robber, who, though baniſhed the Kingdom for his Crimes, had the Impudence to come and ſit at one of the Tables in the Hall where the King was at Dinner. Enraged at his Inſolence, he commanded him to be apprehended (4). But perceiving he was drawing his Dagger to defend himſelf, the King leap'd up in great Fury, and catching hold of him by the Hair, dragged him out of the Hall. This imprudent Action coſt him his Life. Whilſt he was wholly intent upon venting his furious Paſſion, Leolf ſtabbed him in the Breaſt with his Dagger, ſo that he immediately expired upon the Body of his Murderer. This was the tragical End of King Edmund in 948, in the twenty-fifth Year of his Age, and the eighth of his Reign (5). By Elgiva his Wife he had two Sons, Edwy and Edgar, who did not ſucceed him by reaſon of their Minority. Edred his Brother was placed on the Throne by the unanimous Conſent of the Clergy and Nobility (6).

10. EDRED.

EDRED. War of Northumberland.

THE Northumbrian Danes bore the Engliſh Yoke with extreme Impatience. Nothing but Force was ſufficient to keep them in Subjection. Whenever they thought they had a favourable Opportunity to revolt, they ſeldom failed to embrace it. Though during Edmund's Reign they had been very ſucceſsful, yet upon news of his Death they began to think of Means to recover their Liberty. They hoped his Succeſſor, whom as yet they knew not, would not have his Bravery, or at leaſt wanting his Experience, would not have the ſame Advantage over them. The better to execute their Deſigns, they gained to their Side Malcolm King of Scotland, who looked upon all Obligations to be cancell'd by the Death of Edmund. This Prince, as well as the Danes, was perſuaded, Edred, by reaſon of his Youth, would be ſo embaraſſed at this unexpected Attack, that it would not be poſſible for him to make any Reſiſtance. But the Succeſs was not anſwerable to their Expectations, Edred, not being inferior to his Predeceſſor, either in Conduct or Courage, was ſo very expeditious, that he was in the Heart of Northumberland, before the Danes were ready to oppoſe him. They were extremely ſurprized to find themſelves thus attacked, when as yet they had hardly diſcovered their Intention to revolt. However, as Edred was in the midſt of their Country, they were forced to ſubmit and ſue for Peace upon what Terms he pleaſed (7).

After having chaſtized the Danes, by fining ſome, and puniſhing others of the principal Authors of the Revolt, Edred advanced towards Scotland, to be revenged of the ungrateful Malcolm. But Malcolm ſeeing the Northumbrians ſubdued, and himſelf deſtitute of Aſſiſtance from that Quarter, concluded a Peace with Edred, paying him the Homage due to him.

This Expedition being ended, Edred returned into Weſſex, imagining he had nothing more to fear from the North. But he was unacquainted with the Danes. He had ſcarce begun to enjoy ſome Repoſe, when they revolted again and recalled Anlaff. Their Meaſures were ſo juſt, and Anlaff's Expedition ſo great, that he made himſelf Maſter of the moſt conſiderable Places before Edred could draw his Army together. Whilſt he was preparing to ſave Northumberland, Anlaff continued his Conqueſts and put his Affairs in ſuch condition, that his Enemy ſaw no Poſſibility of recovering that Kingdom out of his hands. But the turbulent and tyrannical Temper of the new King would not ſuffer him to treat his Subjects more gently than formerly. In a little time ſo ſtrong a Party was formed againſt him, that he was forced once more to retire to Ireland, and one Eric was placed on the Throne.

Pardon,

Pardon, after ſo notorious an Abuſe of the firſt, yet as they had no Refuge left, they caſt themſelves upon Edred's Mercy, and amuſed him with the ſtrongeſt Proteſtations and moſt ſolemn Oaths. As this Prince was naturally of a generous Diſpoſition, he was moved with their ſubmiſſive Behaviour, and replaced Eric on the Throne, ſatisfied with impoſing a Tribute, and making him ſwear Allegiance, when he had, as he thought, allayed theſe Commotions, and he returned towards Weſſex, marching in a careleſs manner, not miſtruſting any Treachery from a People that had juſt received ſuch ſenſible Marks of his Clemency. But the Danes, who had been rather compelled by his Arms than gained by his Mildneſs, laid hold of the preſent Opportunity to attack him with Advantage. They privately came together, and laying an Ambuſh in his way, ſuddenly fell upon his Rear, and put them in extreme Diſorder. Had it not been for the Valour, Conduct, and Reſolution of the King, his Army had infallibly been cut in pieces; and it was not without great difficulty, that he eſcaped the preſent Danger. Enraged at their Perfidiouſneſs, he returned to Northumberland, with a Reſolution to puniſh them without Mercy. His Return cauſed an univerſal Conſternation. They beheld him ready to take Vengeance on them for their Breach of Faith, without being able to make the leaſt Reſiſtance. Their Ruin was unavoidable, if they offered to defend themſelves. In this Extremity, Submiſſion was their only Refuge (1). But being very ſenſible Edred would not be impoſed upon any more by general Proteſtations and Oaths, they humbly implored his Pardon upon what Terms he ſhould pleaſe to enjoin them. And to convince him further of their Sincerity, they ſolemnly renounced their Allegiance to Eric, and put Amac, Son of Anlaff, to death; charging them with being the principal Authors of their Treachery (2). Edred was appeaſed by theſe Submiſſions. However, to prevent the like Revolts, he ſecured all their Towns, and garriſon'd them with Engliſh. After that, having entirely diveſted it of its Royalty, he reduced Northumberland to a Province, and made Earl Oſulf, an Engliſhman, the firſt Governor. From thenceforward the Northumbrians, kept in awe by ſtrong Garriſons and the Engliſh Earls or Governors, gave England no further Diſturbance, till ſuch time as the foreign Danes once more became Maſters of Northumberland, as we ſhall ſee hereafter.

After the Northumbrians were thus quelled, Edred lived in profound Peace. Abſolute Lord of all England, and dreaded by the Kings of Scotland and Wales his Neighbours, he governed his Dominions in perfect Tranquillity. This great Calm was the Occaſion of his turning his Thoughts entirely to religious Affairs, being guided by the Advice of Dunſtan Abbot of Glaſſenbury, who had great Influence over him. The Abbot knew ſo well how to improve his Credit with the King, that he became Maſter of his Conſcience, and conſequently of all State-Matters. When once a Prince ſuffers his Conſcience to be governed by his Ghoſtly Father, he will find it very difficult to with-hold from him the Management of his temporal Concerns, there being hardly any one thing but what may be made to relate to Religion in ſome reſpect or other. The Truſt Edred placed in Dunſtan was ſo great, that not content with being adviſed by him in all things, and making him Treaſurer, he ſubmitted ſometimes even to receive Diſcipline from his Hands. He was perſuaded, this blind Submiſſion to Dunſtan was the readieſt way to Heaven. To gratify this Favourite it was that he undertook the rebuilding of Glaſſenbury Church and Monaſtery, in a very ſumptuous and magnificent manner. He laid out immenſe Sums upon this Work, without having the Satisfaction however to ſee it finiſhed (3).

Dunſtan's great Credit.

The Monks made uſe alſo of Dunſtan their Protector's Intereſt, to get into the Eccleſiaſtical Benefices, which they conld never have done without him. Though Dunſtan's Proceedings in this Affair raiſed the Clamours of the ſecular Clergy, he gave himſelf no trouble about them ſo long as he could obtain his Ends. However, his haughty manner of acting procured him many Enemies, who in the following Reign made him feel the Effects of their Hatred, which they had taken care to conceal during Edred's Life. If Dunſtan favoured the Monks, they were no leſs zealous upon all Occaſions to promote his Glory. They every where proclaimed that Dunſtan was a great Saint, that Heaven daily wrought Miracles in his favour, and that he was frequently honoured with divine Revelations. In their Account, neither the Saints of the firſt Rank, nor the Apoſtles themſelves, were Partakers of ſo many Graces as he. Though all they ſaid of this Prelate was aggravated to the laſt degree, it failed not however to make impreſſion on the Minds of the generality of the People, who were more eaſily confirmed in their Belief of what they were told; as they who knew better things, durſt not contradict the Monks, for fear of incurring the Diſpleaſure of the King and his Favourite.

He introduces the Monks into the Benefices.

They proclaim Dunſtan's Sanctity.

Had Edred lived any time, Dunſtan and the Monks would doubtleſs have carried all before them. But this Prince died when the Monks were but juſt beginning to creep into the Benefices. Thoſe Hiſtorians who have made it their buſineſs to extol the Merits and Sanctity of Dunſtan, tell us, that Edred's Death was revealed to him by a Voice from Heaven, as he was coming to ſee him. They add, his Horſe fell down dead under him, at the prodigious Noiſe the Voice made (4). But judicious Authors have taken care not to ſtuff their Writings with Tales of this nature.

955. Edred's Death.

Edred reigned but ten Years (5). Elfrid and Bedfrid, his two Sons, whom he left very young, did not ſucceed him. His Nephew Edwy, Son of Edmund his elder Brother, was placed on the Throne after him. This Election, by the way, ſeems equally to favour thoſe who are of Opinion, that in the Saxon Times the Succeſſion to the Crown depended entirely on the Suffrages of the Clergy and Nobility, and thoſe who maintain it belonged of right to the next Heir. On one hand, we find Edred's Sons deprived by the great Men of the King their Father's Inheritance, and, at the ſame time, the Crown given to the Son of the elder Brother, in prejudice of thoſe of the younger.

Edwy his Nephew ſucceeds him.

We find in one of Edred's Charters, that he took the Title of Monarch of Albion; and in another, that he ſtiled himſelf King of Great Britain (6), in which he was followed by Edgar his Nephew. If theſe Charters were not forged, it may be inferred from thence, that Edred ſubdued Scotland. But this is no proper place to examine this matter, which has cauſed ſuch warm Diſputes between the Engliſh and Scots. However this be, the Title Edred and Edgar affected to uſe, was neglected by their Succeſſors, till the time of James I. about the End of the ſixteenth Century.

955. EDWY. Dunſtan's Diſgrace.

EDWY (7) came to the Crown at fourteen Years of age, with very different Notions of Dunſtan from thoſe of his Predeceſſor. Whether he was prepoſſeſſed by the Enemies of that Miniſter, or had ſome particular Cauſe of Complaint againſt him, he was no ſooner on the Throne, but he ordered him to give an account of the Sums the late King had entruſted him with. Dunſtan replied, the Money that had paſſed thro' his Hands, having been laid out in pious Uſes, he was not accountable for an Adminiſtration ſolely relating to Religion. As he urged the building of Glaſſenbury, which the late King had ſo much at heart, Edwy's Council thought it not proper to puſh the Affair any farther, leſt the People ſhould eſpouſe the Abbot's Cauſe. The founding and repairing of Monaſteries were at that time ſuch ſacred things, that there was no ſpeaking againſt them, without being branded with the Name of impious and prophane. And therefore the King's Council finding there was no attacking Dunſtan on that head, without running ſome risk, took another Courſe to undermine his Credit, which was to reverſe whatever had been done in favour of the Monks. Accordingly, the Monks were turned out of their Benefices, and the ſecular Prieſts put in their room. By this notable Proceeding, three things were intended: Firſt, to mortify Dunſtan, which it muſt do in a very ſenſible manner. Secondly, to leſſen the People's Eſteem for him, ſince the pulling down what he had ſet up, was a clear Evidence, the Court had no very great Opinion of his Sanctity. Beſides, the reſtoring the Benefices to the ſecular Clergy, plainly intimated it was wrong to diſpoſſeſs them. Laſtly, as Dunſtan and the Monks were in ſtrict Union. Their Diſgrace could not but reflect upon him. The Perſecutions of the moſt cruel Tyrants againſt the Church, never extorted from the primitive Chriſtians ſuch bitter Invectives, as this pretended Perſecution did from the Monks. As they repreſent the Matter, Religion was never in ſo great danger. The moſt pernicious Hereſies were nothing in compariſon of what was then acted. The Monks of Malmsbury, who were the moſt concerned, made the greateſt Noiſe of all, and for that reaſon were turned out of their Monaſtery, which was given to the ſecular Prieſts. William of Malmsbury upon this occaſion ſays, that after it had been inhabited by Monks two hundred and ſeventy Years, it was made a Stable of Clerks (1) Whether Dunſtan ſtirred up the Monks to make theſe Complaints, or the charging him with it was made a Pretence to puniſh him, he was baniſhed the Kingdom. Some ſay he voluntarily went into Exile, without any previous Condemnation. However this be, he retired to a Monaſtery in Flanders (2), where he lived in expectation of being recalled by ſome favourable turn of Affairs.

Dunſtan baniſh'd. Sax. Ann. S. Dunelm.

Dunſtan's Enemies gloried in his Diſgrace. The King himſelf was highly delighted with being freed from a Man whom he hated, and who, in the former Reign, had ſhown him Marks of Diſreſpect. But he ſoon learnt how dangerous ſuch kind of Enemies are. He found, by fatal Experience, there is no giving Offence to Eccleſiaſticks with Impunity, and to Saints leaſt of all others. The Monks, enraged to the laſt degree for the Loſs of their Benefices, cried down, to the utmoſt of their power, the Adminiſtration of the young King, whom they looked upon as the principal Author of their Diſgrace. By their Lies and Calumnies which they every where ſpread, they at length perſuaded their Votaries, he was the moſt impious of Men. The Conſequence of which was, that great Numbers of Malecontents appeared in Mercia, of whom Edgar, the King's Brother, was declared Head and Protector. Perhaps he was made to believe, by the Suggeſtions of the Monks, that he would do God ſervice in depoſing his wicked Brother: Or rather he uſed that Pretence to mount the Throne, of which he had yet but a very diſtant Proſpect. However this be, having ſecured Mercia, he went into Northumberland and Eaſt-Anglia, where he found the Danes ready to join him. They deſired nothing more than to ſee the Engliſh involved in Trouble and Confuſion. This Inſurrection was the more ſurpriſing to Edwy, as he had never given his People, much leſs his Brother, any juſt Cauſe of Complaint. Beſides, he never imagined the Monks could have Intereſt enough to raiſe ſo great Diſturbances. However, it was but too true, and as he was taken unprepared, he was not in condition to extinguiſh the Flame already kindled. In this Extremity, not knowing how to recover what he had loſt, he choſe to reduce himſelf to the ſole Kingdom of Weſſex, which continued faithful to him, and deliver up all the reſt.

In the mean time, the Rebels dreading to fall again under the Dominion of Edwy, came to a reſolution of having a King of their own, whoſe Intereſt would oblige him to protect and defend them. But as they were a mixture of Engliſh and Danes, each Nation was deſirous the Choice ſhould fall on one of their Conntrymen. The Danes, to attain their Ends endeavoured to make it be believed, that the only way to be ſafe from Edwy's Attacks, was to call in the Aſſiſtance of Denmark. But in truth, their Aim was only to carry the Election. The Engliſh, on the contrary, perceiving their Intent, did all they could to haſten the Election, repreſenting how fatal their preſent State of Anarchy might prove. But the more forward the Engliſh appeared to be, the more full of Delays were the Danes, who daily raiſed freſh Obſtacles, in hopes there would be a Neceſſity at laſt of ſending for Aid from Denmark. At length, after a year ſpent in Debates, Edwy making no Efforts for the Recovery of his Dominions, and conſequently the Aſſiſtance of Denmark becoming unneceſſary, Prince Edgar was choſen with the Title of King of Mercia, by which was meant all the Country lying North of the Thames, except the ancient Kingdom of Eſſex. To heighten the Merit of the new King, it was given out, that whilſt the great Men were deliberating on the Choice of a King, a Voice was heard from Heaven, commanding them to elect Edgar. The Revelation was eaſily ſwallowed by the People, at a time when it was the general Opinion, that every the leaſt remarkable Event was attended by ſome Miracle.

THIS Partition of England laſted not long. The being deprived of the Kingdom of Mercia, and the ſeeing the Monks triumphing over his Misfortunes, ſat ſo heavy upon Edwy's Mind, that he fell into an exceſs of Melancholy, which brought him to his Grave, after he had reigned four Years and ſome Months (3).

Vit. Dunſtan. Malmsb. l. 2. c. 7.

If we believe the Monkiſh Writers, Edwy was a very wicked Prince. Indeed, how was it poſſible for a King that did not pleaſe them, to be reckoned otherwiſe? However, when we examine all they ſay to blacken his Reputation, we find but One thing which can have any foundation, and which after all has very much the Air of a Fiction, or at leaſt, is greatly aggravated. They ſay, he kept the Wife of one of his Courtiers for his Miſtreſs, and on the very Day of the Coronation, whilſt the great Men were debating the Affairs of the Kingdom, he abruptly withdrew to the Apartment of this Woman, from whence he was brought back by Dunſtan, who alone had the Boldneſs to reprimand him for this infamous Action (4). From that time, if we may believe them, the King and his Miſtreſs were ſo incenſed againſt this holy Man, that they would have proceeded to the taking away his Life, had he not prevented their wicked Deſign by voluntary Exile. But to give ſtill a more convincing Proof of the Diſſoluteneſs of Edwy, and the Holineſs of Dunſtan, they have vented a Thing which plainly ſhows what ſpirit they were of. They ſay, after Edwy's death, his Soul being dragged into Hell by a Legion of Devils, one of them was diſpatched with the good News to Dunſtan. But far from rejoicing at it, the Saint prayed ſo intenſely for the Soul that was going to be eternally miſerable, that God, moved by his Zeal, ſnatched it from the Devils, and tranſlated it into Paradiſe. This laſt Inſtance of the Animoſity of the Monks againſt Edwy, renders their charge of Adultery very ſuſpicious, eſpecially if we conſider he was not above fourteen Years of Age when he aſcended the Throne. Moreover, there are Hiſtorians who aſſure us, this pretended Miſtreſs was his lawful Wife (5). However this be, we may be certain Edwy might have had one or more Miſtreſſes, without all that Clamour againſt him, had he been a Favourer of the Monks. For they were not at all offended at the Amours of his Brother Edgar, who was much more guilty than he in that reſpect. But the one was their Friend, and the other their Enemy. All Hiſtorians however have not been guilty of this Injuſtice to Edwy. Some have been more favourable to him, either paſſing over in ſilence theſe frivolous Accuſations, or giving him the Commendation he deſerved (6).

957. Qualities of Edgar. Sax. Ann. Malmsb.

EDWY dying without Iſſue, his Brother Edgar ſucceeded him, and united the two Kingdoms that were lately divided. Though he was not above ſixteen Years old, his great Genius and ſolid Judgment rendered him more capable of governing than many other Princes of a more advanced Age. It cannot be denied, there are ſome Men born with ſo good natural Parts, that their Judgment is ripe before the uſual time. Edgar was one of this Number. If he had given proof of his Ability in depriving his Brother of the Half of his Kingdom, he continued to do the ſame when he came to reign alone. He knew how to make himſelf obeyed by his Subjects, and feared by his Enemies, two things that undoubtedly demonſtrate the great Capacity of a crowned Head.

Sax. Ann. The firſt thing Edgar did, after he was elected King of Mercia, was to recall Dunſtan from Baniſhment, and promote him to the See of Worceſter, then vacant (1). The Suddenneſs wherewith this Prelate was recalled, gives room to ſuſpect, he was, though abſent, concerned in the Inſurrection that placed Edgar on the Throne of Mercia. His great Intereſt at Court during this Prince's Reign, ſtrengthens this Suſpicion.

Edgar's great Preparations procured him a conſtant Peace. The Reign of Edgar is chiefly remarkable for the continual Peace the Kingdom enjoyed; from whence he was ſirnamed the Peaceable. This uninterrupted Calm was owing neither to his Victories nor Slothfulneſs, but to his extraordinary Preparations for his Defence, in caſe he ſhould ever be engaged in a War. By this means he became ſo formidable, that no one durſt venture to attack him. He always kept a ſtanding Army in the northern Provinces, as well for a Terror to the Kings of Scotland and Wales, as to keep in awe his own Subjects, particularly the Danes. This Precaution was ſo much the more neceſſary, as he was very ſenſible they were always ready to take advantage of any Troubles and Commotions in the State. His own Experience had taught him ſo much, ſince by their Aſſiſtance it was, that he triumphed over his Brother. On the other hand, to prevent the Invaſions of the foreign Danes, who were no leſs to be feared, he took the moſt effectual Method. He is ſaid to have fitted out, great and ſmall, four thouſand Ships. Some have even raiſed the Number to four thouſand eight hundred (2). It is probable, this thing has been very much magnified: However, it ſhews at leaſt the number of his Ships was extraordinary. This numerous Fleet, being diſtributed in all the Ports of the Kingdom, and cruiſing inceſſantly round the Iſland, made the Pyrates beware of making Deſcents, and ſuffered no Ship to come upon the Coaſt unexamined. Theſe Precautions produced the Effect intended by Edgar. They prevented Invaſions from abroad, and kept all quiet at home, by cutting off all Hopes of foreign Aſſiſtance. With ſuch an Army and Fleet, this Prince, without once drawing his Sword, obliged the Kings of Wales, Ireland, and the Iſle of Man, to ſwear Allegiance to him, and acknowledge him for Sovereign. As a Proof of his Superiority over the Kings his Neighbours, the Engliſh Hiſtorians relate a very extraordinary Fact, which, if true, fully make good what they aſſert. They tell us this Prince keeping his Court at Cheſter, and having a mind to go by Water to the Monaſtery of St. John Baptiſt, was rowed down the Dee in a Barge by eight Kings, himſelf ſitting at the Helm (3).

961. He frees England from Wolves. Brompt.

Edgar, not content with having ſecured England from all foreign Aſſaults, thought it neceſſary, for the further repoſe of his Subjects, to free them from two domeſtick Plagues, by which they were infeſted. The one was a horrible multitude of Wolves, which coming down in droves from the Mountains in Wales, made ſuch a terrible Havock among their Flocks and Herds, that the Country was in a continual Alarm. Hitherto they could find no Remedy for this Evil: but Edgar bethought himſelf of an Expedient, which quickly cleared the Country of them. In the firſt place he converted the Tribute of Gold, Silver, and Cattle, paid him yearly by the Welſh, into three hundred Wolves-Heads. In the next place he publiſhed throughout all England, a general Pardon for all paſt Offences on condition each Criminal brought him by ſuch a time a certain number of Wolves-Tongues, in proportion to his Crimes. Upon publiſhing this Act of Grace, the Wolves were hunted and deſtroyed in ſuch a manner, that in three Years there was not one left in the Kingdom.

Edgar's Severity to corrupt Magiſtrates. Malmsb. S. Dunelm.

The other Plague that infeſted England was no leſs grievous, it was another ſort of Wolves, who, not ſatisfied with eating up Flocks and Herds, devoured Houſes and Families. I mean the Magiſtrates appointed in the Cities and Provinces to adminiſter Juſtice to the People. Theſe mercenary Judges, abuſing the exorbitant Power Edgar's Predeceſſors had ſuffered them to uſurp during the Wars, were become intolerable to the Nation. Without any regard to Law or Juſtice, they conſulted only their own Intereſt. They who made them the largeſt Preſents, were ſure to be favoured; and though by that means the Poor were moſt oppreſſed, the Rich were not entirely ſcreened from their partial Proceedings. Alfred the Great endeavoured, by an extraordinary Act of Severity, to put a ſtop to this Evil; but the enſuing Wars prevented his Succeſſors from executing his Laws. Edgar, undertaking to reform this Abuſe, ſet about it himſelf with great application. To this end he took a Progreſs every Year through ſome part of the Kingdom, on purpoſe to hear the Complaints that were made againſt thoſe Judges who abuſed their Authority. He was not ſatisfied with inſpecting himſelf into their Miſdemeanors, but thought it farther neceſſary to redreſs them for the future, by making a Law, that every Judge convicted of giving Sentence contrary to the Laws, ſhould be fined twenty ſix Shillings (4), if he did it ignorantly; but if knowingly, ſhould be caſhiered for ever. It cannot be denied, that in this he acted as became a great Prince, and that Subjects, who enjoy the double Privilege, of being guarded againſt Invaſions from abroad, and Oppreſſion at home, are perfectly happy. Such is the State of the Engliſh at this Day under the preſent Government.

Ethelred Rievall. Lex. 8. apud Brompt.

Proof of Edgar's being thought a courageous Prince. Malmsb. l. 2. c. 8.

If Edgar was a Lover of Peace, it was not for want of Courage; That was never laid to his Charge. There is a Story related of him, which, though it has the Air of a Fiction, proves at leaſt, he was reckoned a courageous Prince. It is ſaid, that being informed, Keneth III. King of Scotland had jeſted on the Littleneſs of his Stature, he ſent for him to Court, and walking with him in a certain Place where he had ordered two Swords to be hid, he bid him take his Choice, telling him withal, he ſhould ſee if he pleaſed, what a little Man could do. Keneth, as the Story goes, was ſo far from accepting the Challenge, that he threw himſelf at his Feet and begged his Pardon. I obſerve this Relation is very improbable. In the firſt place, it is generally referred to the Beginning of Edgar's Reign; whereas Keneth III came not to the Crown of Scotland till five or ſix Years before that Prince's Death. In the ſecond place, the Character the Scotch Hiſtorians give Keneth, will not ſuffer us to think him capable of ſuch a piece of Cowardice. Laſtly, this Adventure ſeems to have been confounded with one of the ſame nature, between a King of Scotland, and one of the Lords of his Court, related by Buchanan.

Edgar's Attachment to the Monks contributed to his great Fame. Malmsb. Ingulph. S. Dunelm.

Edgar's noble Qualities, and the Tranquility England enjoyed during his Reign, render him, no doubt, very praiſe-worthy. But perhaps they would have been buried in eternal Oblivion, had not his extraordinary Attachment to the Monks engaged them to proclaim his Praiſes, even to an extravagant degree. His Bigotry to them, which paſs'd then for the moſt ſublime Virtue, was the principal reaſon of the Commendations given him by Hiſtorians, and of his being honoured with the Title of Saint after his Death. He is ſaid to have founded forty Monaſteries (5), and repaired and beautified many more, particularly that of Glaſſenbury built by his Uncle Edred. In ſhort, he was ſo very liberal to the Monks, that it was hardly in his power to do more for them than he did. Ingulphus, in his Hiſtory of the Abby of Croyland (6) ſays, that in the Reign of Edgar, the Treaſure of that Monaſtery amounted to ten Edgar forms the Scheme of replacing the Monks in the Benefices. Sax. Ann.

Edgar, not content with being thus liberal to the Monks, undertook to put them in poſſeſſion again of the Eccleſiaſtical Benefices, which he performed with a high hand. Dunſtan, whom he had made Archbiſhop of Canterbury, was the principal Author of this Project. This Prelate was ſo much in his Favour, that Edred's Affection to him was nothing in compariſon of Edgar's. As he made a very conſiderable Figure both in this and the following Reign, it will not be improper to take a nearer View of him. Beſides he paſſed for a Saint of the firſt Claſs, and nothing can be added to the Praiſes beſtowed on him by Hiſtorians.

Dunſtan: An Account of him. Oſbern vit. Dunſt. Malmſb. G. Pontif. l. 1.

Dunſtan, Son of Herſtan, and Nephew of Athelm Archbiſhop of Canterbury, was born at Glaſſenbury in 925. He ſpent his youthful Years with his Uncle the Archbiſhop, who took care to have him inſtructed in all the Sciences, as far as that Age of Ignorance would permit. He excelled particularly in Muſic, Painting, and Engraving, in which he took great delight all his Life. As ſoon as he had finiſhed his Studies, the Archbiſhop recommended him to King Athelſtan, who ſent for him to Court, but however gave him no Preferment. The Author of his Life (1) pretends, the Courtiers envying his Virtue and Learning, maliciouſly repreſented him to the King as a diſſolute and ſcandalous Liver: Which the King believing, forbad him the Court, without examining the Truth. Some time after the Archbiſhop finding means to undeceive the King, Dunſtan was reſtored to Favour, and preſented with ſome Lands near Glaſſenbury. Here he ſpent ſeveral Years in Retirement, with certain devout Men, whom he had drawn thither, living with them a ſort of monaſtick Life. Glaſton or Glaſſenbury was anciently a ſmall Church, founded, according to the vulgar Opinion, by Joſeph of Arimathea, as hath been obſerved elſewhere. This Church having been deſtroyed, Devy Biſhop of St. David's built another in the ſame Place. This being alſo gone to ruin, was repaired by twelve Devout Perſons, who coming from Armorica, ſettled in this Place. Ina King of Weſſex, having pulled it down to the ground, raiſed a ſtately Church, and dedicated it to Chriſt, St. Peter, and St. Paul. Several Perſons famous for their Piety, moſt of them Iriſh, retired to this Church, where they were maintained by Edgar's Bounty. From that time there were always Devout Perſons, who made choice of this Place for their Retreat (2).

Glaſſenbury Church and Monaſtery.

Dunſtan made Abbot, Malmſb. l. 2. c. 8.

After Dunſtan had been ſome time at Glaſſenbury, Edmund, Succeſſor of Athelſtan, having conceived an Eſteem for him, built there a Monaſtery (3) and made him Abbot. As Dunſtan was a Perſon of great Addreſs, he knew how to manage this Prince ſo dexterouſly, that he was very much in Favour all his Reign. His Intereſt at Court ſtill encreaſed under Edred, to whom he was Prime Miniſter, Favourite and Father Confeſſor. Dunſtan's extreme fondneſs for a monaſtick Life, made him uſe, without any caution, all his Intereſt to reſtore the Monks to the Benefices and eject the Secular Prieſts, whom he heartily deſpiſed and at length mortally hated. This Attachment to the Monks, added to his haughty carriage, procured him abundance of Enemies, and drew upon him the Diſpleaſure of Eduy, Succeſſor of Edmund, as we have ſeen. The haſte Edgar was in to recall this Abbot from Flanders, is a clear Evidence, he was indebted to him for the Crown of Mercia. Upon Dunſtan's return to England, Edgar promoted him to the See of Worceſter. Some time after, the Biſhoprick of London being vacant, he was entruſted with the Management of it. This has led ſome Writers into the Miſtake, of imagining he was Biſhop of Worceſter and London at the ſame time. Edgar never ceaſed to give him freſh marks of his Eſteem; and his high conceit of him was the more confirmed by the Miracles attributed to him. The Monks took all imaginable care to ſpread the Fame of theſe Miracles every where, and were ſo very particular in their Circumſtances, that one muſt have been much freer from Prejudice than they generally were in thoſe Days, not to have believed them. It is however very unlikely, that Edgar himſelf, who was not of the number of thoſe weak People that ſuffer themſelves to be ſo eaſily deceived, was thoroughly convinced of the Truth of all thoſe Miracles. But perhaps he was of opinion, thoſe Pious Frauds were no detriment to Religion. Be this as it will, he had a very great opinion of Dunſtan's Sanctity. After Athelm's Death, Odo, by Birth a Dane, was made Archbiſhop of Canterbury, but lived not long after his Inſtallation. To him ſucceeded Elfin, who died as he was going to Rome for his Pall (4). This happening in the beginning of Edgar's Reign, Brithelm Biſhop of Bath was elected to the vacant See. But Edgar being deſirous of having Dunſtan Archbiſhop, called a general Council, where he repreſented Brithelm as unqualified for ſo great a Poſt; whereupon he was ordered to return to his old Dioceſe, and Dunſtan was choſen in his room. This Election not being exactly Canonical, it was thought fit Dunſtan ſhould go to Rome, on pretence of receiving his Pall, that he might at the ſame time juſtify theſe Proceedings. The Pope, who was not ignorant how great a Sway Dunſtan bore at the Court of England, and with what Zeal he had eſpouſed the Intereſt of the Church of Rome and the Monks, readily confirmed his Election, conſtituting him moreover his Legate for England, with a very extenſive Authority. At his Return, Oſwald his Relation was through his means made Biſhop of Worceſter, and Ethelwald his intimate Friend, of Wincheſter. Theſe three Prelates, by holding together intirely governed the Church during this Reign. Edgar committing to them the Management of all Eccleſiaſtical Affairs, was not contented with granting whatever they deſired, but even took a pleaſure in doing them Favours, unasked.

959. S. Dunelm. Dunſtan made Archbiſhop.

963. Sax. Ann. Oſwald is made Biſhop of Worceſter, and Ethelwald of Wincheſter.

As ſoon as Dunſtan ſaw his Credit firmly eſtabliſhed, he returned to his grand Project in favour of the Monks, which he had been forced to lay aſide during the Reign of Edwy. This Affair was not without its Difficulties. The great Men of the Nation look'd upon it as a Misfortune, that the guidance of the Churches ſhould be wreſted out of the Hands of the antient and lawful Governors. They were ſtill leſs pleaſed with its being committed to the Monks, who, by the Rules of their Order, and according to the Cuſtom hitherto obſerved, were excluded from the Paſtoral Functions, in order to employ themſelves wholly in Prayer within the Walls of their Monaſteries. Beſides, they were of opinion, that inſtead of encouraging and inriching the Monks, it would be much better to put a ſtop to the People's Zeal, who were perpetually bequeathing to them conſiderable Legacies, whereby Eſtates were paſſed away in Mortmain, to the great Prejudice of the Nation. It was eaſy therefore to ſee this Project would meet with great Oppoſition from the Nobles. But on the other hand, the People, who did not look ſo far before them, were intirely in the Intereſt of the Monks, and extremely offended at the ſcandalous Lives of the Secular Clergy, who applied the Revenues of the Church to uſes directly contrary to the intent of the Donors (5). It muſt be confeſt, the Clergy, at that time were very ill Livers, and that Pride, Avarice, Gluttony, Drunkenneſs, Luxury, openly reigned among them. Dunſtan and his Party did all that lay in their power to expoſe theſe Irregularities, in order to irritate the People againſt their Paſtors. They ſucceeded ſo well in their Deſign, that Multitudes eſpouſed the Cauſe of the Monks, purely out of contempt of the Secular Clergy. But what did the Monks moſt Service, was the King's being ſo vigorous a Champion for them. His good Opinion of them was ſtill increaſed by comparing them with the Seculars, who indeed obſerved no Meaſures in their Exceſſes. And therefore this Prince thought to do the Church ſignal ſervice in putting it under the Government of the Monks, whom he looked upon as ſo many Saints. Edgar being thus inclined, Dunſtan found no Difficulty to perſuade him to countenance a Reformation he believed ſo advantagious to the Church. To give the finiſhing ſtroke to this Work, he cauſed a Council to be aſſembled, in hopes their Authority, together with the King's, would ſurmount all Obſtacles. Edgar was pleaſed to aſſiſt in Perſon at this Council, and made a Speech, which plainly ſhowed how greatly he was prejudiced in their favour. As this Harangue manifeſtly diſcovers the Diſpoſition of the King, of Dunſtan, and of the other Directors of the Affairs of the Church, with regard to the Secular Clergy, it Edgar's Harangue to the Council. Ethelred. Rievallenſis, p. 360.

"Almighty God having vouchſafed of his infinite "Mercy to ſhew his Goodneſs to us in a remarkable "manner, 'tis moſt reaſonable, Reverend Fathers, we "ſhould exert our Endeavours to make a ſuitable Re- "turn. That we are in poſſeſſion of this plentiful "Country is not owing to any Strength of our own, "but to the help of his all-powerful Arm, who has "been pleaſed to manifeſt his Loving-kindneſs towards "us. 'Tis but juſt therefore we ſhould bring our ſelves, "our Souls, and Bodies, in Subjection to him, who has "ſubdued all things for us, and ſhould take care that "all that are under us ſhould be obedient to his Laws. "It is my Office, Reverend Fathers, to adminiſter "Juſtice without reſpect of Perſons; ſuppreſs the Re- "bellious; to puniſh the ſacrilegious; to protect the "Poor and Weak from the Hand of the Oppreſſor. "It is my Buſineſs alſo to take care that the Church "and her Miniſters, the holy Fraternities of the Reli- "gious, have all things neceſſary to their Subſiſtence and "well being. But it is your Duty to examine into "the Life and Converſation of the Clergy. To you it "belongs to ſee that they live agreeably to their Pro- "feſſion: That they are ſober, temperate, chaſte, hoſ- "pitable to the Poor and the Stranger: That they are "careful in the Adminiſtration of their Office, conſtant "in their Inſtructions to the People. In a word, that "they are worthy of the glorious Character of the Mi- "niſters of Jeſus Chriſt. With ſubmiſſion be it ſpoken, "Reverend Fathers, had you taken due care of theſe "things, I ſhould not have had the Diſſatisfaction of "hearing from all hands the enormous Crimes daily "committed by the Clergy of this Land. I inſiſt not "on the Smallneſs of their Tonſure, contrary to the "Canons of the Church, or their Effeminacy in their "Habits, or their Haughtineſs in their Geſtures, or their "immodeſt Diſcourſes, which plainly ſhew all is not right "within. I omit their Negligence with regard to Di- "vine Service: Hardly will they vouchſafe their Com- "pany at the publick Prayers, and when they come to "Church to celebrate the Holy Myſteries, one would think "they were going to act a Play. But the chief Subject of "my Complaint, I ſpeak it with extreme Regret, is what "miniſters occaſion of Grief to the Good, and of Joy to "the Prophane, I mean the lewd and ſcandalous Lives of "the Clergy. They ſpend their Days in Diverſions, En- "tertainments, Drunkenneſs and Debauchery. Their "Houſes may be ſaid to be ſo many Sinks of Lewdneſs, "Publick Stages, and Receptacles of Libertines. There "they have Gaming, Dancing and obſcene Singing. There "they paſs the Night in Rioting and Drunkenneſs. 'Tis "thus, Reverend Fathers, 'tis thus the Bounty of my Pre- "deceſſors to the Church, and their Charities for the "Maintenance of the Poor, and what is more the ado- "rable Blood of our Saviour, are conſumed. Was it for "this that our Anceſtors exhauſted their Treaſures; Was "it for this they were ſo liberal of their Eſtates? Was it "to deck the Concubines of their Prieſts, to provide for "them ſplendid Entertainments, to furniſh them with "Dogs and Hawks, that our Foreſathers diſplay'd their "Munificence to the Church? Theſe are the Crimes "which the People complain of in private, and the Sol- "diers in publick; which are ſung in the Streets, and "acted on the Stage; and yet they are forgiven, they are "overlook'd, they are conniv'd at by you! Where is "now the Sword of Levi, and the Zeal of Simeon? "Where is the wrath of Moſes againſt the Worſhippers of "the Golden Calf? Where is the Indignation of St. Peter "againſt Simon the Magician? Imitate, Reverend Fa- "thers, imitate the Zeal of theſe holy Perſons, and fol- "low the way of Righteouſneſs, ſhewn you by the "Lord. wold Biſhop of Wincheſter leading the way in his Dioceſe, was quickly followed by Dunſtan and Oſwald, and all the other Biſhops, who being Monks, without much ſolici- tation, imitated theſe three Prelates. The antient Hiſto- rians, for the moſt part, repreſent thoſe Days as the Golden Age, and as the happieſt England ever knew.

Remarks on the Invec- tives againſt the ſecular Clergy.

Perhaps it will ſeem ſtrange that the ſecular Clergy ſhould at this time be more bitterly inveighed againſt than in the following Centuries, when the Lives of the Prieſts were no leſs ſcandalous. To account for this, it muſt be ob- ſerved, the Popes had for ſome time prohibited the Clergy from marrying, and were very ſevere to all who refuſed to comply with their Decrees. This Prohibition, which at preſent is a fundamental Article in the Church of Rome, met at firſt with great Oppoſition, eſpecially in England, which ſet the Popes upon uſing all means to bring the Eng- liſh Prieſts to a Compliance. Dunſtan's Intereſt, and his Addreſs to ingage Edgar in the Project, were mighty Helps to them. We muſt therefore carry in our Minds this Prohibition againſt the Clergy's marrying, in order to com- prehend the Occaſion of the Complaints of the Monks and their Favourers againſt the Seculars. and to judge how far they are to be credited. Though it is but too true, the Prieſts at that time led very diſorderly Lives, yet that was not the thing that drew this Storm upon them. It was their Marriage which gave the Offence, and which their Enemies would fain have to be thought a more heinous Crime than Concubinage, or any other they could lay to their Charge. Their Wives were always called Concubines, or by a more opprobrious Name. But notwithſtanding all the Endeavours of the Court of Rome, this pretended Abuſe could not be reformed till the End of the twelfth Century, when the Celibacy of the Clergy was eſtabliſhed after a three hundred Years Struggle.

Obſervation on Edgar's Character and Encomi- um given him by the Monks.

The Monks were bound in Gratitude to make a ſuitable Return for the ſervice Edgar had done them. Accordingly, the Monkiſh Hiſtorians have endeavoured by their exceſſive Commendations, to make him paſs for a real Saint. But whether for want of Attention, or ſome other reaſon, they have related ſome Particulars of his Life, which beget not that Idea they intended to give of him. Indeed, to conſider only his Political Actions, it muſt be confeſt, he was a great Prince. But a great King and a great Saint are two very different Characters. For inſtance, it is difficult to juſtify, by the Rules of the Goſpel, a bloody Execution (1) done by Edgar's Order in the Iſle of Thanet, upon a very ſlight Occaſion, as Hiſtorians do allow. What might not theſe ſame Hiſtorians have ſaid of his unruly Luſt, and vicious Inclination to Women (2), of which I am now going to give a few Inſtances, who publiſh'd to the World that the Soul of his Brother Edwy was about to be dragged into Hell, for having had but a ſingle Miſtreſs?

It was eaſy to ſee if Edgar had not purchaſed the good Opinion of the Monks by his exceſſive Complaiſance, they would have given him no better Quarter than his Predeceſſor, who was much leſs faulty in that reſpect.

Edgar's Amours.

To conclude the Reign of Edgar, which was diſturbed neither by foreign nor domeſtick Wars, it remains only that I give an account of his Amours, which are ſomething uncommon, and ſhew his good Qualities were not without a great mixture of Failings. His firſt Miſtreſs was a Nun (3), whom he took by Force out of a Convent, and could not be prevail'd with to ſend back again by the Solicitations of Dunſtan. He had a Daughter by her named Editha, who was greatly celebrated for her Sanctity. It is true, he aton'd for his Crime by not wearing his Crown during the ſpace of ſeven Years. A ſevere Penance indeed for a Fault his Confeſſor ought to have looked upon as a Sacrilege! But this is not the firſt time the Sins of Princes have been extenuated, and the Rigour of their Penance magnified. His ſecond Miſtreſs, whom ſome however call his lawful Wife, was Elfleda, ſirnam'd the Fair, from her Complexion. By her he had a Son called Edward, who ſucceeded him. An extraordinary Adventure gained him a third Miſtreſs. Going one day by Andover, he took up his Lodging at a Lord's Houſe, who had a very beautiful Daughter, with whom he fell paſſionately in love at firſt Sight. As he was very violent in his Paſſions, he reſolved to gratify his Love without delay, ſo commanded the young Lady to be brought to his Bed, without troubling himſelf to obtain her Conſent. The Mother of the Lady being utterly againſt her Daughter's being the King's Concubine; but withal dreading, by her Denial, to draw down his Diſpleaſure upon herſelf and Family, deviſed this Expedient. She prevailed upon one of her waiting Women to lie with the King inſtead of her Daughter. At Break of Day the King perceiving his Bedfellow was going to riſe, would not let her, by which means ſhe was forced to diſcover the Cheat. He was at firſt very angry at being thus deceived. But the good-liking he had taken to the Girl, moderating his Anger, and giving him time to reflect on the Diſhonour he intended his Hoſt, he readily forgave the Trick he had been ſerved. He kept this Girl as his Miſtreſs till he married.

Edgar's Marriage. Malmſb. l. 2. c. 8. Brompt.

As all Edgar's Amours, it ſeems, were to have ſomething particular in them, ſo his very Marriage was not to be in the common way. He was informed that Ordang, Earl of Devonſhire, had a Daughter the greateſt Beauty in England, upon which he reſolved to marry her, if ſhe anſwered the Deſcription given of her. However, as he was unwilling to make any Advances he might have reaſon to repent of, he communicated his Deſign to Earl Ethelwold his Favourite, and order'd him to go upon ſome pretence, and ſee whether the Lady's Beauty was as great as Fame reported. Ethelwold being arrived at the Earl of Devonſhire's, had no ſooner caſt his Eyes on Elfrida his Daughter, but he fell deſperately in love with her. His Paſſion was ſo ſudden and violent, that forgetting all the King his Maſter's Favours, he demanded Elfrida for himſelf. His Suit being granted, he was married as privately as poſſible, making his Father-in-Law believe he had important Reaſons for not divulging his Marriage. Returning ſoon after to Court, he told the King there was nothing extraordinary in Elfrida; that he was amazed the World ſhould talk ſo much of her Charms; that probably, the Fame of her Beauty was owing more to her Father's Riches than any thing elſe. This Report, which was far from inflaming the King's Love, had the Effect Ethelwold expected. Edgar, growing out of conceit with the Match, laid aſide all thoughts of it. Ethelwold perceiving the King was grown perfectly cool upon the matter, repreſented to him one day, that though the Fortune of the Earl of Devonſhire's Daughter was nothing to a King, yet it would be the making of a Subject; and therefore humbly deſired his Leave to make his Addreſſes to her, as being the greateſt Heireſs in the Kingdom. Edgar, who had loſt all Inclination to Elfrida, very willingly granted his Favourite's Requeſt, and even appeared extremely well pleaſed that he was likely to marry to ſo great an Advantage. Ethelwold, as ſoon as he had obtained the King's Conſent, returned to his Wife, and publickly ſolemniz'd his Wedding. But fearing his Spouſe ſhould appear too beautiful in the King's Eyes, he kept her on ſome pretence at his Country Seat, without ſuffering her to come to Court.

How cautious ſoever Ethelwold had been, it was not poſſible his Treachery ſhould be long a Secret. Favourites are ſeldom without private Enemies, who deſire nothing more than to have an Opportunity of ruining them. Edgar at length was informed of the Truth; but diſſembling his Reſentment, he was willing, before he ſhewed it, to be ſatisfied with his own Eyes of the Truth of what had been told him. To that end, he took occaſion to go into thoſe Parts where Ethelwold kept his Wife, and when he came near the Place, told him he had a mind to viſit his Lady, of whom he had formerly heard ſo many fine things. Ethelwold was thunder-ſtruck at this, and did all he could to divert the King from his purpoſe; but his Artifices were all in vain, and ſerved only to confirm the King the more in his Reſolution. All he could obtain, was Leave to go before, on pretence of preparing for the King's Reception. As ſoon as he came home, he threw himſelf at his Lady's Feet, and confeſſing what he had done for the ſake of poſſeſſing her, conjur'd her to uſe all her Endeavours to conceal her Charms from the amorous King. Elfrida promiſed him whatever he deſired, but was bent however to break her word. No ſooner was he gone to meet the King, but ſhe ſet off her natural Beauty with all the Art ſhe was Miſtreſs of. The Event anſwered her Expectation. The moment Edgar caſt his Eyes on her, he fell deſperately in love, and from that Inſtant was reſolved to make her his own. The better to effect his Deſign, he pretended to ſee nothing extraordinary in Elfrida's Beauty; at which the Husband was overjoyed. Accordingly he took his Leave of her with a ſeeming Indifference, but at the ſame time in his Heart raged Love and Revenge; which of all the Paſſions raiſe the moſt violent Emotions in the Soul of Man. Quickly after, he ordered Ethelwold to go for Northumberland, on pretence of ſome urgent Affairs. But the unfortunate Earl never performed his Journey. He was found dead in a Wood, where he was thought at firſt to be murder'd by Robbers. But People's Eyes were ſoon opened, when they ſaw that the King, inſtead of making inquiry after the Murderers, married the Widow. Some ſay, that Edgar ſlew Ethelwold with his own Hand at a hunting Match (4).

Edgar's Character.

After what has been ſaid, it is eaſy to ſee there was a great Mixture of good and bad Qualities in this Prince, and that the Commendations given him are in many reſpects carried too far. This was the Effect of the Prejudice of the Monks in his Favour, for his ſo vigorous eſpouſing their Cauſe. This Prejudice was ſo great that one of them makes no ſcruple to ſay, Edgar was to the Engliſh, what Romulus was to the Romans, Cyrus to the Perſians, Alexander to the Macedonians, Arſaces to the Parthians, and Charlemain to the French. But one plainly perceives, this Encomium raiſes his Character too high, ſince he came infinitely ſhort of the great Men he is compared with. Accordingly, After-ages, leſs prepoſſeſſed in his Favour, have ranked him among more ſuitable Company, in a much lower Claſs. Very judicious Hiſtorians have taken him from among the Saints, where his Flatterers placed him, and have not ſcrupled to rank him in the Number of the vileſt of Princes (5). This Notion of him may be grounded on what is related of Canutus the Great, who upon mention of the Sanctity of Editha, Edgar's Daughter, ſaid, He could never believe it poſſible for the Daughter of ſo wicked a Father to be a Saint. This leaves room to ſuſpect, the Monkiſh Hiſtorians have paſſed over in ſilence ſeveral of Edgar's Actions, which would have made us conceive a very different Idea of their Hero, from what they have given us.

Edgar reigned ſixteen Years from the Death of his Brother Edwy. He died in 975, in the thirty-ſecond Year of his Age, leaving two Sons and a Daughter. Edward, his eldeſt Son, was born of a Concubine, or at leaſt of a very doubt-

But, as there are no other Proofs of his Sanctity during his Life, but his Affection to the Monks, and his founding Monaſteries (2), it is pretended, he gave more ſubſtantial ones after his Death. It was reported, when his Body was taken out of the Coffin, to be put into a ſtately Shrine, it was as freſh as when he reſign'd his laſt Breath. It was further affirmed, that the Shrine being made too ſhort, though he was very little of Stature (3), and ſome body daring to ſever his Head from his Body, the Blood guſhed out in great abundance. Diſſenſions on account of the Monks. Sax. Ann. Malmſb. l. 2. c. 9. Huntingd. S. Dunelm.

UPON Edgar's Deceaſe, they who had with Impatience born the great Power of the Monks, thought it a fair Opportunity to reduce them to their primitive State. Elfer, Duke of Mercia, their ſworn Enemy (4), turn'd them out of all the Benefices they poſſeſs'd in that Province, and replaced the Seculars in their room. Some other Lords did the like in other Places. But the Duke of Eaſt-Anglia (5), and ſeveral other great Men, firmly adher'd to Dunſtan and his Party. This Diverſity of Opinion, on account of the Monks, cauſed ſuch Heart-burnings among the Nobles, that they were upon the point of coming to Blows. The Breach ſtill grew wider, when they came to chuſe a Succeſſor to the deceaſed King. That Prince had left two Sons, who had both their Adherents, though their Age would not permit them to proſecute their reſpective Titles to the Crown. Many believed it was devolved to Ethelred, pretending there was a Flaw in Edward's Birth, and that his Mother was never lawfully married to Edgar. But Dunſtan and all the Biſhops were for Edward, pleading his being named his Succeſſor by Edgar in his laſt Will and Teſtament. To this was added another, and no leſs powerful Motive to them that eſpouſed his Intereſt, namely, their Expectation of governing the Kingdom under this young Prince, which they could not hope for, if they placed his Brother on the Throne, becauſe his Mother Elfrida did not ſeem much inclined to be guided by their Counſels.

Dunſtan crowns Edward by his own Authority. S. Dunelm. Brompt.

In the mean time Ethelred's Party being moſt numerous, Edward was in danger of being excluded, if Dunſtan his Supporter did not find Means to break their Meaſures. As he ſaw himſelf favour'd by the People from their high Conceit of his Sanctity, he made uſe of their Inclination to execute his Deſigns. In the midſt of the publick Debates which of the two Princes ſhould ſucceed, Dunſtan ſuddenly riſing up, and taking Prince Edward by the Hand, leads him towards the Church, attended by the other Biſhops and a great Crowd of People. As ſoon as he comes there, he anoints the young Prince King, without regarding the Oppoſition of the contrary Party. The Nobles bemoan'd their falling once more under the Government of that imperious Prelate. But, as they ſaw the People ready to ſupport him, they were forced to ſubmit.

The Conteſt between the Prieſts and the Monks is revived.

Edward was but fourteen Years old when he began to reign under the Guardianſhip of Dunſtan, who immediately took all the Power into his Hands. As ſoon as he was fixed in the Regency, he uſed all poſſible Endeavours to keep the Monks in Poſſeſſion of the Benefices, they had acquir'd in the laſt Reign, and made uſe of the King's Authority to that end. But he met with greater Oppoſition than he imagin'd. As the King was but a Minor, the Orders given in his Name were not ſo readily complied with. Dunſtan aſſembled ſeveral Councils about this Affair (6). But perhaps his Endeavours would have all proved ineffectual, if, by means of ſeveral Miracles, which were never wanting upon occaſion, he had not brought the People to believe that Heaven interpoſed in the Affair.

Several Councils about it.

Miracles in favour of the Monks. Malm. l. 2. c. 9. Eadmer. J. Pike.

In one of theſe Councils held at Wincheſter, the Majority being againſt the Monks, they would have infallibly loſt their Cauſe, if, on a ſudden, a Crucifix that hung aloft in the Room had not pronounced theſe Words with an audible Voice; It ſhan't be done, it ſhan't be done: You have decided the Matter well hitherto, and would be to blame to change. Aſtoniſh'd at this Oracle, the moſt obſtinate came in and voted for the Monks.

Another time at an Aſſembly in the ſame Place, Dunſtan uſed all his Endeavours to have one Elphegus a Monk choſen Dean of that Church; but the People were for having that Dignity conferred on a ſecular Prieſt. The Conteſt ran ſo high, that there was like to be a Sedition, which might have been of dangerous Conſequence. But St. Andrew the Apoſtle on a ſudden revealing to St. Dunſtan, in the Audience of all the People, that the Monk ought to be elected, he was immediately inſtalled. Theſe and ſeveral other Miracles, too many to be inſerted here, not being however ſufficient to unite all Men in favour of the Monks, there was one at laſt that ſtopped the Mouths of their moſt ſtrenuous Oppoſers.

978. A remarkable Accident at the Council of Calne. Sax. Ann. Malmſb. Huntingd.

Dunſtan had called a Council at Calne in Wiltſhire, to decree that the Monks ſhould keep Poſſeſſion of their Benefices. This was one of thoſe mix'd Councils ſpoken of hereafter, where the King and all the Nobility were preſent, as well as the Biſhops and Abbots. Probably the Affair would have been decided againſt the Monks, conſidering the great Number of their Oppoſers in this Aſſembly. But whilſt they were warmly diſputing on both Sides, the Floor of the Room happened to break under the Company, and cruſhed ſeveral to Death. The Beam on which Dunſtan's Chair was placed, was the only one that did not give way, ſo that he came off unhurt (7), whilſt ſcarce a Man beſides himſelf in this numerous Aſſembly eſcaped being either killed or bruiſed. This was ſufficient to convince the People, the Monks were the Favourites of Heaven, ſince their Head and Protector was ſo wonderfully preſerv'd. There were ſome malicious People however, who inſinuated that Dunſtan prevented the King, contrary to Cuſtom, from being in the Council that Day. After this ſeaſonable Accident the Monks were left unmoleſted; whether the miraculous Preſervation of Dunſtan had made an Impreſſion upon the Minds of his Enemies, or their moſt potent Oppoſers periſh'd in their Fall. Eadmer.

979. The tragical End of King Edward. Sax. Ann. Malm. l. 2. c. 9.

Beſides theſe Eccleſiaſtical Matters, we find nothing remarkable in the Reign of Edward, but his tragical Death in 979, four Years after he aſcended the Throne. The Story is thus related by the greateſt Part of Hiſtorians. Edward paſſing one Day, as he was returning from hunting, near Corf-Caſtle (8), where his Mother-in-law Elfrida reſided with her Son Ethelred, rid off from his Company in order to pay her a Viſit. Elfrida being told the King was at the Gate, ran to receive him, and urged him very earneſtly to unlight, and come in to refreſh himſelf. But as the King's Deſign was only to pay his Reſpects to his Mother-in-law as he went by her Caſtle, he only deſired a Glaſs of Wine to drink her Health. Whether Elfrida had already form'd a Deſign of deſtroying the King, to make way for her Son to the Crown, or that favourable Opportunity put the Thought in her head, the young King had no ſooner lifted the Glaſs to his mouth, but a Ruffian ſtabb'd him in the Back with a Dagger (1). Perceiving himſelf wounded, he ſet ſpurs to his Horſe, which ſoon carried him out of ſight. But not being able to keep his Saddle by reaſon of the Loſs of Blood, he fell off his Horſe. To complete his Misfortunes, his Foot hung in the Stirrup, and by that means he was dragged a good way before his Horſe ſtopped, juſt by a poor blind Woman's Houſe that ſtood in the road. To this Houſe, the People ſent after him by Elfrida tracing him by his Blood, found him dead, and his Body miſerably torn. Elfrida imagining ſhe could conceal this horrid Deed, known only to her Domeſticks, ordered the Corpſs to be thrown into a Well. But it was found there a few Days after, and carried to Warham (2), from whence it was removed to Shaftsbury, and laid in a Monaſtery founded by King Alfred. It is pretended to have worked many Miracles there; that a blind Man was reſtored to his Sight, and a Cripple to his Limbs, by only touching the Body. The poor Woman alſo, in whoſe Houſe his Body lay one Night, is ſaid to be cured by his Interceſſion; and the Well into which he was thrown, endued with the virtue of healing ſeveral ſorts of Diſtempers. In fine, it is reported that Elfrida, curious to know herſelf the truth of theſe Miracles, reſolved to go to the Place, but her Horſe, in ſpite of all her Endeavours, would not ſtir one Step forward. With ſuch Prodigies as theſe do the Hiſtories of thoſe Times abound. Thus far is certain, Elfrida, willing to atone for her Crime, founded two Nunneries, one at Ambresbury (3), and another at Whorwel near Andover. In this laſt ſhe ſhut herſelf up, in order to do Penance the reſidue of her Days. She is ſaid to have frequently covered her Body all over with little Croſſes to keep off the Devil, whom ſhe had but too much reaſon to fear.

Brompton. Malmſb.

I do not know upon what Foundation Edward was made both a Saint and a Martyr, unleſs it was pretended, he was murdered out of Revenge for his great Affection to Dunſtan and the Monks. Indeed that was ſufficient then to procure him theſe glorious Titles. It is certain, in thoſe Days all the Favourers of the Monks paſſed for ſo many Saints, and their Enemies for the Objects of God's Wrath. However this be, the young Prince, whoſe Reign I have gone through, is generally known by the Name of Edward the Martyr (4).

THE STATE of the Church of ENGLAND,

FROM THE Union of the Seven Kingdoms, to the End of the Reign of EDWARD the Martyr.

State of the Church.

THE continual Wars in England during the hundred and fifty Years we have juſt run through, were no leſs fatal to the Church than the State. They produced an extreme Corruption of Manners, and a profound Ignorance all over the Kingdom. The Deſtruction of the Churches and Monaſteries, the plundering what was deſigned for their Subſiſtence, and the Neceſſity of defending themſelves againſt the Danes, and being wholly employed in the Exerciſe of Arms, turned Multitudes from the Study of Religion. It is no wonder therefore, if during ſuch troubleſome times, we meet with very few Materials for an Eccleſiaſtical Hiſtory. To this may be added, the greateſt part of the Monaſteries, where the Memoirs of what paſſed in Church and State were laid up, having been demoliſhed, the Hiſtorians who have wrote of thoſe Times, were deprived of that Aſſiſtance. The Reader therefore muſt expect to find but few remarkable Events relating to Religion, but few Councils to inform us of the Doctrine and Faith of the Church of England, and but very few learned Men, whoſe Writings might afford us ſome light. It will be neceſſary however to relate the principal Circumſtances tranſmitted down to us, as they will be of ſervice in clearing the Events of future and more happy times.

During the Reign of Egbert, nothing happened in the Church worth notice. Ethelwulph's Reign furniſhes us with a Subject, which, though mentioned elſewhere, it will not be amiſs to ſpeak a little more largely of in this Place; I mean the Grant of the Tithes. The Charter runs thus.

Ethelwulph's Charter for the Tithes.

"I, ETHELWULPH, by the Grace of God "King of the Weſt-Saxons, &c. with the Advice of the "Biſhops, Earls, and all other Perſons of Diſtinction in "my Dominions, have, for the Health of my Soul, the "Good of my People, and the Proſperity of my Kingdom, taken the prudent and ſerviceable Reſolution of "granting the tenth Part of the Lands throughout my "whole Kingdom, to the Church and Miniſters of Religion to be enjoyed by them, with all the Privileges of "a free Tenure, and diſcharging from all Services due to "the Crown, and all other Incumbrances incident to "Lay-Fees. The Grant has been made by us to the "Church, in honour of Jeſus Chriſt, the Bleſſed Virgin, "and All Saints, and out of regard to the Paſchal Solemnity, and that Almighty God might vouchſafe his Bleſſing to us and our Poſterity."

Dated at the Palace of Wilton, in the Year 854, Indiction the ſecond, at the Feaſt of Eaſter.

Remarks on this Charter.

The Terms, Date and Subſcriptions of this Charter, have induced ſeveral learned Men to believe it ſpurious. But without entering into the Controverſy, I ſhall content myſelf with obſerving, that long before this Charter, the Clergy of England claimed a Right to the Tithes, if they were not already in actual Poſſeſſion of them.

The Tomb of Quinever, Arthur's Wife, was found here within this laſt Century, and this Inſcription on the Wall in maſſy Gold Letters, R. G. A. C. 600. The Antiquity of which is very ſuſpicious, ſince ſhe muſt have out-lived Arthur fifty Years, and beſides, ſhe is ſaid by Hiſtorians of Credit to have been buried at Glaſſenbury. Queen Elfrida's Nunnery is famous for Queen Eleanor's being a Nun there; and alſo Mary Daughter to Edward I. with thirteen Noblemen's Daughters, were veiled here on Aſſumption Day, p. 1285. *Camd. (4) King Edward's Martyrdom was kept on three ſeveral Days; on the Day he was murdered, and at the two removes of his Body. See Martyr. Engl. 18 of March, and Feb. and June 20. He has likewiſe the Honour of ſtanding in the Roman Martyrology, March 18, where Baronius takes Notice of a Letter in Pope Innocent V's Regiſter, for the keeping St. Edward's Feſtival, Coll. I. 3.

This

This is evident from the ſeventeeth Canon of the Council of Calcuith, held in 785, where we find they urged the Payment of Tithes from the Law of Moſes. It is true, King Ethelwulph might have a mind to confirm the Rights of the Clergy, by granting them a Charter for the ſame. But in that caſe, it is ſomething ſtrange he ſhould paſs over in ſilence the Divine Right of Tithes, on which the Clergy chiefly inſiſted. If this Charter therefore is not to be conſidered as a Forgery, it ſeems at leaſt to be of very doubtful Authority. Add to this, that by the tenth Part of the Lands muſt neceſſarily be meant the tenth Part of the Profits; which muſt be owned to be a very forced Interpretation, eſpecially in a primordial Act, ſuch as this (1).

In the Reigns of Ethelbald, Ethelbert and Ethelred I, we have nothing relating to the Church, but the Deſtruction of the Monaſteries, and the pathetick Deſcriptions made by the Hiſtorians, of the Daniſh Fury exerciſed upon the Monks. This they chiefly inſiſt upon, as being, in their Opinion, the moſt material hiſtorical Events. They particularly lament the three famous Monaſteries of Croyland, Ely and Medeſhamſted, whoſe Monks were all maſſacred, and the Libraries burnt (2).

The pretended Martyrdom of Edmund King of Eaſt-Anglia would require our notice, had it not been ſpoken of elſewhere (3). I call it pretended, becauſe it does not appear, this Prince loſt his Life in any of thoſe Cauſes which make the Sufferer a Martyr. Otherwiſe, we muſt ſay that there were in England as many Martyrs as there were Chriſtians put to death by the Danes. However, he ſtands in the Calender with that Title, and Miracles were affirmed to be frequently wrought at his Tomb during ſeveral Ages (4).

Tho' I have amply inſiſted on every thing relating to the Reign of Alfred, it will not be improper to remind the Reader of two things, which may be of uſe hereafter. The firſt is, the Ruin of the Monaſteries; which was ſo great, there was not a Monk left in England, being all ſlain by the Danes, or forced to fly out of the Kingdom. Some of them perhaps took other Profeſſions when they ſaw the loſs of their Revenues had deprived them of their Subſiſtance. As ſoon as Alfred was rid of the Danes, he built Monaſteries, and furniſhed them with foreign Monks, there being none to be found in the Kingdom. It will ſeem ſtrange, no doubt, that he ſhould chuſe to be at the charge of new Monaſteries, rather than repair the old, whoſe Walls, for the moſt part, were ſtill remaining. But it muſt be obſerved, the Secular Clergy had taken poſſeſſion of them, and lived there in common under the Direction of an Arch-Prieſt. It is plain, Alfred ſaw ſome Inconveniency in diſlodging them.

The other thing I would put the Reader in mind of, is, the groſs Ignorance the Engliſh were fallen into during the War with the Danes. We have already ſeen in the Life of Alfred, how that Prince himſelf complained of it; and reſolved for that reaſon to invite into his Dominions as many learned Foreigners as poſſible, to found the Univerſity of Oxford (5), and uſe ſeveral other means to reſtore the Sciences in his Kingdom.

Edward the Elder, following the example of his Father, founded, for the ſame reaſon, the Univerſity of Cambridge, as ſome aſſert (6). I ſhall not here alledge the Arguments for and againſt the Antiquity of this illuſtrious Univerſity, as being a matter attended with great Difficulties, and beſides, not immediately relating to the ſtate of the Church. But we have another particular belonging to this Reign, where Religion is more concerned, by reaſon of the Conſequences pretended to be drawn from thence, and which it will be proper to inſiſt upon a little.

Obſervations on the pretended Bull of Pope Formoſus. Malm. l 2. de Geſt. Reg. Ann.

Malmsbury relates in his Hiſtory, that in the Reign of Edward the Elder, Pope Formoſus being informed there had been a ſeven Years Vacancy in the Weſt-Saxon Sees, ſent a Bull into England, excommunicating the King and all his Subjects. Whereupon the King aſſembled a general Council, and Plegmund Archbiſhop of Canterbury, cauſing the Bull to be read, it was reſolved the Vacancies ſhould be filled, and three new Sees erected in Weſſex. Plegmond (continues the Hiſtorian) went afterwards to Rome, to get the Cenſure taken off, and at his return, conſecrated ſeven Biſhops in one Day. An antient Regiſter of the Priory of Canterbury ſays much the ſame thing, with this Addition, that the Council made a particular Proviſion for the Corniſh Men to recover them from their Errors. By the way, we are to underſtand by the Errors of the Corniſh, who were ſome of the Remains of the old Britons, their refuſing to acknowledge the Papal Authority.

Spelm. Conc. Vol. I. p. 387.

The Catholick Divines Anſwer to Sir Edward Coke, p. 36, 137. Spelman. ibid.

The Roman Catholick Writers make a great flouriſh upon this Bull, and produce it as a ſtrong Inſtance of the Pope's Authority, not only over the Biſhops, but the Kings of England. But after all, this Bull upon examination will be found inconſiſtent with Chronology. Malmsbury dates it in 904, But Pope Formoſus died in 896, and was dragged out of his Grave in 897, by Stephen his Succeſſor. Baronius, to ſolve this Difficulty, ſays the Date in Malmſbury is falſe, and ſhould be written 894 inſtead of 904. 'Tis true, this Correction ſets the matter right as to Formoſus, but then the Cardinal falls into another Anachroniſm with regard to Edward, who did not aſcend the Throne till the Year 900. Edward therefore muſt be changed into Alfred. But no Hiſtorian mentions Alfred's being excommunicated. Notwithſtanding all this, they are extremely loth to part with this pretended Bull. Some have ſuppoſed two Excommunications; one by Pope Formoſus in 894, againſt the Biſhops only, without any mention of King Edward: Another by Pope John IX, which threatned the King. To ſupport this Suppoſition, Malmſbury, who ſpeaks of Formoſus's Bull, and Polydore Virgil, who mentions Pope John's, are cited. But theſe Authorities are very inſufficient, ſince Malmsbury is plainly miſtaken, either in the Date, or in the Name of the Pope; and Polydore Virgil does not ſay it was John IX, as is pretended, but John X, that threatned Edward with Excommunication, as indeed it muſt be, if the Bull was dated in 904. Thus this Bull, which has been ſo much

(1) The Charter here tranſlated is in the Monaſticon, p. 100. and is dated at Wilton in 854. Whereas there is another Charter very different from this in Ingulphus and Matthew of Weſtminſter, dated at Wincheſter in 855. To ſolve this Difficulty, it is ſuppoſed that Ethelwulph repeated this Grant firſt at Wilton for the Tithes only of his own Demeſne, and the Year following at Wincheſter for the Tithes of the whole Kingdom. Though it muſt be owned that they both ſeemed equally to extend to all his Dominions. See Ingulph. p. 17. Edit. Gal. & M. Weſt. Flor. Hiſt. An. 854. Ingulphus ſays, this Charter was made after Ethelwulph's Return from Rome; but that could not be, ſeeing he was then only King of Kent.

(3) Anno 945. K. Edward I. gave one of his Royal Towns, then called Beadriceſworth, with divers other Lands to build a Church and Monaſtery, in memory of St. Edmund the Martyr, whoſe Body was there enſhrined; which Town was from him called St. Edmundſbury. Mat. Weſt.

(4) Matthew Weſtminſter ſays, his Head being thrown among the Briars and Thorns in the ſame Wood where Ledebroch was murdered by Bern, the Eaſt-Anglians, after the Danes were gone, went out to ſee for it, and having ſought in vain for ſome time, the Head at laſt cried out, Here, Here, Here, and never ceaſed till they came to the Place. The Head was put to his Body, and buried with it. When they came to take up his Corpſe, many Years after, it was found whole and entire, and the Head grown to the Body, without the leaſt Scar, only a Mark round the Neck like a ſcarlet Thread. Mat. Weſt. Fl. Hiſt. Ann. 870. Malmsb. Geſt. Pontif. l. 2.

(5) There is a Paſſage in Aſſerius's Life of K. Alfred publiſhed by Mr. Camden, p. 16. that talks of a Diſpute between Grimbald, whom Alfred had ſent to Oxford, and the old Scholars ſettled there before. From whence it is inferred, that Alfred was not the firſt Founder of this Univerſity. On the other hand, it is objected, that this Paſſage in Aſſer is ſpurious. That it is not in the Copy publiſhed by Archbiſhop Parker; that Uſher is poſitive for its being interpolated, and that it ſpeaks of things done after Aſſer's Death, &c. It is farther objected, both againſt the Antiquity of Cambridge, as well as Oxford, that neither of them are mentioned by Bede; that Alcuin paſſes them over in ſilence, and talks of York as the Seat of Learning then: That Ingulphus, in his Deſcriptions of the Burning of the Libraries and Monaſteries by the Danes, ſays not a Word of any Damage done to Oxford or Cambridge: That Alfred complains there were very few on this ſide the Humber that underſtood the Church-Prayers in Engliſh, or could conſtrue Latin. Laſtly, That had there been then in being two famous Univerſities in England, what Occaſion was there for his ſending beyond Sea for learned Men to inſtruct his Subjects? The moſt probable Opinion therefore is, that the Univerſity of Oxford was firſt founded by Alfred in 886. See Book of Winch. Higden. l. 6. Harpſfield. Malm. The firſt time Oxford is mentioned in the ancient Hiſtorians, as an Univerſity or School of Learning, is in Ingulph, Abbot of Croyland, who lived in the Reigns of William I. and II. Speaking of himſelf, he ſays, "Ego Ingulphus,—pro literis addiſcendis in teneriori ætate conſtitutus, primum Weſtmonaſterio. poſtmodum "Oxonienſi ſtudio traditus eram. Cumque in Ariſtotele arripiendo ſuprà multos cœtaneos meos profeciſſem, etiam Rhetoricam Tullii primam, & ſecundam "talo tenus induebam." Ingulph. Edit. Oxon. p. 73.

(6) There is a Manuſcript Charter of Privileges, lodged in the Library of Clare-Hall, ſaid to be granted to Cambridge by this King Edward. But however, ſome have carried back the Antiquity of this Univerſity to the Year 394 before Chriſt, pretending it was then founded by one Cantaber, a Spaniard, and that it was reſtored by Sigebert King of Eaſt-Anglia, in 630, whom others account the Founder. But it is plain from the Reaſons in the Note above, that there was no no ſuch Thing as any Univerſity at all till Alfred's Time. And as ſome ſay, (Coll. Eccl. Hiſt. p. 299.) we have no authentick Teſtimony of any Univerſity at Cambridge till the Year 1110, (Xth Hen. I.) when Joffred, Abbot of Croyland, ſent one Giſlebert, a Divine, and three others to Cambridge, to teach the Sciences. Theſe Monks coming to Cambridge, hired a Barn to teach in, and in a Year's time their Audience ſo encreaſed, that no Houſe or Barn was big enough to contain them. From this ſlender Beginning, ſays Petrus Bleſenſis, the Univerſity of Cambridge grew up to a noble Seat of Learning. The firſt College, viz. Peter-Houſe, was founded by Hugh Balſham, Biſhop of Ely, in 1284.—

boasted of, falls to the ground, as inconsistent with Chronology.

As to the Consecration of the seven Bishops mentioned by Malmsbury, there is not the same reason to question the matter of fact. Tho' as to the time, this circumstance is somewhat perplexed, it is certain however, in the beginning of the Xth Century there were six Bishops in Wessex, whereas a little before there were but three. Ralph de Diceto places the erecting of the three new Sees in 909. To reconcile this Historian with Malmsbury, who fixes the date of them to 904, this expedient is proposed, which, if it has no foundation, is at least not improbable. It is thought, that in the Synod or mixt Assembly held at Winchester in 904, the erection of the three new Bishopricks was resolved. But as these new Sees were to be taken out of the Dioceses of Wincheſter and Sherburn, it was agreed, this should not be done 'till after the death of the present Bishops, that the Revenues they had hitherto enjoyed, might not be lessened. Both these Bishops happening to die in 909, or perhaps a little before, and the Bishopricks of Worcester and Sussex being also vacant at the same time, Plegmund consecrated seven Bishops at once, namely, Fridstan Bishop of Wincheſter, Werestan of Sherburn, Kenulph of Worcester, Beornock of Selsey in Sussex, Eadulph of Crediton, or Kirton, Athelm of Wells, and Athelstan of Petrockstow or Padstow in Cornwall. The three last Sees were the newly erected. Tho' Malmsbury and Higden affirm the new erected Bishopricks had the Pope's Confirmation, it is certain at that time, and for more than two hundred years after, there was no such thing requir'd. And therefore very probably, when these two Historians mentioned the Pope's Confirmation, they had an Eye to the Custom of their own Times.

We meet with very few particulars of moment, except some Councils spoken of hereafter, in the Reigns of Athelstan, Edmund, and Edred. The most remarkable thing was the Charter of Privileges granted by Edmund, on account of Dunstan the first Abbot, to Glassenbury Abby, after it was rebuilt. These Privileges were so extensive, that the King seemed to intend to invest the Abbot with a sort of sovereign Power within the Precincts of his Jurisdiction (1).

Great Privileges granted Glassenbury Abby. Malm. l. 2. c. 7.

The Abby of Croyland was also rebuilt in the Reign of Edmund by Turketul the King's Cousin and Chancellor. He afterwards turned Monk himself, and was made Abbot by Edred, who put him in possession, by the delivery of a Pastoral Staff, according to the custom of those days. Turketul obtained a very advantagious Charter for his Abby. However, Edred refused to grant him the Privilege of Sanctuary, which that Abby had enjoyed before its destruction, being unwilling Malefactors should be protected from Justice.

Turketul rebuilds Croyland; Ingulph.

but is refused the Privilege of Sanctuary.

This Prince was entirely swayed by Dunstan, who made use of his Interest, not only to put the Monks in possession of the Abbies, which the secular Clergy had appropriated to themselves, but also of the Benefices. If Edred had not died so soon, Dunstan would doubtless have settled this Affair in such a manner, as to have made it unalterable. But this Prince dying before it could be compleated, Edwy his Successor turned the Monks out of the Benefices, and even out of some of their Monasteries. To read the tragical Complaints of the Monkish Historians upon this occasion, and their bitter Invectives against Edwy, one would imagine this Prince had utterly rooted out the Christian Religion. Whereas upon a closer Inquiry, it will appear, the Monks were dispossessed only of the two Monasteries of Abington and Malmsbury (2). This Loss however was so grievous to them that they stirred up the Northumbrians and Mercians to a revolt, as hath been related.

It is needless to repeat here what has already been said of the great Interest of Dunstan in the Reign of Edgar, and what he did in favour of the Monks. The Truth is, he can't be blamed for exerting his power in replacing them in the Monasteries. Though the religious Houses were deserted during the wars, they belonged not to the secular Clergy, since they were founded for the Monks. But he can't be so easily excused, for endeavouring to introduce the Monks into the Benefices, on pretence that the secular Priests were most of them married. I shall not examine here upon what ground the Councils and Popes prohibited the Clergy from marrying. This matter has been so fully handled by several Authors, that nothing new can be added. I shall only remark, that from the Conversion of the English to Dunstan's time, the Clergy of England were not obliged to Celibacy, and that Dunstan undertook an unprecedented thing, when he attempted to bind them to it, in pursuance of the Papal Decrees. It has been observed in the Reign of Edgar, how Dunstan, countenanced by that Prince, gained his point so far, as, not indeed to oblige them to put away their Wives, but to expel them their Benefices for keeping them. However notwithstanding his great Interest and Affection to the Monks, he could never reinstate them in the northern Monasteries. For above two hundred years the Abbies in those parts were uninhabited, and the very name of a Monk was scarce heard of there.

The Removal of the Episcopal Sees.

I have but little to say (3) concerning the new Bishopricks, or the removal of the Episcopal Sees from one place to another, at a time when one half of the Kingdom was in the hands of the Danes, who as yet were Pagans. Northumberland, Mercia, and East Anglia, being expos'd to their continual ravages, it is not to be expected the affairs of the Church should proceed in a regular course. East-Anglia had never a Bishop for above two hundred years, and in Northumberland, the See of Hagulstad was reduc'd to so wretched a state, that having long been without a Bishop, it was forced at last to be united to York. During Alfred's Reign, the Bishopricks of Leicester and Lincoln were united in one, and the See remov'd to Dorchester (4), where it continued 'till the Reign of William the Conqueror, when it was translated again to Lincoln. I have already mention'd the erection of the three new Bishopricks in Wessex, and therefore it is needless to say any thing more of them. This is all that occurs, unless I were to give a List of the Names of the Bishops that succeeded in each See; which would lead me too far. Those who have a mind to it, may consult Dr. Heylin, who has published a Book upon that subject, where you have the year of the Instalment of each Bishop.

The Councils.

The Councils held in this interval, were properly mixt Assemblies, consisting of the Clergy and Nobility, and term'd in Saxon, Wittena-Gemot, that is, an Assembly of wise Men, or rather Micel-Synod, which signifies in the same Language, the Great, or General Assembly. Both these names were rendered in Latin by the word Concilium. But because in these Assemblies, Laws and Ordinances relating to the Church as well as the State, were enacted, several of them are reckon'd among the Councils or Synods. As for Councils purely Ecclesiastical, it does not appear there were any, from Egbert to Edward the Martyr.

Synod of Graetley. 928. Spelman. Conc. Vol. I. p. 396.

Next to the Assembly at Wincheſter, where Ethelwulph is said to have given a Grant of the Tithes, the most considerable with regard to religious Affairs, was the Synod of Graetely, in the Reign of Athelstan. The Canons or Laws of this Council are Nine.

The Ist enjoins the Payment of Tithes (5).

The IId commands the Magistrates to put the Laws in execution against those that were convinced by all the Circumstances of an Ordeal Trial (6).

The IIId is against Witchcraft and Highwaymen.

The IVth relates to the Towns where the Money was to be coined. At Canterbury there were to be seven Mints, four for the King, two for the Archbishop, and one for the Abbot of St. Augustine's. Rochester

(1) This Charter was engrossed in Letters of Gold in a Book of the four Gospels, and presented to the Abby by the King.

(2) And perhaps Glassenbury, which were all the Monks had in Edwy's Time, the rest were in Possession of the Seculars. See Tinmouth. Hist. Aur. MS. l. 21. Wulstan. Vit. Ethel.

(3) Edred founded a Bishop's See at St. Germans in Cornwall, which was afterwards annexed by Canute to the See of Crediton or Kirton. Speed, p. 341.

(4) In Oxfordshire.

(5) To which is added the King's Order to all his Officers and Governors, to maintain a poor Man in Diet and Clothes; namely, that out of every two of his Villæ, or Towns, there should be given an Amphora, or nine Gallons of Meal, a Gammon of Bacon, or a Ram worth four Pence. They were each of them also to manumise a Slave. Spelman. Conc. Vol. I. p. 398.

was to have three, two for the King, and one for the Biſhop (1).

The Vth regulates the Circumſtances and Formalities of the Ordeal Trial, to know whether the Perſon accuſed were guilty or not. And here we have two things worth remarking. The firſt is, That the Prieſts are ſpoken of as fixed or ſettled in certain places. Whence it is plain, that in thoſe days they did not live together in common; but each had his particular Church. The ſecond is, that the accuſed Perſon was to receive the conſecrated Bread. Whence it may be inferred, that ſince the Euchariſt was called Bread after the Conſecration, the Church of England was far from believing Tranſubſtantiation.

The VIth forbids buying and ſelling on Sunday.

The VIIth is againſt Perjuries and falſe Witneſſes (2).

Brompt. The VIIIth orders the Biſhops to aſſiſt the Judges in the execution of the Laws, and to ſit upon the Bench with them (3).

The IXth lays a Fine upon remiſs and negligent Magiſtrates, which was to be paid to the Biſhop (4).

Spelman, Vol. I. P. 425. We find another Synod, or mixt Aſſembly, in the Reign of Edmund, wherein the Ceremonies of Marriage, and Preliminary Securities the Parties to give one another, are ſettled.

I have ſpoken elſewhere of the Council where Edgar harangued ſo ſtrenuouſly againſt the ſecular Prieſts, and of ſeveral others, that were aſſembled on occaſion of the Controverſy between the Monks and Clergy, and therefore ſhall ſay nothing more of them here.

Odo's Conſtitutions. 923. Spelman, Conc. Vol. I. P. 415. To the Eccleſiaſtical Laws paſſed at theſe General Aſſemblies or Councils, may be aptly ſubjoined certain Conſtitutions made in thoſe days. The ten following are Odo's, Archbiſhop of Canterbury.

The firſt threatens all thoſe who injure the Church in her Property with Excommunication.

The IId exhorts Princes [and other great Men] to be governed by the directions of the Biſhops, becauſe God has entruſted them with the Keys of the Kingdom of Heaven.

The IIId admoniſhes Biſhops to diſcharge their Duty (5), without any mercenary Views, or reſpect of Perſons.

The IVth and Vth give good Advice to the Clergy.

The VIth does the ſame with regard to the Monks.

The VIIth prohibits unlawful Marriages, upon the ſcore of nearneſs of Relarion: But the degrees of Conſanguinity and Affinity are not recited.

The VIIIth recommends Unity and Charity among Chriſtians.

The IXth preſſes faſting on Wedneſdays, Fridays, and the four Ember Weeks.

The Xth enjoins the punctual Payment of Tithes, from Reaſons taken out of the Old Teſtament, without any mention of Ethelwulph's Charter. Mal. iii. 12.

There are other Conſtitutions, publiſhed under King Edgar, but the Author of them is unknown. The principal are, Other Conſtitutions. Spelman, P. 444.

The Iſt, which confirms the Civil Privileges and Immunities of the Church, and orders the payment of Tithes (6).

And the Vth, by which the Solemnity of Sunday is to begin at three o' Clock on Saturday in the Afternoon (7).

In this Reign were publiſh'd a Body of Canons (8), of which the following are particularly remarkable.

By the Vth, if a Prieſt receiv'd any Injury, the Complaint was to be preferr'd to the Synod, who were to treat the Caſe, as if the Injury had actually been done to the whole Body of the Clergy, and take care that ſatisfaction be made at the Diſcretion of the Biſhop of the Dioceſe.

The XIth enjoins the Prieſts to learn ſome employment, in order to get their livelihood in caſe of misfortune.

The XVIIth orders Parents to teach their Children the Lord's-Prayer and the Apoſtles-Creed, without which they were neither to be admitted to the Euchariſt, nor buried in conſecrated ground.

The XXIXth forbids the burying in Churches all thoſe that were not of known and approv'd Probity.

The XXXIId prohibits the Prieſts from officiating without the Service-Book before them, for fear the truſting to their Memories might make them miſtake.

By the XXXVIth, no Perſon was to eat or drink before the receiving the Communion.

The XXXVIIIth enjoyins the Prieſt to have the holy Euchariſt (9) always ready by him: But in caſe it grew ſo ſtale that it could not be eaten without diſguſting the Palate, it was to be burnt in a clear Fire, and the Aſhes laid under the Altar. Heuce it is eaſy to ſee what the Church's Opinion was then of the Euchariſt, ſince it was believ'd it could grow ſtale, and was to be burnt after it was ſpoil'd (10).

The LIIId forbids the eating of Blood (11).

After theſe Canons, there follows a very particular Form of Confeſſion, with what Penances the Confeſſor is to enjoin. We find here that the Penitent was order'd to ſay the Lord's Prayer threeſcore times a day,

(1) London was to have eight, Winchester ſix, Lewis, Southampton, Exeter, Shaftſbury, Wareham, two each, and every other great Town was to have one. If any Perſon belonging to theſe Mints was found guilty of debaſing the Coin (which was to be all of one Sort) his right Hand was to be cut off, and nailed upon the out-ſide of the Mint. See Spelman, Conc. Vol. I. p. 399. The ſame Appointment was made by Athelſtan, only he ordered that (beſides the Places here mentioned) Canterbury ſhould have ſeven, Rocheſter three, Haſtings and Chicheſter one each, &c. See Leg. 64. in Wilkins.

(2) The Penalty is, not to be believed afterwards, and to be debarred of Chriſtian Burial.

(3) In this ſame Council were ſome remarkable Civil Laws enacted, particularly one againſt Thieves, requiring, That if a Thief be taken in the fact no man ſhall ſpare him, if he be above twenty years old, and had ſtole any thing above the value of eight pence. If any one do contrary thereto, he ſhall pay the value of the Thief's head, and make amends for the fault, and yet the Thief himſelf ſhall not be ſpared; who if he contumaciouſly make reſiſtance, or fly for it, ſhall find no favour. A Thief caſt into Priſon ſhall there ſtay forty days, and then after the payment of one hundred and twenty Shillings be diſcharged; but his Kindred muſt give ſecurity for his good behaviour; after which if he ſteal again, they muſt either pay the value of his Head, or bring him back to Priſon; and in caſe one reſiſt, he ſhall pay to the King, or to any other whom it concerns, the value of his own Head; and if any defend him, he ſhall pay to the King one hundred and twenty Shillings.

(4) Namely, of the Dioceſe where the Magiſtrate lived.

(5) That is, to go and preach about their Dioceſe every Year, &c.

(6) The IIId orders the Payment of the Tithe of Cattle before Whitſuntide, of the Fruits of the Earth before the Equinox, and of Seeds at the Feaſt of St. Martin. Spelman, p. 444.

(7) And to continue 'till break of Day on Monday, Spelman, p. 445. Edgar made ſeveral other Conſtitutions for the Regulation of Religious Houſes. In thoſe in the Book belonging to Winchester Cathedral, Edgar makes himſelf General of the Monks, and Queen of the Nuns. Spelman, p. 447.

(9) That is, the conſecrated Bread. Had they thought then, that our Saviour's Fleſh and Bones, as the Trent Catechiſm words it, had been preſent under the Appearance of Bread, they would never have burnt the Euchariſt in this manner.

but

but not ſo much as one Ave Maria; a clear evidence, that the praying to the Virgin Mary was not yet introduced into the Church.

Nothing more remains relating to the Church of thoſe Days, but to give a brief account of the moſt noted Perſons for Piety and Learning.

Swithin. The firſt Saint we meet with is Swithin or Swithun (1,) who having been Preceptor to King Ethelwulph, was promoted to the See of Wincheſter. By his advice Ethelwulph is ſaid to have granted a Charter of the Tithes to the Church. This alone was ſufficient to gain him a Saintſhip, though he had been diſtinguiſhed upon no other account. But beſides this, he is affirmed to have wrought abundance of Miracles, with which I do not think proper to ſwell this Abridgment.

Humbert. Humbert, Biſhop of Eaſt-Anglia, maſſacred, or, if you will, martyr'd by the Danes, with King Edmund, has the Honour alſo of being rank'd with the Saints.

Alfred. Alfred the Great, independently of his Royal Dignity, was one of the moſt conſiderable for his Piety and Learning (2).

Scotus. Aſſer. vit. Alfr. Johannes Scotus, ſirnamed Erigena, that is, Iriſhman, [Ireland being then called Erin] liv'd at this time. He had acquired a great Reputation in France, where Charles the Bald entertained him at his Court, and uſed to converſe with him with great Familiary (3) when Alfred invited him into England. At firſt he was the King's Preceptor in Languages and the other Sciences; afterwards he taught at Oxford, from whence, in all probability, he was removed to Malmsbury, ſince it was in this Monaſtery that he is ſaid to be ſtabb'd to death by his Scholars with Penknives. Before he left France, he was engaged by the Emperor's Order in the Diſpute concerning the Nature of the Euchariſt. In his Treatiſe (4) upon this Subject, he ſtrongly argued againſt Paſcaſius's Doctrine, who maintained, the Body of Chriſt in the Euchariſt to be the ſame that was born of the Bleſſed Virgin. It muſt needs be, that the contrary Opinion defended by Scotus, was not look'd upon then as heretical, ſince it prevented not Alfred from inviting him into England, from having a very great eſteem for him, and entruſting him with the Education of Youth. Nay it is certain, he was honoured as a Saint and a Martyr after his Death. Roger de Hoveden ſays, Scotus at firſt had an obſcure burial; but afterwards a miraculous Light ſhining over his Grave for ſeveral Nights together, the Monks of St. Lawrence's removed his Body into their Church, and buried it cloſe by the Altar. His Epitaph alſo, the antiquity whereof, according to Malmsbury, appears from the Structure and Diction of the Verſes (5), is expreſs for his paſſing for a Saint, when that was made. All theſe Circumſtances are a ſtrong Preſumption, at leaſt, that Tranſubſtantiation was not the Doctrine of the Church of England at that time. For had it been ſo, how was it poſſible the Engliſh ſhould honour as a Saint one that had ſo openly combated their Opinions? This inference a little perplexes the Roman Catholicks. However, one of their Hiſtorians does not ſcruple to own, that the Name of Scot is regiſtred in the SUPPLEMENT of the Gallican Martyrology, and commemorated among the Saints on the fourth of the Ides of November. He moreover adds, that his Name had been inſerted even in the Roman Martyrology, and did remain there 'till expung'd by Cardinal Baronius. This Hiſtorian indeed pretends, Scotus retracted his former Errors: but gives us no Authority for what he ſays. He only alledges, that without a Recantation it is not likely the Church would have honoured his Memory. But this is ſuppoſing that Tranſubſtantiation was the Doctrine of the Church at that time, which muſt firſt be proved, before this Argument can be of any force.

Grimbald liv'd alſo in the ſame Century: He was one of the firſt Claſs for his Learning, and had a great Reputation. He was invited into England by Alfred the Great (who was acquainted with him at Rheims) and preferred to the Government of the new Abby at Wincheſter. Grimbald. Aſſer.

Among the Engliſhmen, eminent for their Learning, Aſſerius was one of the moſt conſiderable. He wrote the Life of Alfred the Great in 893, and died Biſhop of St. David's in Wales (6). He muſt not be confounded with another of the ſame Name, Biſhop of Sherburn, who died in 883. Aſſerius Menevenſis.

Werefrid, Biſhop of Worceſter in Mercia, lived in the Reign of King Buthred. When the Danes became Maſters of Mercia, he retired into France, from whence he was recalled by King Alfred. He tranſlated the Dialogues of Gregory the Great into Saxon; and having acquired a great Reputation when living, he was regiſtered a Saint, after his Death. Werefrid. Aſſer.

Plegmund, who was Archbiſhop of Canterbury, paſſed for a very learned Prelate, and was particularly eminent for his Skill in Divinity. Plegmund. Id.

Dunulf had been an Herdſman. He is affirmed by ſome to be the ſame that ſheltered Alfred, whilſt the Danes were Maſters of the Kingdom. However this be, he had the good fortune to be known to this Prince; who finding him a Perſon of a Genius ſuperior to his Birth and Employment, got him inſtructed in Learning, and promoted him afterwards to the See of Wincheſter. As this City was then the Metropolis of Weſſex, where Alfred kept his uſual Reſidence, he uſed the Advice of this Prelate in Affairs of the greateſt Moment. Dunulf.

Wulfig Biſhop of London, had alſo a great ſhare in Alfred's Eſteem, as appears by his Letter to this Prelate prefixed to his Tranſlation of Gregory's Paſtoral. Wulfig.

Neots was an Abbot diſtinguiſhed for his Birth, Learning, Regularity, and Zeal for promoting the Intereſt of the true Religion. Some ſay, he was nearly related to King Alfred, and others that he was deſcended from the Blood-Royal of Eaſt-Anglia. He died in 890 in Cornwall, where he left his Name to the Town of Neotſtow or St. Neods (7). Neots.

Odo, Archbiſhop of Canterbury, was the Son of an Eaſt-Anglian-Dane. Though he was born of Pagan Parents, he had the good Fortune to know and reliſh the Chriſtian Religion, and for that reaſon was expelled his Father's Houſe. In this extremity, he put himſelf into the Service of an Engliſh Nobleman, who had him baptized, and ſent him to School. When he became capable he entered into Orders, in the Reign of Edward the Elder. His zeal, virtue, and capacity, gained him ſo great a Character, that Athelſtan made him Biſhop of Odo.

(2) He was twelve Years of Age before he could read, which he firſt began to learn upon this Occaſion. His Mother ſeeing him one Day mightily delighted with a little Book, beautifully adorned with Capital Letters in Gold and other Colours, ſaid, in his and his Brother's hearing, She would give that Book to him that ſhould firſt get it by Heart. Alfred, who knew not ſo much as his Letters, though twelve Years old, applied himſelf ſo diligently to his Buſineſs, that he never left 'till he could read and repeat the Book to his Mother. From this time, he had a great Reliſh for Books, and ſtudied hard. There is extant of this Monarch's Work relating to Hiſtory, a Paraphraſtical Tranſlation of Bede's Eccleſiaſtical Hiſtory, and a ſhort Genealogy of the Kings of the Weſt-Saxons. Poſterity had ſo great a Veneration for his Memory, that he has the Title of Saint ſometimes beſtowed upon him, and what is more, his Name ſtands in the Calendar of the Engliſh Martyrology, printed in 1608, and in two Saxon Calendars cited by the Annotator on the Saxon Tranſlation of the N. T. The Day of his Death is regiſtered on the 26th of October.

(6) He was bred a Monk of Menevia or St. David's, whom the King prevailed upon, with much ado, to come to Court, on condition he ſhould ſtay there ſix Months, and at his Abby ſix Months, by turns. He wrote the Life of Alfred to the 45th Year of his Age, i. e. to the Year 893, according to his Computation. It was continued to Alfred's Death by ſome later Hand. He ſhows through the whole a great deal of Modeſty. He mentions nothing of the viſionary Dialogue betwixt Alfred and St. Cuthbert, which other Hiſtorians largely inſiſt on. He is copied by Florence of Worceſter and others. This Treatiſe was firſt publiſhed by Archbiſhop Parker in the old Saxon Character. A new Edition is lately put out by Mr. Wiſe, Fellow of Trinity College Oxford, with a Vindication of the conteſted Clauſe about the Antiquity of Oxford. Another Piece has been publiſhed by Dr. Gale, under the Title of Aſſerius's Annals. The learned Editor does not queſtion but 'tis the true Off-ſpring of Aſſerius. Leland calls it the Chronicle of St. Neot's, becauſe he found it in that Monaſtery.

Sherburn.

Sherburn. Some aſcribe to the efficacy of his Prayers, the glorious victory, obtained by that Prince over the Danes at Brunanburgh. Odo had no leſs Intereſt with King Edmund, who reſolved to promote him to the Archiepiſopal See of Canterbury. But Odo modeſtly excuſed himſelf, telling the King his Abilities were too ſlender for ſo high a Poſt. The King not admitting his excuſe, he further alledged, that Tranſlations were not warrantable by the Canons. This ſcruple being removed, by the Examples of Juſtus and Mellitus who were tranſlated from Rocheſter and London to Canterbury, he ſtarted another Objection, and alledged, that the Archbiſhops from Auguſtin downwards having been all Monks (1), he looked upon himſelf as unqualified for that Station, ſince he had not been educated under any religious Rule. This new difficulty was alſo got over by ſending to the Abbot of Fleury in France, and entreating him to admit Odo into his Society. Thus the Prelate having nothing more to object, accepted at length, though with great Reluctance, the See of Canterbury. As he became afterwards a vigorous Champion for the Monks, it may be preſumed, this was one of the chief Reaſons of placing him among the moſt illuſtrious Eccleſiaſticks of his time. He is ſaid alſo to have the Gift of Miracles, which the Favourers of the Monks ſeldom fail to be honoured with.

Dunſtan would make a large Article here, did I not think what I have elſewhere ſaid of him ſufficiently makes known his Character. There are modern Hiſtorians, even among the Proteſtants themſelves, who, carried away by the Teſtimonies of the antient Writers, have given great Commendations to this pretended Saint, without conſidering upon what doubtful Authorities they proceed. It is highly probable, that Dunſtan's firm adherence to the Monks, was the Ground of thoſe exceſſive praiſes beſtowed on him, of which, perhaps, he would otherwiſe have been deemed unworthy (2). Dunſtan.

The ſame may be ſaid of Ethelwald, Biſhop of Wincheſter, and Oſwald, Biſhop of Worceſter firſt, and afterwards Archbiſhop of York. Their great Zeal in the Cauſe of the Monks, is doubleſs what contributed moſt to their Reputation. The Monks, being almoſt the only Writers in thoſe Days, have drawn the Characters of Perſons according to their Prejudices or Intereſts. Ethelwald and Oſwald.

Turketul, King Edmund's near Relation and Chancellor, became famous in this Age, for preferring a Cloyſter to a Court, where he lived in great Reputation. But what raiſed his Merit moſt with the Hiſtorians, was his rebuilding and reſtoring to its former ſplendor, the Abby of Croyland (3), demoliſhed by the Danes. Turketul.

(1) There were ſeveral that in all probability were not Monks, as Wigberd, whom Bede, l. 4. c. 1. calls a Prieſt, and Nothelm, who ſucceeded Tatwine.

(2) The famous Story of St. Dunſtan and the Devil is thus related by the Monkiſh Hiſtorians. As St. Dunſtan was one Day buſied in his Cell near Glaſſenbury, in making a Gold Cup of a curious Workmanſhip, the Devil appeared to him in a beautiful Form, tempting him to Sin. Dunſtan perceiving in Spirit who it was, takes up a red-hot pair of Tongs, and catching hold of the Devil by the Noſe, made him howl in ſuch a terrible manner, that he was heard all over the Neighbourhood. Hig. Polych. p. 270. Edit. Gale. Brompt. p. 878, 879.

(3) Turketul left the Monaſtery at his Death in Poſſeſſion of many curious Relicks; among the reſt Ingulphus (p. 51. Hiſt. Croyl. Edit. Gale.) mentions the Thumb of St. Bartholomew the Apoſtle, given him when Chancellor by the Emperor; he had ſo great a Veneration for it, that he always carried it about him, and when in any Danger, croſs'd himſelf with it. The naming of Bells, together with the Benediction, as a defenſative againſt Thunder and Lightning, being introduced in this Age by Pope John XIV. Turketul caſt a great Bell, which he called Gutblac. His Succeſſor taking the hint, added ſome more to it, and made the firſt tuneable Ring of Bells in England. Ingulph. p. 53.

THE HISTORY of ENGLAND.

BOOK V.

Containing the Reigns of the Kings of ENGLAND, from ETHELRED II. to the Norman Conqueſt, being the Space of about Eighty Eight Years.

14. ETHELRED II.

978. ETHELRED II. crown'd.

AFTER the murder of Edward, there was not the leaſt pretence to refuſe the Crown to his Brother Ethelred, who was the only Prince of the Royal Family, and too young to be accuſed of partaking in his Mother's Crime. Accordingly, Dunſtan could not help crowning him (1), being then but twelve years of age, though he plainly foreſaw it would prove fatal to his whole Party. It is affirmed, that Dunſtan at his Coronation foretold, by the Spirit of Prophecy, the Calamities England was going to be expoſed to in his Reign. But Predictions of this Nature are always to be ſuſpected, when attributed to Saints, ſuch as Dunſtan, by Authors who wrote after the Event. However this be, the People had very different thoughts of this new Reign. They flattered themſelves, they were about to enjoy a ſtate of Tranquillity, under a Prince who had already given an Inſtance of his good Nature, in bitterly lamenting the Death of the King his Brother, though it procured him the Crown. An Hiſtorian ſays, his Tears appeared ſo unſeaſonable to his Mother, that catching up a Wax-taper in a paſſion, ſhe beat him ſo unmercifully with it, that he could not endure the ſight of a Wax-light ever after.

His Character. Malmſb.

The firſt thing Ethelred did after his Coronation, was to remove the Body of the late King to Shaftsbury Church. Hardly had he performed this Office, but he found himſelf attacked by the Danes, who ſuffered him to enjoy no repoſe during the reſidue of his Life. If this Prince had followed the ſteps of his Predeceſſors, perhaps he would have cauſed the old Invaders to lay aſide all thoughts of any new attempts upon England. But his natural Cowardice, joined to an extreme Sluggiſhneſs (2), and inſatiable Avarice, and many other Failings, ſoon let them ſee, he was not like to prove a very formidable Enemy. For ſixty years paſt they ſeemed to have forgot England, and the Engliſh on their ſide, to have loſt all remembrance of the Calamities they had ſuffered from the Hands of thoſe cruel Enemies. However, after ſo long an Interval, during which the Danes ſettled in England, ſeemed to have entertained the ſame affection for this their ſecond Country, as the Natives themſelves, the foreign Danes took it in their heads to renew their Invaſions. They no ſooner appeared, but the others, reſuming their old Inclinations, joined their Countrymen, in order to improve the preſent Opportunity, and free themſelves from the Dominion of the Engliſh.

981. The Danes renew their Invaſions. Sax. Ann. Malmſb. S. Dunelm.

The Daniſh rovers made their firſt Attempt on Southampton, where they arrived with ſeven Ships, and after plundering the Town and the adjacent Country (3), they carried the ſame devaſtations into Cornwall.

This year another band landed at Portland, pillaged, and ſacked the Country round about, after which they proceeded elſewhere to increaſe their Spoils (4).

982. The Advantages of the Danes in the War.

Theſe frequent deſcents were ſo much the more incommodious to the Engliſh, as having ſo many Coaſts to guard, they knew not where to aſſemble and expect the Enemy. If at any time they happened to have it in their power to give them Battle, all the advantage they could gain, in caſe fortune favoured them, was to recover the Plunder. But when they themſelves were worſted, the Country was ſure to be expoſed to all imaginable cruelties before another Army could be drawn together. Very often, whilſt the Engliſh Troops were upon the march, to oppoſe one of theſe Bands, they were forced to change their Rout, and march where the danger ſeemed more preſſing. Thus, what care ſoever might be taken, one part of the

(2) This cowardly and ſluggiſh Temper of his was predicted by Dunſtan, when at his Baptiſm (like Conſtantine the Emperor, from thence called Copronymus) he bewrayed the Font, which, Malmſbury ſays, diſturbed Dunſtan ſo, that it made him ſwear by God and St. Mary, this Boy will prove a Poltron, lib. 2. c. 10. *de Geſt. (3) They either ſlew, or carried captive, almoſt all the Inhabitants. They came from thence to the Iſle of Thanet, and plundered it; and another Band ravaged Cheſter. S. Dunelm. p. 161. Brompt. p. 877.

(4) This year alſo the City of London was deſtroyed by Fire, but by what Accident is unknown.

Kingdom was always expoſed, ſince there was no foreſeeing where the Pyrates would land. There was but one Way to remedy this Inconvenience, which was, to keep a Fleet at Sea ſtrong enough to engage the Danes, before they diſembarked their Troops. But a time of Minority was not very proper to take ſuch a Precaution.

In this manner paſſed the firſt ten Years of this Reign. It would be needleſs to deſcribe at length the Ravages committed by the Danes during that Time. It is eaſy to imagine the whole Kingdom was a Scene of Murders, Conflagrations, Plunderings, and other Devaſtations, which, after ſome ſhort Intermiſſions, were continually renewed.

983. The Death of Elfric Duke of Mercia. Sax. Ann. Hoved.

During theſe Troubles, Elfric, Duke of Mercia, one of the beſt Supports of his Country, died in 983. His little Regard for the Monks after Edgar's Death, was probably the Reaſon of their reporting among their Votaries, that he was eaten up of Lice. Alfric his Son ſucceeded him.

984. Death of Ethelwold Biſhop of Wincheſter.

The next Year, Ethelwold Biſhop of Wincheſter, one of Dunſtan's Confidents, and a great Friend of the Monks, departed alſo this Life. He is ſaid to have founded a dozen Monaſteries. If that be true, he was, no doubt, aſſiſted by the Liberality of the two former Kings, with whom he was in great Favour (1).

Monkery goes to decay.

The Credit of the Monks declined very much in the Reign of Ethelred, as well by reaſon of the frequent Invaſions of the Danes, as becauſe the People, full of their Misfortunes, were regardleſs of every thing elſe. Nay, they began to miſtruſt the Sanctity of the Monks, not being able to forbear wondering, that Men who had obtained from Heaven ſo many Miracles on their own private Account, could not by their Merits and Prayers ſecure the Kingdom from the Calamities it was inceſſantly expoſed to. On the other hand, as their Credit with the former Kings had helped to acquire them a great Reputation, ſo this King's Diſinclination to them turned greatly to their Prejudice. Ethelred, whoſe Thoughts were not taken up with Religion, put the Monks and other Eccleſiaſticks upon a level with the reſt of his Subjects. He gave a convincing Proof how little he regarded the Clergy, in a difference between him and the Biſhop of Rocheſter. The Biſhop having haughtily refuſed to comply with ſome Demand of the King's, he ordered the Soldiers to lay waſte the Lands belonging to the Cathedral dedicated to St. Andrew (2). In vain did the Biſhop threaten him with Vengeance from the Apoſtle, and cauſe Archbiſhop Dunſtan to interpoſe in his Quarrel; Ethelred ſlighted both, nor could be appeaſed but by Money (3). Dunſtan, diſpleaſed to the higheſt degree at this Behaviour, denounced upon the King and his Council the Judgments of God, ready to fall on their Heads, for preſuming to lay ſacrilegious Hands on the Church's Property; but he was not heard. His Credit was ſunk ſo low, that hardly was he known to be alive, ſo careful were the new Miniſters to depreſs him. He died quickly after in the Year 988; not ſo much of old Age, as of Grief and Vexation to ſee himſelf no longer diſtinguiſhed as formerly.

986. Sax. Ann. Malmſb. Knighton.

Dunſtan loſes his Credit. Dunſtan's Death. Sax. Ann.

Oſwald Archbiſhop of York dies. Sax. Ann.

Oſwald Archbiſhop of York ſoon followed him. He was his particular Friend, and one of the three Prelates that governed the Church during the Reign of Edgar. The Death of theſe Patrons of the Monks, a contagious Diſtemper (4), which ſwept away multitudes, and moreover the continual Invaſions of the Danes, put an end to the Quarrel between the ſecular and regular Clergy, in ſuch manner, that it was never more heard of.

991. The Danes invade England again.

After the Danes had pillaged the Coaſts of England ten Years together, they gave over their Ravages for about two Years. This Intermiſſion put the Engliſh in hopes, their Enemies having turn'd their Thoughts to ſome other Country, would for the future leave them in quiet. But theſe Hopes were ſhort-liv'd. In 991, Juſtin and Guthmund, two Daniſh Captains, landed a great Body of Troops at Gipſwich (5). Whilſt they were buſy in plundering, Brithnoth, Duke of Eaſt-Anglia, advanced towards them, in expectation to ſurprize them, but found them too well prepared. He was overthrown, and his Defeat expoſed the adjacent Country to greater Devaſtations. The victorious Danes having nothing more to fear, penetrated ſtill farther into the Country, where they committed terrible Ravages. Ethelred, being without an Army, and unable to ſtop their Progreſs, was perſuaded by Syric Archbiſhop of Canterbury (6), to give them a large Sum to be rid of them (7). Perhaps he would have acted wiſer, if in Imitation of Alfred and Edgar, he had laid out the Money in fortifying the Kingdom againſt their Inſults. However this be, the Archbiſhop's Advice was deem'd afterwards very fatal to England. The Preſent given to this Band, ſerved only to allure others, who being no leſs greedy of Money, thought they had an equal Right to make advantage of the Weakneſs of the Engliſh.

Ethelred gives them Money.

993. Another Daniſh Fleet. Sax. Ann. S. Dunelm.

Two Years after, another of their Fleets ſailing up the Humber, the Pyrates landed on the north Side, and ravag'd in a mercileſs manner all that belong'd to the Engliſh in thoſe Quarters. Ethelred ſent an Army againſt them, under the Command of three Earls, Frœna, Frithegiſt, and Goodwin. But the Generals, having led their Forces in Sight of their Enemies, were the firſt that turned their Backs, and by their ſhameful Cowardice occaſioned the Loſs of the Army. The King had imprudently truſted theſe three Lords with his Troops, who, being of Daniſh Extraction, were ſuſpected of Treachery.

994. Sweyn and Olaüs invade England.

How great ſoever the Miſeries inflicted hitherto on England by theſe Foreigners might be, it is certain, they were nothing in compariſon of what followed. Sweyn King of Denmark, and Olaüs (8) King of Norway, allured by the good Succeſs of their Subjects in England, wanted to ſhare in the Spoil brought from thence every Year. To that purpoſe, fitting out a numerous Fleet, they enter'd the Thames, and landed their Troops near London. They made ſeveral Attempts to become Maſters of the City, but meeting with a braver Reſiſtance than they imagined, retired. To make themſelves amends for the time ſpent in vain before London, they went and plundered Kent, Hampſhire, and Suſſex, threatening to lay waſte the whole Kingdom. Ethelred, who had no more Conduct than Courage, not knowing how to put a Stop to theſe Ravages, had recourſe to the ſame Means made uſe of before on a like Occaſion. He bound himſelf by a Treaty to pay a certain Sum of Money (9) within ſuch a Time, on condition they left his Subjects unmoleſted, and departed the Kingdom. Whereupon, the two foreign Kings cauſed all Hoſtilities to ceaſe, and retired to Southampton. Shortly after the King of Norway paid a viſit to Ethelred (10), who perſuaded him to be baptized, and ſtood himſelf Godfather. At his Departure, Olaüs obliged himſelf by Oath never to infeſt England more, and performed his Promiſe.

Ethelred promiſes them a Sum of Money.

The two Kings return home.

It would have been happy for the Engliſh, if Sweyn, who departed at the ſame time, would have followed his Example. For they would have eſcaped all thoſe Calamities, that Prince afterwards brought on the Land. When he ſailed for Denmark, he left a Fleet at Southampton to keep the Engliſh in awe, and oblige them to perform the Articles of the Treaty. After his Departure, his Admiral very earneſtly preſſed the Payment of the Money. But, as there was no haſte made to comply with his Demands, he took their Delay for a Refuſal, and reſolved to renew the War. Mean while, to deceive the Vigilance of the Engliſh, he ſet ſail, as if he deſigned for Denmark; but on a ſudden he unexpectedly enter'd the Severn, and after deſtroying the Country of the Welſh with Fire and Sword, croſs'd the River and penetrated into Dorſetſhire (11), where he committed the ſame Ravages. All the Forces that could be brought againſt the Danes were as ſoon defeated as levied. They ſacked whole Counties, it being impoſſible to oppoſe them. At laſt, finding nothing more to plunder in thoſe Parts, they put to Sea again, and landed in Kent (12). The Inhabitants, by endeavouring to make ſome Reſiſtance, only increaſed the Fury of their Enemies, who treated them with the utmoſt Barbarity. To compleat their Misfortunes, a Fleet equipp'd by Ethelred to engage them at Sea, was render'd uſeleſs by the Diſſenſions and Unskilfulneſs of the Commanders. In this melancholy Situation, England would have irretrievably periſhed, if the Danes by a lucky and unexpected Accident had not been called to the Aſſiſtance of Richard II, Duke of Normandy, whom the King of France would have diſpoſſeſſed of his Dominions. Ethelred took this Opportunity to go

For, they not only refuſed to fight againſt the Foreigners, whom they ſtill conſidered as their Countrymen, but joining with them, even helped to deſtroy a Country they ought to have defended with all their power, ſince it was become their own. In this extremity, Ethelred, who had no reſolution, was far from imitating the Firmneſs of his Anceſtors, who in like circumſtances, were never daunted by Misfortunes. This

The Word it ſelf, as well as the Meaning, was altered a little after. At this day, in ſome parts of England a rich idle Man that takes upon him, is by way of deriſion called a Lurdane. But notwithſtanding this alteration, the traces of its original ſignification are ſtill viſible in the word.

Ethelred marries Emma of Normandy. Huntingd. l. 6. Brompt. Elgiva, Ethelred's Queen, dying, whilſt the Danes were thus inſolently domineering in England, the King demanded Emma (4), Siſter of Richard II, Duke of Normandy, in marriage. His ſuit being granted, and the Marriage conſummated, he thought himſelf out of danger, depending upon the aſſiſtance of the Duke his Brother-in-Law, when there ſhould be Occaſion. This expectation inſpired him with the barbarous and furious reſolution of deſtroying the Danes by a general Maſſacre. To execute Maſſacre of the Danes. Sax. Ann. Huntingd. S. Dunelm. Mat. Weſt. this Project, orders were ſent ſo privately (5) throughout the Kingdom, that in one day all the Danes were ſlain with ſuch implacable Fury and Cruelty, that the particulars cannot be read without Horror (6). Sweyn's Siſter (7), who was married to an Engliſh Lord, having at firſt been ſpared, Ethelred was ſo barbarous as to cauſe her Children to be murdered in her preſence, and then her Head to be cut off. This Princeſs, who met her death with an heroic Conſtancy, was ſeverely revenged ſhortly after.

Remarks on this Maſſacre. This bloody Tragedy, acted on the thirteenth of November 1002 (8), was very like the Maſſacre of the Romans by the Britons under Boadicea; not only the ſame Barbarities, but the ſame conſequences alſo attended both. The Engliſh, as the old Britons, were ſo far from throwing off their Yoke by this wicked Expedient, that it ſerved only to make it more heavy and inſupportable. Though Hiſtorians aſſure us, all the Danes in England were maſſacred on this occaſion, it is hard to conceive how this could be effected in Northumberland and Eaſt-Anglia, where the Danes were moſt powerful. Was it poſſible they ſhould ſtand ſtill and ſuffer their Throats to be cut, without making any reſiſtance worth notice? This conſideration makes me apt to believe, that by all the Danes, we are to underſtand only thoſe, lately ſettled in England, and diſperſed in Weſſex and Mercia.

Ethelred's falſe views. Ethelred was perſuaded, this bloody Maſſacree of ſo many Thouſands, would procure him ſome Repoſe. He could not imagine, the Danes would ever think of any future Invaſions. At leaſt, he hoped, in caſe the deſire of revenging their Brethren ſhould bring them to England again, the Engliſh would ſee the neceſſity of ſhedding the laſt drop of their Blood to prevent falling into the hands of their incenſed Enemies. He relied moreover on the Aſſiſtance of his Brother-in-law the Duke of Normandy, a powerful Prince, intereſted in his Defence. But ſuch a deteſtable Policy rarely produces the intended Effects, or rather, ſeldom fails of ending in the ruin of the Projector. God, who beholds ſuch Tragedies with horror, does not often ſuffer them to go unpuniſhed. Of this we have an inſtance in the miſeries that befel Ethelred and his Subjects, who were almoſt as guilty as their King.

Sweyn reſolves upon Revenge. Mat. Weſt. Walſing. J. Walling. Sweyn received the news of this Maſſacre by ſome Danes, who eſcaped by getting on board a Veſſel ready to ſail for Denmark. Their relation of the Cruelties of the Engliſh to thoſe of his nation, would have been ſufficient to throw him into reſolutions fatal to England. But when he was informed of his Siſter's death, and the barbarous manner of it, he was ſeized with a raging Fury. Every thing contributing to ſtir him up to revenge, he ſolemnly ſwore he would never reſt till he had ſatisfaction for ſo bloody an Outrage. It was not therefore with intent to plunder, that he made a ſecond expedition into England, but to deſtroy the whole Country with Fire and Sword. However, as he did not doubt but Ethelred had taken all poſſible precautions to oppoſe his Entrance, he would not ſail without being ſure beforehand of a place where he might ſafely land his Troops. Cornwall was then governed by Earl Hugh, a Norman, whom the Queen had placed in that poſt as a Man the King might perfectly confide in. To this Governor Sweyn diſpatched a truſty Meſſenger, to endeavour to gain him to his Intereſt, by the offer of a great Reward. Hugh yielding to the Temptation, promiſed to admit the Daniſh Fleet into his Ports, and ſuffer the Troops to land without Moleſtation.

Sweyn lands in Cornwall, and burns Exeter. Huntingd. S. Dunelm. Brompt. Upon this, Sweyn, having equipped a Fleet of three hundred Sail, landed in Cornwall with a numerous Army, and meeting with no oppoſition, marched directly to Exeter. As this City was in no apprehenſion of an Attack, he eaſily became maſter of it, and putting the Inhabitants to the Sword, reduced it to Aſhes. This firſt exploit was followed by ſeveral others, no leſs fatal to England. Where-ever Sweyn carried his Arms, revenge and not con-

(3) For the Payment of this Money every Hide of Land was taxed yearly Twelve-pence. A Hide of Land is ſuch a quantity of Land as may be ploughed with one Plough in a Year. Bede reckons it as much as will maintain a Family. Some ſay it was an hundred Acres, others, that it contained no certain Number of Acres. The Diſtribution of England by Hides of Land is very ancient, mention being made of it in the Laws of Ina. Danegeld was the firſt Land-Tax in England. It was afterwards called Hidagium, which Name remained afterwards upon all Taxes and Subſidies impoſed on Lands. The Normans called theſe ſometimes Taxes, ſometimes Tallages, and Auxilia & Subſidia. The Saxon Kings before this had their Levies of Money and Perſonal Services, towards the building and repairing Cities, Caſtles, Bridges, Military Expeditions, &c. which from the Word Bote, that is, repair, were termed Burghbote, Brigbote, Heregeld, &c. Danegeld was releaſed by Edward the Confeſſor, but levied again by William I. and II. Then it was releaſed again by Henry I. and finally by King Stephen. This antient Tax probably might be a Precedent for our Land-Tax for three or four Shillings in the Pound, when firſt granted. Kingdom was always expoſed, ſince there was no foreſeeing where the Pyrates would land. There was but one Way to remedy this Inconvenience, which was, to keep a Fleet at Sea ſtrong enough to engage the Danes, before they diſembarked their Troops. But a time of Minority was not very proper to take ſuch a Precaution.

In this manner paſſed the firſt ten Years of this Reign. It would be needleſs to deſcribe at length the Ravages committed by the Danes during that Time. It is eaſy to imagine the whole Kingdom was a Scene of Murders, Conflagrations, Plunderings, and other Devaſtations, which, after ſome ſhort Intermiſſions, were continually renewed.

983. The Death of Elfric Duke of Mercia. Sax. Ann. Hoved.

During theſe Troubles, Elfric, Duke of Mercia, one of the beſt Supports of his Country, died in 983. His little Regard for the Monks after Edgar's Death, was probably the Reaſon of their reporting among their Votaries, that he was eaten up of Lice. Alfric his Son ſucceeded him.

984. Death of Ethelwold Biſhop of Wincheſter.

The next Year, Ethelwold Biſhop of Wincheſter, one of Dunſtan's Confidents, and a great Friend of the Monks, departed alſo this Life. He is ſaid to have founded a dozen Monaſteries. If that be true, he was, no doubt, aſſiſted by the Liberality of the two former Kings, with whom he was in great Favour (1).

Monkery goes to decay.

The Credit of the Monks declined very much in the Reign of Ethelred, as well by reaſon of the frequent Invaſions of the Danes, as becauſe the People, full of their Misfortunes, were regardleſs of every thing elſe. Nay, they began to miſtruſt the Sanctity of the Monks, not being able to forbear wondering, that Men who had obtained from Heaven ſo many Miracles on their own private Account, could not by their Merits and Prayers ſecure the Kingdom from the Calamities it was inceſſantly expoſed to. On the other hand, as their Credit with the former Kings had helped to acquire them a great Reputation, ſo this King's Diſinclination to them turned greatly to their Prejudice. Ethelred, whoſe Thoughts were not taken up with Religion, put the Monks and other Eccleſiaſticks upon a level with the reſt of his Subjects. He gave a convincing Proof how little he regarded the Clergy, in a difference between him and the Biſhop of Rocheſter. The Biſhop having haughtily refuſed to comply with ſome Demand of the King's, he ordered the Soldiers to lay waſte the Lands belonging to the Cathedral dedicated to St. Andrew (2). In vain did the Biſhop threaten him with Vengeance from the Apoſtle, and cauſe Archbiſhop Dunſtan to interpoſe in his Quarrel; Ethelred ſlighted both, nor could be appeaſed but by Money (3). Dunſtan, diſpleaſed to the higheſt degree at this Behaviour, denounced upon the King and his Council the Judgments of God, ready to fall on their Heads, for preſuming to lay ſacrilegious Hands on the Church's Property; but he was not heard. His Credit was ſunk ſo low, that hardly was he known to be alive, ſo careful were the new Miniſters to depreſs him. He died quickly after in the Year 988; not ſo much of old Age, as of Grief and Vexation to ſee himſelf no longer diſtinguiſhed as formerly.

Oſwald Archbiſhop of York dies. Sax. Ann.

Oſwald Archbiſhop of York ſoon followed him. He was his particular Friend, and one of the three Prelates that governed the Church during the Reign of Edgar. The Death of theſe Patrons of the Monks, a contagious Diſtemper (4), which ſwept away multitudes, and moreover the continual Invaſions of the Danes, put an end to the Quarrel between the ſecular and regular Clergy, in ſuch manner, that it was never more heard of.

991. The Danes invade England again. Sax. Ann. Hoved. S. Dunelm.

After the Danes had pillaged the Coaſts of England ten Years together, they gave over their Ravages for about two Years. This Intermiſſion put the Engliſh in hopes, their Enemies having turn'd their Thoughts to ſome other Country, would for the future leave them in quiet. But theſe Hopes were ſhort-liv'd. In 991, Juſtin and Guthmund, two Daniſh Captains, landed a great Body of Troops at Gipſwich (5). Whilſt they were buſy in plundering, Brithnoth, Duke of Eaſt-Anglia, advanced towards them, in expectation to ſurprize them, but found them too well prepared. He was overthrown, and his Defeat expoſed the adjacent Country to greater Devaſtations. The victorious Danes having nothing more to fear, penetrated ſtill farther into the Country, where they committed terrible Ravages. Ethelred, being without an Army, and unable to ſtop their Progreſs, was perſuaded by Syric Archbiſhop of Canterbury (6), to give them a large Sum to be rid of them (7). Perhaps he would have acted wiſer, if in Imitation of Alfred and Edgar, he had laid out the Money in fortifying the Kingdom againſt their Inſults. However this be, the Archbiſhop's Advice was deem'd afterwards very fatal to England. The Preſent given to this Band, ſerved only to allure others, who being no leſs greedy of Money, thought they had an equal Right to make advantage of the Weakneſs of the Engliſh.

Ethelred gives them Money.

993. Another Daniſh Fleet. Sax. Ann. S. Dunelm.

Two Years after, another of their Fleets ſailing up the Humber, the Pyrates landed on the north Side, and ravag'd in a mercileſs manner all that belong'd to the Engliſh in thoſe Quarters. Ethelred ſent an Army againſt them, under the Command of three Earls, Frœna, Frithegiſt, and Goodwin. But the Generals, having led their Forces in Sight of their Enemies, were the firſt that turned their Backs, and by their ſhameful Cowardice occaſioned the Loſs of the Army. The King had imprudently truſted theſe three Lords with his Troops, who, being of Daniſh Extraction, were ſuſpected of Treachery.

994. Sweyn and Olaüs invade England.

How great ſoever the Miſeries inflicted hitherto on England by theſe Foreigners might be, it is certain, they were nothing in compariſon of what followed. Sweyn King of Denmark, and Olaüs (8) King of Norway, allured by the good Succeſs of their Subjects in England, wanted to ſhare in the Spoil brought from thence every Year. To that purpoſe, fitting out a numerous Fleet, they enter'd the Thames, and landed their Troops near London. They made ſeveral Attempts to become Maſters of the City, but meeting with a braver Reſiſtance than they imagined, retired. To make themſelves amends for the time ſpent in vain before London, they went and plundered Kent, Hampſhire, and Suſſex, threatening to lay waſte the whole Kingdom. Ethelred, who had no more Conduct than Courage, not knowing how to put a Stop to theſe Ravages, had recourſe to the ſame Means made uſe of before on a like Occaſion. He bound himſelf by a Treaty to pay a certain Sum of Money (9) within ſuch a Time, on condition they left his Subjects unmoleſted, and departed the Kingdom. Whereupon, the two foreign Kings cauſed all Hoſtilities to ceaſe, and retired to Southampton. Shortly after the King of Norway paid a viſit to Ethelred (10), who perſuaded him to be baptized, and ſtood himſelf Godfather. At his Departure, Olaüs obliged himſelf by Oath never to infeſt England more, and performed his Promiſe.

S. Dunelm, W. Malmſb. l. 2. c. 10.

Ethelred promiſes them a Sum of Money.

Olaüs turns Chriſtian.

The two Kings return home.

It would have been happy for the Engliſh, if Sweyn, who departed at the ſame time, would have followed his Example. For they would have eſcaped all thoſe Calamities, that Prince afterwards brought on the Land. When he ſailed for Denmark, he left a Fleet at Southampton to keep the Engliſh in awe, and oblige them to perform the Articles of the Treaty. After his Departure, his Admiral very earneſtly preſſed the Payment of the Money. But, as there was no haſte made to comply with his Demands, he took their Delay for a Refuſal, and reſolved to renew the War. Mean while, to deceive the Vigilance of the Engliſh, he ſet ſail, as if he deſigned for Denmark; but on a ſudden he unexpectedly enter'd the Severn, and after deſtroying the Country of the Welſh with Fire and Sword, croſs'd the River and penetrated into Dorſetſhire (11), where he committed the ſame Ravages. All the Forces that could be brought againſt the Danes were as ſoon defeated as levied. They ſacked whole Counties, it being impoſſible to oppoſe them. At laſt, finding nothing more to plunder in thoſe Parts, they put to Sea again, and landed in Kent (12). The Inhabitants, by endeavouring to make ſome Reſiſtance, only increaſed the Fury of their Enemies, who treated them with the utmoſt Barbarity. To compleat their Misfortunes, a Fleet equipp'd by Ethelred to engage them at Sea, was render'd uſeleſs by the Diſſenſions and Unskilfulneſs of the Commanders. In this melancholy Situation, England would have irretrievably periſhed, if the Danes by a lucky and unexpected Accident had not been called to the Aſſiſtance of Richard II, Duke of Normandy, whom the King of France would have diſpoſſeſſed of his Dominions. Ethelred took this Opportunity to go

The Quiet Ethelred enjoyed was of no long Continuance; the Danes ſtaying in Normandy no longer than was neceſſary to put the young Duke out of Danger, returned into England. Cornwall felt the firſt Effects of their Fury; then entering Weſſex, they became Maſters of Exeter. The Conſternation of the Engliſh was ſo great, that they made but a faint reſiſtance. Whether Ethelred was betrayed by his Generals, or the long Peace enjoyed by the Engliſh during the foregoing Reigns, had enervated their Courage, they were conſtantly vanquiſh'd. The King himſelf was ſeized with ſuch Terror that he durſt not venture to be preſent in the Battels for fear of falling into the hands of the Danes, who probably would have ſhown him no favour. In fine, the Danes, ever victorious, got poſſeſſion of the Iſle of Wight, Hampſhire, and Dorſetſhire, where they had their Magazines. From hence they made continual Incurſions into the neighbouring Counties, without any one daring to oppoſe them. England was then in a deplorable Condition. God, who beholds ſuch Tragedies with horror, does not often ſuffer them to go unpuniſhed. Of this we have an inſtance in the miſeries that befel Ethelred and his Subjects, who were almoſt as guilty as their King.

Sweyn reſolves upon Revenge. Mat. Weſt. Walſing. J. Walling.

Sweyn received the news of this Maſſacre by ſome Danes, who eſcaped by getting on board a Veſſel ready to ſail for Denmark. Their relation of the Cruelties of the Engliſh to thoſe of his nation, would have been ſufficient to throw him into reſolutions fatal to England. But when he was informed of his Siſter's death, and the barbarous manner of it, he was ſeized with a raging Fury. Every thing contributing to ſtir him up to revenge, he ſolemnly ſwore he would never reſt till he had ſatisfaction for ſo bloody an Outrage. It was not therefore with intent to plunder, that he made a ſecond expedition into England, but to deſtroy the whole Country with Fire and Sword. However, as he did not doubt but Ethelred had taken all poſſible precautions to oppoſe his Entrance, he would not ſail without being ſure beforehand of a place where he might ſafely land his Troops. Cornwall was then governed by Earl Hugh, a Norman, whom the Queen had placed in that poſt as a Man the King might perfectly confide in. To this Governor Sweyn diſpatched a truſty Meſſenger, to endeavour to gain him to his Intereſt, by the offer of a great Reward. Hugh yielding to the Temptation, promiſed to admit the Daniſh Fleet into his Ports, and ſuffer the Troops to land without Moleſtation.

Upon this, Sweyn, having equipped a Fleet of three hundred Sail, landed in Cornwall with a numerous Army, and meeting with no oppoſition, marched directly to Exeter. As this City was in no apprehenſion of an Attack, he eaſily became maſter of it, and putting the Inhabitants to the Sword, reduced it to Aſhes. This firſt exploit was followed by ſeveral others, no leſs fatal to England. Where-ever Sweyn carried his Arms, revenge and not con-

(1) Though not one of our Engliſh Hiſtorians have mentioned on whom or for what this War was made, John Fordun in the Scotiſh Hiſtory gives this Account of it: Ethelred having paid large Sums to the Danes, ſent to Malcolm Prince of Cumberland, under Grymo King of Scotland, to pay his Share; which he refuſed to do, and aſſerting he was only bound to make War with the reſt of the Kingdom, when required, Ethelred invaded his Country, on pretence he favoured the Danes: but preſently after the two Princes ſtruck up a Peace, and became Friends. (3) For the Payment of this Money every Hide of Land was taxed yearly Twelve-pence. A Hide of Land is ſuch a quantity of Land as may be ploughed with one Plough in a Year. Bede reckons it as much as will maintain a Family. Some ſay it was an hundred Acres, others, that it contained no certain Number of Acres. The Diſtribution of England by Hides of Land is very ancient, mention being made of it in the Laws of Ina. Danegeld was the firſt Land-Tax in England. It was afterwards called Hidagium, which Name remained afterwards upon all Taxes and Subſidies impoſed on Lands. The Normans called theſe ſometimes Taxes, ſometimes Tallages, and Auxilia & Subſidia. The Saxon Kings before this had their Levies of Money and Perſonal Services, towards the building and repairing Cities, Caſtles, Bridges, Military Expeditions, &c. which from the Word Bote, that is, repair, were termed Burghbote, Brighote, Heregeld, &c. Danegeld was releaſed by Edward the Confeſſor, but levied again by William I. and II. Then it was releaſed again by Henry I. and finally by King Stephen. This antient Tax probably might be a Precedent for our Land-Tax for three or four Shillings in the Pound, when firſt granted. queſt being his chief Aim, he deſtroyed all with Fire and Sword. Towards the end of the Summer, being informed Alfric, Duke of Mercia, was advancing with a powerful Army (1) to give him Battle, he reſolved to meet him. Ethelred acted very unadviſedly in giving the Command of his Army to this Lord, whom he had formerly baniſh'd the Kingdom out of mere Caprice, and whoſe Son's Eyes he had ordered to be put out (2). The Remembrance of this Injury being ſtill freſh in the Duke's Mind, he was pleaſed with having ſo fair an Opportunity to revenge it. As ſoon as he was in ſight of the Enemy, he feigned himſelf ſick on a ſudden, and pretending he was unable to fight in his preſent Condition, ordered a Retreat, which he took care to make with ſo much Confuſion, that the Danes very eaſily routed his Army. After this Victory, Sweyn took ſeveral Towns (3), with an immenſe Booty. But, as he had no deſign to keep them, he ſet them on fire, and went and paſſed the Winter in Denmark.

Sweyn retires.

He returns and burns Norwich and Thetford. Sax. Ann. Malmſb. Huntingd. S. Dunelm. Brompt.

The Calm England enjoyed upon Sweyn's Departure, laſted not long. In the following Spring he landed in Eaſt-Anglia, and taking Norwich, burnt the whole Town to the ground. Ulfketel, Governor of Eaſt-Anglia, unable to reſiſt him, gave him a great Sum of Money, to prevent his doing any further Miſchief (4). But upon Receipt of the Money, Sweyn breaks the Treaty, and takes Thetford by Surprize, a Town then of great Note, and ſerved it as he had done Norwich. Incens'd at this Breach of Faith, Ulfketel levied ſome Troops with wonderful Expedition, and poſted himſelf between the Daniſh Army and Fleet. Sweyn perceiving he intended to cut off his Retreat to his Ships, marched back to give him Battle, before he ſhould be reinforced with more Troops. He found the Engliſh very advantageouſly encamp'd, expecting him with a Reſolution to ſtand their ground, and exert their utmoſt in Defence of their Goods and Chattels, which their Enemies were carrying away before their face. The ill Fortune of the Engliſh was come to that height, that it was almoſt impoſſible they ſhould ſo much as once get the Advantage. The Danes obtained a ſignal Victory, though not without great Loſs on their ſide. They even own'd they were never in more danger of being defeated (5). Ulfketel, though of Daniſh Race, was the faithfulleſt as well as the braveſt of all Ethelred's Subjects, and did him the moſt Service. But it was not ſo with the other Lords. All the Hiſtorians agree, Ethelred was betray'd by all that approach'd him. Sweyn had his Spies, not only in his Court, but in his very Council. The Great Men, for the moſt part, were brib'd, or at leaſt there was ſcarce one that ſerv'd the King heartily, by reaſon of their little Eſteem for him. Whatever Councils were held to conſider of Ways and Means to reſiſt the Danes, the Diſſenſions between the Nobles, too common in the Courts of Princes ſo little reſpected, prevented them from coming to any Reſolution, or putting what was reſolved in Execution. The Avarice of the Clergy, and particularly of the Monks, very much helped to increaſe the Diſorder. Notwithſtanding their great Riches, they refuſed to contribute their Quota in Defence of the Kingdom, pleading their Privileges and Immunities, as if they had no Share at all in the Danger. It is no wonder therefore the Danes obtain'd ſo many Victories in a Country ſo ill defended by them, who were ſo much concern'd for it's Preſervation. The Famine that happen'd ſoon after, would have compleated the Misfortunes of the Engliſh, had it not accidentally proved the Occaſion of Sweyn's returning to Denmark for want of Subſiſtance in England.

1005. Famine in England, upon which Sweyn retires. Sax. Ann.

Upon the Retreat of the Danes, and ceaſing of the Famine, the Engliſh began to entertain Hopes of enjoying ſome Tranquillity, when they ſaw another Daniſh Fleet arrive at Sandwich in Kent. Ethelred immediately levied an Army (6) to give the new Invaders Battle: But, after committing ſome Ravages, they retired to the Iſle of Thanet, where it was not poſſible to attack them. They knew the Engliſh Army, conſiſting only of Volunteers who ſerv'd at their own Expence, would ſoon disband themſelves, as it actually happened. Winter coming on, the Engliſh returned to their Homes, it not being in the Power of the King to keep them any longer together. Then the Danes iſſuing from their Retreat, renew'd their Ravages in Kent (7) and the neighbouring Counties, well aſſured they ſhould meet with no Oppoſition. Ethelred ſaw no other Courſe to ſtop the Progreſs of a Miſchief that threatned the whole Kingdom, but to give them the Sum of thirty thouſand Pounds, with which they were very well ſatisfied. 1007.

Another Daniſh Fleet. Sax. Ann.

The King, being freed from this Incumbrance, celebrated the Wedding of one of his Daughters with Edric ſirnamed Streon (8), a very powerful Lord, whom he had juſt made Duke of Mercia. If hitherto Ethelred had lived in continual Fears and Troubles, it was nothing in compariſon of the Misfortunes he drew on himſelf by this fatal Marriage. He had inconſiderately taken into his Family a Traitor ſold to the Danes, who never failed on all Occaſions to betray the King and Kingdom to the Foreigners.

The King marries his Daughter to Edric, who proves a Traitor. Malmſb. l. 2. c. 10. Huntingd. M. Weſt.

Hardly was a Year paſſed ſince the laſt Treaty with the Danes, when they demanded the ſame Sum again (9), pretending it to be a yearly Tribute due by Contract from Ethelred. This Demand was accompanied with Threats of deſtroying the whole Kingdom with Fire and Sword, if the Money was not immediately paid. This new Pretenſion of the Danes convincing the King and his Council, there was no Poſſibility of ever contenting their inſatiable Avarice, it was judged the Money would be better laid out in equipping a Fleet capable of defending the Kingdom from their Incurſions. Neceſſity made them put this Reſolution ſo ſpeedily in practice, that quickly after the King had a Fleet well mann'd and victuall'd (10), the Command whereof was given to Brithric, Brother of Adric Streon, Duke of Mercia. Theſe Meaſures obliged the Danes to retire for fear of being forced to a Sea-Engagement, which their Ships were not ſo fit for as thoſe of the Engliſh (11). 1008. Ethelred fits out a great Fleet. Sax. Ann. Huntingd. S. Dunelm. Brompt.

The firſt thing Brithric did, after his being made Admiral, was to uſe all his Intereſt to ruin Ulnoth, a Lord of diſtinguiſhed Quality (12), but his Enemy. He accuſed him to the King of I know not what Crimes, of which Ulnoth did not think fit to purge himſelf by a publick Trial, being ſenſible his Condemnation was already concerted. He reſolved therefore upon a voluntary Exile, to skreen himſelf from this Perſecution; and perſuaded nine Captains (13) to follow him with their Ships. After which he infeſted the Engliſh Coaſts, and did as much miſchief as the Danes. Brithric, enraged at his Enemy's Eſcape, and his daring to brave him thus, put to Sea with eighty Sail to give him chace, and endeavour to ſeize him alive or dead. But he met with ſo violent a Storm, that the greateſt part of his Ships were loſt, or fell into the Hands of Ulnoth. Thus this great Fleet, which could not be fitted out without a prodigious Expence, was render'd unſerviceable by the Admiral's Paſſion. The Loſs became ſtill more irretrievable, by the Diſſenſion among the Sea-Officers; ſeveral of whom went and join'd Ulnoth.

The Fleet comes to nothing. Sax. Ann.

Hoved.

In the mean time, the Danes took advantage of theſe Diſorders. The next Spring two of their Fleets arrived in England, one in Eaſt-Anglia under Turkil, another in the Iſle of Thanet under Heming and Anlaff. Theſe Leaders joining their Forces in Kent, plunderted the Country, and then laid ſiege to Canterbury. The City would have infallibly fallen into the hands of the Danes, if the Inhabitants had not purchaſed a Peace with a large Sum of Money (14). 1009. The Danes arrive in Kent. S. Dunelm. Sax. Ann. Huntingd. Brompt.

Whilſt the Danes were pillaging Kent, Ethelred drew an Army together to oppoſe their Ravages. As ſoon as he was ready, he poſted himſelf between them and their Ships to prevent their embarking and carrying off their Booty. Probably, he would have executed his Project, and perhaps gained ſome further conſiderable Advantage, conſidering the Superiority of his Forces, if Edric had not found Means to bring off the Danes. The Traitor perceiving their danger, repreſented to the King, his Father-in-law, that it would be more advantageous to let them retire than hazard a Battle, which might prove fatal to him. This pernicious Advice made ſuch Impreſſion on the King, that he ſuffered them to march by, with all their Plunder, unmoleſted. In all the abovenamed Counties, London and Canterbury were the only places in the King's power. But at length they attack'd the laſt ſo vigorouſly, that they took, plundered, and reduced it to aſhes. Elphegus the Archbiſhop being taken priſoner, was afterwards murdered by theſe Barbarians (2). They proceeded with the ſame cruelty towards the Monks of St. Auguſtin's, whom they put under a decimation, deſtroying nine parts in ten (3).

England being reduced to this deplorable ſtate, all the great Men of the kingdom aſſembled at London with the King, to conſult upon a remedy for ſuch violent evils. The ſum agreed upon amounted to 48,000 pounds (4), which having received they departed with their booty (5).

They retire. S. Dunelm. M. Weſt.

Though the retreat of the Danes coſt England dear, the people thought themſelves happy to be thus freed from their enemies, hoping they ſhould repair by a peace, the damages ſuſtained by the war. But they were far from ſeeing yet the end of their miſeries. Hardly had they enjoyed any quiet, when news came that Sweyn (6) was entered the Humber (7) with a powerful fleet, threatning the whole kingdom with deſolation and ruin. As this Prince found the country unprovided with troops, and unable to defend itſelf, he quickly became maſter of Northumberland, Eaſt-Anglia, in a word, of all the Counties lying north of Watling-Street. But theſe conqueſts not ſatisfying his ambition, he takes hoſtages of all the principal towns; and leaving his Son Canute to command the newly conquered Counties, he advances ſouthward, and on a ſudden lays ſiege to London, where Ethelred was ſhut up. Though he was but ill provided with neceſſaries to beſiege in form a place of that importance, he imagined the citizens would be terrified at his Menaces. But finding they were not moved by them, he deſiſted from his enterprize, and went and ravag'd the weſtern parts of Weſſex, where he found no oppoſition to his arms. However, as he could not be eaſy whilſt London was out of his power, he reſolved to beſiege it once more. But whilſt he was preparing for the ſiege with greater precaution than before, he had information of Ethelred's departure from thence. This unfortunate Prince ever dreading to fall into the hands of an enemy he had ſo heinouſly injured, and perceiving himſelf unſafe at London, retired into Normandy with all his family. Whereupon the Londoners being left to take care of themſelves, judged it a raſh undertaking to maintain alone the rights of a Prince relinquiſhed by himſelf. They reſolved therefore to ſubmit to the King of Denmark, to whom all the reſt of the kingdom was now ſubject. Preſently after the ſurrender of London, Sweyn was proclaimed King of England without any oppoſition, no one perſon in the kingdom daring to diſpute his title.

15. SWEYN King of Denmark, and firſt of the Daniſh Kings in England.

SWEYN impoſes a great Tax.

THE firſt act of Sovereignty exerciſed by the new King, was an immenſe tax on the kingdom for payment of the Daniſh troops who aſſiſted him in his conqueſts. No Hiſtorian mentions the coronation of this Prince. Perhaps he neglected this ſolemnity, believing it unneceſſary; or, it may be, matters of greater importance afforded him no time to think of it, during his ſhort reign of leſs than a year. Some ſay he died a natural death, being choak'd by a rheum. Others believe he was poiſoned. Whatever was the Cauſe, 'tis certain he died ſuddenly, which gave occaſion to the legend Writers to ſay he was killed with a Club or Lance by St. Edmund, formerly King of Eaſt-Anglia. It is pretended, this Saint did it to ſave the town, where his Body lay buried (8), from being plundered for refuſing to pay the tax impoſed by the new King. The ſhortneſs of his reign, and perhaps his not being crown'd, are the reaſons Hiſtorians, for the moſt part, have not reckon'd this Prince in the number of the Kings of England.

ETHELRED II. reſtor'd.

ETHELRED II. 1014.

UPON the death of Sweyn, his Son Canute was proclaimed King of England by the Danes. But the Engliſh recalled Ethelred, promiſing to ſupport him in the throne, againſt all the attempts of the Danes, whoſe government was become inſupportable. Ethelred at firſt was loth to truſt to their promiſes, being apprehenſive of a deſign to deliver him into the hands of his enemies. But being encouraged by the good reception his Son met with, whom he had ſent before to ſound the people's inclinations, he returned to England. He was received with great demonſtrations of joy; and his Subjects ſwore allegiance to him again, as if he had begun a new reign, his flight being conſidered as a ſort of abdication of the crown. For his part, he promiſed to reform whatever was amiſs in the adminiſtration of the government before his retreat. The eagerneſs of the Engliſh to throw off a foreign yoke, made them flock to the King with ſuch zeal and haſte, that he ſoon found himſelf at the head of a powerful army. His firſt expedition plainly ſhowed, his misfortunes had made no great alteration in him. Inſtead of marching againſt the Danes, he made uſe of his Forces to be reveng'd on the Men of Lindſey (9), who had ſome way diſpleaſed him. After he had gratified his paſſion by the chaſtiſement of theſe people, he prepared to march and fight the Danes, who little expected ſo ſudden a revolution. Though Canute had for Canute returns into Denmark: The Reaſon of it.

The Cauſe of his leaving England.

The retreat of this Prince cannot but ſeem ſtrange, ſince he had never been worſted, and beſides, had many ſtrong places ſtill in his hands. It is no leſs to be wonder'd, that the Engliſh hiſtorians ſhould not explain the cauſe of ſo haſty a retreat. But what the Engliſh hiſtory paſſes over in ſilence, is ſupplied by the Daniſh. We are there informed, that Canute had a younger brother. named Harold, who being regent in the abſence of his Father Sweyn, ſeized upon the Kingdom for himſelf. 'Twas this that obliged Canute to leave England, with a precipitation that ſeemed to be an effect of fear rather than ſound Policy, as it really was. This Prince did not believe he ought to abandon the kingdom of his anceſtors, for the ſake of a ſtrange and newly conquer'd country, ripe for a general defection. And indeed, if the revolt of the Engliſh had engaged him in a long war, as was but too probable, what aſſiſtance could he expect from Denmark, whilſt the kingdom was in the hands of his Brother? He made it but too viſible afterwards, when having ſettled his affairs in the North, he returned with his victorious Troops to England, that he was incapable of the fear that was laid to his charge.

As ſoon as Ethelred ſaw himſelf freed from the Danes, he never thought of performing his promiſe to his Subjects. On the contrary, he reſum'd his old maxims, and impoſed, on ſeveral pretences, exceſſive taxes (2), which raiſed great murmurings among the Nobles and People.

Puts two Earls to Death for their Eſtates. Sax. Ann. Malmſb. M. Weſt. S. Dunelm.

To theſe occaſions of publick complaint, he added others of a more private nature, which deſtroyed all the hopes entertained of his amendment. Morcard and Sifferth, Lords of Daniſh extraction, who had all along firmly adhered to the intereſt of the King and their new Country, were ſacrificed to his avarice. To draw theſe two Earls into his ſnare, the King conven'd a great Council at Oxford (3), where he cauſed them to be murdered, and then ſeized their Eſtates, as if they had been condemned by the common forms of Juſtice (4). Algitha, Widow of Sifferth, was ſhut up in a Monaſtery, to which confinement ſhe was indebted for her after greatneſs. Edmund, the King's eldeſt Son paſſing that way, ſome time after, had a mind to ſee a Lady ſo renown'd for her beauty, and fell ſo deſperately in love with her, that he married her, even againſt his Father's conſent.

1016. Canute returns to England. Is favoured by Streon. Sax. Ann. Malmſb. Huntingd. S. Dunelm.

The calm England enjoy'd after the retreat of the Danes, laſted but one year. Canute having got poſſeſſion of the throne of Denmark, immediately ſet out for England, and, when leaſt expected, landed a numerous Army at Sandwich. Ethelred, being then out of order, Edmund his Son, with Streon Duke of Mercia, his Son-in-law, had the command of the army againſt the Danes. Edmund ſoon perceiv'd his Brother-in-law was a friend to Canute. This diſcovery made him invent ſome pretence to divide the army into two bodies, that he might be ſeparated from him, not daring to puniſh the traytor, for fear of exciting a revolt in Mercia, where Streon's Power was exceeding great. Beſides, he dreaded his Father's diſpleaſure, who would never be perſuaded his Son-in-law held intelligence with the Danes. Canute taking advantage of this diviſion of the Engliſh forces, made large conqueſts immediately; and the treacherous Edric, who had join'd Edmund with no other view but to betray him, finding he had loſt his aim, openly declar'd for Canute. This would have been rather an advantage than a detriment to the King's affairs, if the Traytor had not carried with him a conſiderable body of troops, with forty ſhips of war. This deſertion, which prov'd very ſerviceable to Canute, was a mortal wound to Ethelred. The People went over in crowds to the Danes, in proportion as the King's affairs fell to decay. Even Weſſex itſelf was not very ſecure (5).

Canute's expectations daily increaſing by theſe ſucceſſes, he turn'd his arms againſt thoſe of the Mercians who continued their allegiance to the King, and at length, with the aſſiſtance of Streon, entirely ſubdu'd them. After which he form'd a deſign to attack Ethelred in Weſſex itſelf. He had the more reaſon to expect ſucceſs in this enterprize, as Edric had artfully inſtilled into the Mercians that were in the Engliſh army, a notion that it was a ſin to bear arms againſt a Prince, in poſſeſſion of their country. All that Edmund could obtain of theſe troops, was that they would follow the King when he commanded the army in Perſon, refuſing to fight under any other General. In this extremity, Edmund uſed all poſſible endeavours to perſuade the King his Father, who feign'd himſelf ſick at London, to take the command of the army. But the more Ethelred was preſs'd, the more he was confirm'd in his Suſpicion of a deſign to deliver him to the Danes, imagining the Engliſh had no other way to make a peace with them. As he durſt not quit London where he thought himſelf ſafe, he refus'd to go to the army; and the Prince his Son had the vexation to ſee his troops diſperſe, without being able to oblige them to ſtand a battle. In the mean time, Canute taking advantage of theſe diſorders, enlarged his conqueſts with great rapidity.

He promiſes to head the Army. Sax. Ann.

In theſe wretched circumſtances, Edmund ſaw no remedy but to go himſelf to London, and try to perſuade the King to head the army. He prevail'd at laſt with great difficulty, and by his extraordinary care, rais'd another army more numerous than the former. His deſign was to give Canute battle, perſuaded as he was, that nothing but a ſignal victory could retrieve the affairs of the Engliſh. Ethelred came to the army according to his promiſe, but upon his arrival was ſeized by his old fears. Whether he had any ground for his ſuſpicion, or it was inſtill'd into him by the Traytors about his Perſon, he made but a very ſhort ſtay, returning to London with all imaginable ſpeed. After his departure, the army being much weaken'd by the retreat of the Mercians, who obſtinately refus'd to fight without the King at their head, Edmund was oblig'd to keep at a diſtance from the Danes, for fear of engaging at a great diſadvantage. Then Canute finding no farther oppoſition, became maſter of ſeveral counties in Weſſex, and ſoon ſaw himſelf in condition to compleat the conqueſt of the whole Kingdom.

He goes, but ſuddenly retires.

Edmund perceiving he was unable to ſtop the progreſs of the Enemy, reſolved to go and join Uthred Earl of Northumberland, who had levied ſome troops in the North. They ravag'd together thoſe parts of the country that ſided with the Danes (6), whilſt Canute and the Duke of Mercia laid waſte the ſouthern counties that perſiſted in their obedience to Ethelred (7). But Canute did not long ſuffer his Friends to be expos'd to the ravages of the Engliſh. The moment he was informed, of what paſſed in the North, he march'd thither with the utmoſt expedition, and compelled Edmund and Uthred to retire into Lancaſhire, where they were not very ſecure. Uthred, finding he was no match for Canute, thought beſt to ſubmit to the Daniſh King, who continued him in his government, though but for a little while. As he plainly ſaw the Earl had changed ſides purely by compulſion, and had reaſon to fear he would not remain faithful, he cauſed him to be put to death, and placed Eric a Daniſh Lord in his room.

Edmund being at a loſs what to do, retired to his Father at London, and earneſtly preſs'd him to exert himſelf on the preſent occaſion; but all to no purpoſe. Ethelred, who till then had feigned himſelf ſick, fell dangerouſly ill in good earneſt, and died ſoon after in the fiftieth year of his age, and the thirty-ſeventh of his Reign (8). Never was England in a more deplorable ſtate, than in the Reign of this Prince.

Their Dependants, who went about to revenge their Deaths, were forced to fly into St. Frideſwide's Church in Oxford, which being ſet on fire, they periſhed in the Flames. But the King repenting of his Cruelty, cauſed the Church to be rebuilt. In this, and ſeveral other Particulars, it is plain, that Ethelred was egged on by the treacherous Edric, to make him odious to the People; and that he was not ſo bad as is repreſented, as appears from the good Laws he made, which are ſtill extant. He was ſo particularly careful of the due Execution of Juſtice, that having found one Walgeatus, a Judge, whom he loved, guilty of Injuſtice, he depoſed him from his Office.

16. EDMUND II. Sirnam'd Ironſide.

Edmund proclaimed King by the Engliſh. Higden. Polychron. The Danes declare for Canute. Sax. Ann. G. Malm. Huntingd. S. Dunelm. M. Weſt.

AFTER Ethelred's Death, the City of London and all the Lords there preſent proclaimed his Son Edmund King of England, who had already given ſignal Proofs of his Courage and Conduct. But the Danes and all the Counties in their Poſſeſſion declared for Canute (1). However as the Engliſh obeyed him againſt their Wills, abundance of them came and offered their Service to Edmund, whom they looked upon as their lawful Prince, though they were conſtrained to ſwear to his Rival. By this means the two Kings were more upon an equality, which occaſioned many engagements with various Succeſs, that ſerved only to prolong the war, but not to decide the Quarrel. The City of London being a great ſupport to Edmund, the Daniſh King thought of taking it from him, believing the depriving him of his chief Strength would put a ſpeedy End to the War. With this view, whilſt Edmund was elſewhere employed (2), he approached London, and forming the Siege, carried it on vigorouſly. But the brave Reſiſtance of the Citizens giving Edmund time to throw in Succours from the other Side of the Thames, Canute ſaw himſelf obliged to raiſe the Siege. Having thus loſt his aim, he uſed many Stratagems to ſurprize the Enemy, or draw him off from London. This laſt Project ſucceeding, he went and laid Siege a ſecond Time to the City. But he met with the ſame Difficulties as before; the Inhabitants, by a very obſtinate Defence, giving Edmund time to come to their relief.

London beſieged twice, and both times relieved.

A Battle where neither Side had the Victory.

Canute vexed to ſee his meaſures thus broken, ſuddenly raiſed the Siege, to go and offer Edmund Battle (3), who was no leſs deſirous of deciding the Quarrel, by one ſingle Action, and therefore, inſtead of retreating, marched towards him. In this Battle, which was very bloody, they both gave ſignal Proofs of their Conduct and Courage, without either of them being able to make Victory incline to his Side. After a long Fight, the two Armies were obliged to part with almoſt an equal Loſs. The Engliſh Army however had like to have been worſted by the Artifice of Edric Streon, who was on the Side of the Danes. This Lord perceiving the Engliſh Troops, contrary to his Expectation, fought in ſuch a manner as made the Victory dubious, cut off the Head of one Oſmer a Soldier, who very much reſembled Edmund, and fixing it on the Top of his Lance, advanced to the foremoſt ranks, and expoſing it to the View of the Engliſh, cried out aloud, Fly, fly, you Scoundrels, behold the Head of your King, in whom you truſt. The Engliſh were thunder-ſtruck at this Sight, which would have occaſioned their defeat, had not the King ſhewn himſelf with his Helmet off to his aſtoniſhed Troops, and by that means revived their Courage, which the Belief of his Death began to cool. The Battle laſting till Night, without any viſible Advantage on either Side, Edmund prepared to renew the Fight next Morning. But Canute, who had other Deſigns, retired, during the Night (4), to his Fleet that expected him, and imbarking his troops, rowed along the Coaſt for ſome time, to amuſe the Enemy, who could not gueſs his Intention. When he thought he had deceived Edmund, he landed his forces, and beſieged London a third time. But ſucceeding no better than formerly, he retired elſewhere.

Five Battles between Edmund and Canute in one Year.

The Particulars of this War would be curious enough, if it were poſſible to give a clear Account of them. But we meet with extreme Confuſion in this Part of the Engliſh Hiſtory. What may be gathered from Hiſtorians for certain, is this, that the two contending Princes fought within the Space of one Year, five pitched Battles. One of theſe Battles, fought in Eſſex, would have infallibly proved fatal to Canute, had it not been for the pernicious Advice of Edric Streon, who continually changing Sides, was then in the Engliſh Army. Edmund had been ſo generous as to pardon him, and ſo eaſy as to give Credit to his Oaths of being entirely devoted to his Service for the future. Nevertheleſs, this Traytor, who was a Creature of the King of Denmark, let no opportunity ſlip of ſerving the Dane. As he ſaw the Danes, hard preſſed by the Engliſh, retreating in great diſorder, he artfully perſuaded Edmund to ſtop the Purſuit of the Fugitives, by making him apprehenſive their Deſpair might cauſe them to rally, and the Victory, by ſome unforeſeen Accident, be ſnatched out of his Hands. This Artifice, which had formerly taken effect with Ethelred, wrought likewiſe with Edmund, who ſuffered himſelf to be guided by this fatal Advice. One is at a loſs which to admire moſt, Edmund's Imprudence in being governed by a Man of known Diſloyalty, or the Traytor's Boldneſs and Confidence. Tired at length with diſſembling his real Sentiments, he threw away the Mask in the laſt Battle near Aſſandun (5). Whilſt the two Armies were engaged, he ſuddenly deſerted his Poſt, and joined the Danes, who received him as their real Friend. This treachery cauſed ſuch Conſternation among the Engliſh, that throwing down their Arms, they thought of nothing but ſaving themſelves by flight. Edmund's loſs upon this Occaſion was irretrievable, the Flower of the Engliſh Nobility being ſlain in this unfortunate Battle. The Earls Alfric, Goodwin, Ulfketel, Ethelward, all of diſtinguiſhed Valour and Loyalty, fell that Day with their Swords in their Hands in Defence of their King and Country.

After this important Victory, Canute looked upon himſelf as irreſiſtible. He could not conceive, Edmund would ever be able to bring another Army into the Field that durſt look him in the Face. But as the Engliſh were in extreme Danger, they made extraordinary Efforts for their Deliverance. Edmund had for him the Hearts of his Subjects, and particularly the Londoners, who were always ready to give him effectual Proofs of their Affection and Loyalty. And therefore, ſo far was he from being caſt down by this grievous Misfortune, that he rallied his diſperſed Troops, and drawing together a more powerful Army than what he had loſt, went in queſt of his Enemy, who was marching to Glouceſter. Canute, for his part, unwilling to give him Time to augment his Forces, made haſte to meet him with intent to offer him Battle. The two Kings ſtood in Sight of each other for ſome Time, at the Head of their reſpective Armies (6), without either giving the Signal of Battle. The Dread of the Event held them equally in Suſpence. Edmund was ſenſible, he ſhould be irretrievably undone, if he loſt the Day; and Canute foreſaw a general Defection of the Engliſh, in caſe he were vanquiſhed. Thus, in all Appearance, the Gain or Loſs of a great Kingdom depended on the Succeſs of that important Day. At laſt, Edmund, who was ſtrong and robuſt of Body, and for that reaſon ſirnamed Iron-ſide, ſent Canute Word, that to prevent the great effuſion of Blood, that was going to be ſpilt in their Quarrel, he judged it proper for them two to decide it by ſingle Combat. Canute returned in Anſwer, that, though he came not behind his Antagoniſt in Courage, yet being of a weak Conſtitution and ſmall Stature, he ſhould take care how he engaged in ſo unequal a Combat. Adding, if Edmund was deſirous to prevent any further effuſion of Blood, he was ready to refer the Deciſion of Matters to the principal Officers of the two Armies. This propoſal was received with Joy by the Nobles of Edmund's Party, who paſſionately deſired to find ſome expedient to put an end to ſo fatal a war. Edmund, on the contrary, would fain have decided the quarrel by arms, but however, durſt not oppoſe the Nobility, for fear it ſhould occaſion their deſertion. Plenipotentiaries therefore were nominated on both ſides, who met in a little Iſle in the Severn, called Alney, overagainſt Glouceſter, to conſult about ſettling the pretenſions of the two Princes. After a ſhort conference, the peace was concluded by the partition of the kingdom. Weſſex, that is, all the country South of the Thames, with the city of London, and part of the antient kingdom of Eſſex (1), was aſſigned to Edmund. Canute had for his ſhare the kingdom of Mercia, including Northumberland and Eaſt-Anglia. Every thing being ſettled, the two Kings met in the Iſle of Alney; and mutually ſwearing to preſerve the peace, Edmund retired into Weſſex (2).

The Peace is made by the diviſion of the kingdom. Sax. Ann. S. Dunelm.

Edmund's challenging Canute has given occaſion to ſome Hiſtorians to affirm, the two Kings actually fought a duel in the Iſle of Alney. And to make this appear the more probable, they have taken care to be very particular in the circumſtances of this mighty combat. They tell us, after it had laſted a good while without any advantage on either ſide, Canute finding his ſtrength to fail him, lifted up the Viſor of his Helmet, and propoſed the diviſion of the kingdom, which Edmund conſented to immediately. It is further added, at the ſame inſtant, they ran to embrace one another, to the aſtoniſhment of the two armies, who were ſpectators. But the beſt Hiſtorians not mentioning this ſingle combat, it can't be conceived they would have neglected to embelliſh their Hiſtories with ſo notable an event, had there been any foundation for it (3).

Edmund did not long enjoy the peace, that coſt him ſo much pains. Edric Streon his Brother-in-law, fearing the union of the two Kings might prove fatal to him, bribed two of the King's Chamberlains to aſſaſſinate him. Some report, he employed his own Son in this execrable treaſon. Thus died that brave Prince, who deſerved a better fate (4). He had not ſat on the throne a whole year. But in ſo ſhort a reign, he had given frequent proofs of an undaunted courage, a conſummate prudence, and a generous temper.

17. CANUTE the Great, the ſecond Daniſh King of England.

1017. Canute gets himſelf acknowledged King of all England.

THE death of Edmund furniſhed Canute with an opportunity and pretence of becoming Maſter of Weſſex, which the lawful Heirs were little able to diſpute with him. It was not properly by force of arms, that he undertook to carry his point, but by extorting the conſent of the Nobles. How averſe ſoever the Engliſh might be to the Daniſh government, he was in hopes, the dread of plunging the kingdom into freſh calamities, would make a ſtill deeper impreſſion on them, and conſtrain them to comply with his deſires. Wherefore he required a general aſſembly to be called in Weſſex (5), in order to ſet forth his claim, reckoning it would be always ſeaſonable to uſe force, if he met with too ſtrong an oppoſition. Edmund having left two Sons and two Brothers, Canute did not ſeem to have any right to pretend to the Crown. But he maintained, that in the treaty of the Iſle of Alney, the agreement was, the Survivor of the two Kings ſhould ſucceed the other. He moreover plainly intimated, he ſhould not ſtand to the determination of the aſſembly, if the matter were decided againſt him. Edmund's two Sons were very young, and his Brothers in Normandy, where they thought of nothing left than obtaining the crown of Weſſex. On the other hand, Canute was in great power, and threatened very hard. Beſides his poſſeſſing half the kingdom, he had many friends among the Weſt-Saxons themſelves, without reckoning thoſe who were perſuaded any expedient was preferable to the renewing of the war. It was therefore ſcarce poſſible for the friends of the Engliſh Princes to ſurmount ſo great obſtacles. Had they been obſtinately bent to continue the ſucceſſion in the family of Edmund, they would have, probably, rekindled in the kingdom a war, which muſt have ended in its deſtruction. In this perplexity, they were contented with inſinuating, that they wonld agree, Canute ſhould be declared Protector of Edmund's children, till the eldeſt was of age to govern. By this means, though they placed not theſe Princes on the throne, at leaſt they preſerved their rights entire. But Canute was not ſatisfied with a borrowed power. He was willing to ſucceed Edmund in his own right, by virtue of the treaty of Alney; a right which though all did not acknowledge, yet none durſt openly conteſt. Though the treaty did not expreſly ſay what he aſſerted, he maintain'd it to be the true ſenſe thereof, and that it could not be otherwiſe underſtood without infringement. To prove this to be the deſign and intent of the parties concerned in the treaty, he called to witneſs all thoſe that were preſent at the concluſion of the peace, and demanded of them, whether there was any thing ſtipulated in favour of Edmund's Sons? And upon their anſwering, there was no mention at all of the Princes (6), he inferr'd from thence they had no right to ſucceed their Father. This reaſoning, weak as it was, being ſupported by the votes of his party, and moreover by the fears of the Engliſh in general, was ſufficient to determine the aſſembly to comply with his will. His reaſons were thought, or feigned to be thought, very ſolid; and without a cloſer examination, he was acknowledged and proclaimed King of all England, and all the Lords, both Engliſh and Daniſh, ſwore allegiance to him. Then he was crowned, and immediately after, he divided the kingdom into four governments, Mercia, Northumberland, Eaſt-Anglia and Weſſex. The firſt he gave to Edric Streon, the ſecond to Eric, the third to Turkill, reſerving Weſſex to himſelf, without appointing either Duke or Earl.

Canute was too politick not to know the motive of the Engliſh acknowledging him for their Sovereign. Tho' all that came near him, took care to hide their ſentiments, he was ſenſible an Enmity of near two hundred years ſtanding, and fomented by continual wars, could not be extinguiſhed in ſo ſhort a ſpace. For this reaſon, he reſolved to uſe all poſſible precautions to hinder the revolt of the Engliſh. To this end two things were equally neceſſary, namely, the gaining the affection of his new Subjects, and the getting rid of thoſe that could give him any uneaſineſs. Tho' theſe two projects ſeemed inconſiſtent, he deſpaired not however of accompliſhing them, and accordingly ſpent the beginning of his reign to that purpoſe. As he well knew, the moſt effectual means of becoming popular, was to cauſe Juſtice to be adminiſtred fairly and impartially, he publickly declared there ſhould be, for the future, no diſtinction between the Engliſh and Danes. After this, he publiſhed an Edict (1), ordering that every County ſhould be governed by the ſame laws as in the time of the Saxon Kings. He excepted however the northern Counties, becauſe they were peopled with ſcarce any other but Danes, who had introduc'd particular laws of their own, which there was no occaſion to alter. The ſame Edict denounc'd the ſevereſt puniſhments againſt Malefactors, of what nation ſoever; the King's aim being to let the Engliſh ſee, they had no reaſon to fear any reſpect of perſons. Theſe wiſe precautions produced the intended effect. The people were never weary of teſtifying their ſatisfaction to ſee themſelves govern'd by their ancient laws, under the protection of an equitable Prince, who ſeem'd to have no other view but the happineſs of his ſubjects.

(3) Ethelred Abbot of Rievalle, gives a very particular account of what paſſed before, at, and after this famous duel. With him agree Huntingdon, and Matthew of Weſtminſter. Malmſbury ſays, Edmund challenged Canute, but he declined the combat, and offered to divide the kingdom. Simeon of Durham, and Hoveden, mention nothing of the challenge or duel, but only ſpeak of the diviſion of the kingdom by the perſuaſion of Edric, in the ſame manner as the Saxon Annals. So great is the uncertainty of this fact.

(4) Malmſbury and Brompton relate, that the two Villains ſtabbed him with a ſharp piece of Iron, as he was eaſing Nature. Some will have him to be taken off by poiſon: Others to be ſlain by an Arrow ſhot by an Image made on purpoſe, which diſcharged itſelf upon the King's touching it. But this is improbable. (See the various opinions about his death in Brompton, p. 906.) The Annals ſay only, he died ſuddenly. He was buried by his Grandfather Edgar at Glaſſenbury. With him fell the Glory of the Engliſh Saxons, and by his death the Danes prevailed, and the Saxon Monarchy in a manner ended, after it had laſted one hundred and ninety years from the eſtabliſhment by Egbert, four hundred thirty two from the founding of the Heptarchy, and five hundred ſixty eight from the arrival of the Saxons under Hengiſt.

S. Dunelm. Brompt.

As ſoon as Canute ſaw the progreſs he had made in the hearts of the Engliſh, he believed he might venture without danger upon the ſecond branch of his project, the freeing himſelf from thoſe that gave him moſt uneaſineſs, and particularly the Saxon Princes. Alfred and Edward, Brothers of the late King, were retired into Normandy, with their Mother Emma, plainly foreſeeing it would not be in the power of the Weſt-Saxons to do juſtice to the royal family. As for Edmund's two Sons, they remain'd in England, being too young to think of providing for their ſafety. Theſe two Princes, notwithſtanding their youth, made the new King ſomewhat uneaſy, by reaſon of the People's affection for them. He would not have ſcrupled to put them to death; but he could not take ſuch a ſtep in England, without running the risk of becoming odious to the Engliſh, which was deſtroying his deſigns. However, as he did not think himſelf perfectly ſafe, whilſt theſe two Princes were alive, he gave them in charge to one of his domeſticks to carry them into Denmark (2), under colour of ſending them abroad to travel. But in reality it was only to have it in his power the more eaſily to diſpatch them out of the way, when their abſence ſhould have leſſened the affection of the people. The perſon entruſted with the Princes, being conſcious of the King's deſigns, was touch'd with compaſſion for theſe Innocents, and inſtead of carrying them to Denmark, conducted them to the King of Sweden, diſcovering at the ſame time his Maſter's intentions. The King of Sweden gave the Engliſh Princes a very civil reception; but however, not to quarrel with Canute, he ſent them to the court of Solomon, King of Hungary, his relation, who was willing to take care of their education. In proceſs of time, Solomon gave one of his daughters in marriage to Edmund; and to Edward, his Siſter-in-law Agitha, daughter of the Emperor Henry II. Edmund died ſoon after his marriage; but Edward had five children, of whom two died in Hungary: The reſt were, Edgar Athelling, Margaret, and Chriſtian.

There were ſtill in England two Sons of Ethelred II, both nam'd Edwy, of whom one was born in wedlock, the other a Baſtard. This laſt was call'd, but for what reaſon I know not, The King of the Clowns. Canute was no leſs troubled about theſe than the other Princes, every thing contributing to the ſuſpicions of a Prince, who, not being ſatisfied with the lawfulneſs of his title, thinks himſelf unſecure in the throne. And therefore to make himſelf eaſy in this reſpect, he baniſh'd them the realm. But ſome time after, recalling the firſt, under pretence of being reconcil'd to him, found means to diſpatch him out of the way. Th other, after enduring many hardſhips in exile, return'd into England, were he kept himſelf concealed, being privately ſupplied by his friends with neceſſaries for his ſubſiſtence (3).

*Canute would have been very glad to be freed with the ſame eaſe, from the trouble occaſion'd by Alfred and Edward, Brothers of King Edmund, who were retir'd into Normandy with their Mother. But he knew not how to get them out of the hands of Duke Richard II, their uncle. He was even apprehenſive, the Duke, whoſe forces were not to be deſpis'd, would one day eſpouſe their cauſe. To prevent this danger, he bethought himſelf of gaining the Duke of Normandy to his intereſts, by demanding in marriage his Siſter Emma, widow of Ethelred II, and by offering him at the ſame time Eſtritha one of his Siſters. Theſe Propoſals being accepted, the two marriage-ſolemnities were celebrated in a magnificent manner. If Emma was pleas'd with being once more Queen of England, it was not ſo with Alfred and Edward her Sons, who openly ſhew'd their diſlike. Edward eſpecially, never forgave her for thus ſcandalouſly eſpouſing the mortal enemy of her firſt Husband. Both of them were alſo extremely incens'd againſt her for conſenting, the ſucceſſion to the Crown of England ſhould be ſettled, by the marriage-articles, on the Heirs of her body by Canute. This was cutting off, as far as lay in her power, from the family of Ethelred, all hopes of ever mounting the throne.

One of the Marriage-Articles.

After Canute had by theſe precautions ſecured himſelf from all dangers from the Saxon Princes, he thought it time to get rid of ſome Lords, whoſe fidelity he ſuſpected, or whoſe power made him uneaſy. The three principal ones were, the Duke of Mercia, the Duke of Eaſt-Anglia, and the Earl of Northumberland. Theſe Lords had done him ſignal ſervices; but this was the thing that render'd them formidable to him, being ſenſible how it lay in their power to hurt him, if they ſhould undertake it. He knew Edric Streon was a Villain, and as he could not rely on his fidelity, ſince he had ſo often betray'd the two former Kings, notwithſtanding the obligations that ought to have attached him to their intereſts, he reſolved to begin with him. He quickly found a fair opportunity to execute his deſign, by even doing an act of Juſtice very acceptable to the Engliſh. This Lord, having one day the inſolence to upbraid him publickly, for not rewarding him for his paſt ſervices (4), and particularly for freeing him from ſo formidable a rival as Edmund, afforded him the pretence he had ſome time been ſeeking. Edric had no ſooner dropt theſe words, but the King anſwer'd in a rage, ſince he was ſo audacious as openly to avow ſo black a treaſon, of which he had hitherto been only ſuſpected, he ſhould receive his due puniſhment. At the ſame inſtant, without giving him time to reply, he commanded him to be immediately beheaded, and his body thrown into the Thames (5). It is ſaid he ordered his Head to be fix'd on the higheſt part of the Tower of London (6), that he might perform his promiſe to the traitor, to raiſe him above all the Peers of the realm. Thus Edric received at laſt the juſt reward of his treacheries. Eric, Earl of Northumberland, was baniſhed the kingdom ſhortly after, under ſome pretence. Turkil, Duke of Eaſt-Anglia, frighted by theſe examples, and perhaps by the King's emiſſaries, voluntarily abſented himſelf (7), for fear ſomething worſe might befal him. Several other Lords of leſs note falling in like manner a ſacrifice to the King's jealouſy or ſuſpicions, their poſts were fill'd with thoſe in whom he placed greater confidence. From this time the Engliſh began to enjoy a ſtate of tranquillity, which appear'd the ſweeter to them, as they had been many years ſtrangers to it, and had no reaſon to expect it. However they were forced to pay a tax of fourſcore thouſand pounds (8) for the arrears due to the Daniſh army, great part of whom were ſent back to Denmark (9).

Canute finding the whole kingdom in profound tranquillity, and having no reaſon to fear a revolt, reſolv'd upon a voyage to Denmark (10). His preſence was abſolute neceſſary there, on account of the Danes and Vandals being at war. He took with him ſuch of the Engliſh Lords as he ſuſpected, left his abſence ſhould encourage them to raiſe diſturbances in the kingdom. For this reaſon alſo he carried with him the flower of the Engliſh troops, under the command of Earl Goodwin, Son of Ulnoth, mentioned in the reign of Ethelred II. Goodwin, who was a perſon of great experience, ſignalized himſelf in this war, by a very bold though ſucceſsful action. The two armies of the Danes and Vandals being near one another, Canute deſigned to attack the enemies early the next morning. Whilſt his troops were refreſhing themſelves, in expectation of the battle, Goodwin privately withdrawing from the Camp, with the

At break of Day, Canute preparing for the Battle, and not finding the Engliſh at their Station, did not queſtion but they were revolted to the Enemy. While he was perplexed in his Thoughts at this unexpected Accident, he ſaw the Engliſh General arrive, who was come himſelf to bring him News of his Victory (1). Though this Action was of a dangerous Conſequence, the King however was very willing, upon this Occaſion, to diſpenſe with the Rules of Military Diſcipline, which requir'd that Goodwin ſhould be puniſh'd for daring to Fight without Orders. He received him with abundance of careſſes, and as a Reward for ſo ſignal a Service, created him Earl of Kent. I ſhall have frequent Occaſion hereafter to ſpeak of this Earl, who became at length the greateſt Lord in England.

Sax. Ann. S. Dunelm. Brompt.

This War being happily ended, Canute returned into England, where immediately after his arrival he convened the great Council (2), to confirm the Daniſh Laws, which, for ſome time, had been obſerved in part of the Kingdom, and particularly in Northumberland. There were then in England three ſorts of Laws, namely, the Weſt-Saxon, Mercian, and Daniſh Laws (3). But theſe laſt had not the Sanction of publick Authority, till Canute, at his return from Denmark, put them upon a Level with the antient Laws of England.

1025. Expedition of Canute againſt the Swedes. Sax. Ann. Malmſb. M. Weſt.

Canute, after his return into England, lived in profound Tranquillity, wholly employed in cauſing Juſtice and Peace to flouriſh, and rendering his Subjects happy. But ſome time after he was obliged to diſcontinue theſe pacifick Employments, and take a ſecond Voyage to Denmark, then invaded by the Swedes. This Expedition was not very proſperous. The Engliſh Troops he carried with him were great Sufferers; and he had the Mortification to meet with Misfortunes he had not been uſed to.

1027. He becomes Maſter of Norway. Sax. Ann. Hoved. Malmſb. Sim. Dun. Brompt.

Two Years after, unmindful of his ill Succeſs in the laſt War with the Swedes, he entered into another, which made him emple Amends for his former Loſſes. He reſolved to revive ſome old Pretenſions to Norway, which had never been fully cleared. Olaüs, who then ſat on the Throne of Norway, was a weak and unwarlike Prince. Canute thought it would be eaſier for him to proſecute his Pretenſions in the Reign of ſuch a Prince, than at any other time. He began the Execution of his Deſign with privately forming a ſtrong Party among the Norwegian Lords (4). As ſoon as Matters were ripe, he ſailed for Denmark with a conſiderable Body of Engliſh Troops (5), and ſuddenly landed them in Norway. Olaüs, who had no intelligence of his Practices, ſurpriz'd at this Attack, and more ſo, to ſee the major Part of his Subjects ſide with the Enemy, found there was no Remedy but to abandon his Kingdom, and ſave himſelf by flight. Upon his retreat, Canute was crowned King of Norway, regardleſs of the Right, ſo long as he had the Power in his Hands. Two Years after the diſpoſſeſſed Prince attempting to recover his Dominions, was ſlain by his own Subjects, and Canute remained peaceable Poſſeſſor of the Kingdom. Olaüs, after his Death, was ranked among the Saints, and honoured with the glorious Title of Martyr.

Canute turns his thoughts to Acts of Devotion.

The Conqueſt of Norway fully ſatisfied Canute's ambition. From that time, laying aſide all Thoughts of warlike Affairs, he gave himſelf up to Acts of Devotion: That is to ſay, he made it his principal Buſineſs to enrich the Churches and Monaſteries; as if the Uſurpation of two Kingdoms, and all the conſequent Evils could be repaired by ſo ſlight a Satisfaction. Among other things he took particular Care to give publick Marks of his Reſpect to St. Edmund, formerly King of Eaſt-Anglia, ſlain by the Danes. Perhaps he gave ſome Credit to the Story of his Father Sweyn's being killed by that Saint, or rather, was willing to ſtifle the Report. However this be, he built a ſtately Church over the Grave of that Prince, and very much enlarged the Town where his Body lay buried, which from him had the Name of St. Edmundsbury. The Monaſtery, which was in the ſame Place, and called Breadicſworth, had been endowed by Edward the Elder. Canute enlarging the Building, and augmenting the Revenues, this religious Houſe became one of the fineſt and richeſt in the Kingdom (6).

Malmſb. de Geſt. Pontific. l. 2. Brompt.

After he had ſhewn, as he thought, viſible Marks of his Devotion, he reſolved upon a Journey to Rome, which he performed in 1031. Whilſt he ſtaid there, he made many rich Preſents to the Churches, and confirmed all the Grants of his Predeceſſors to the Church of Rome and the Engliſh College. He obtained, for his Part, certain Privileges for the Engliſh Churches, and ſome Advantages for thoſe who came to viſit the Tombs of the Apoſtles. But the moſt material Privilege procured for the Engliſh, was an Exemption from paying any Toll as they paſſed through Italy. The Emperor Conradus I, who was then at Rome, and with whom he had contracted a ſtrict Friendſhip, granted him the ſame Privilege. The King of France was pleaſed alſo on his Account, to grant the ſame Favour to the Engliſh in his Dominions. By this means the Engliſh Pilgrims and Travellers were eaſed of a great Expence, and freed from a thouſand Inſults and Oppreſſions to which they were moſt liable in France, Italy, and Germany. We have a large Account of theſe Matters in a Letter writ by this Monarch from Rome, to the Aſſembly-General of the Engliſh Nation, informing them what he had done in Favour of his Subjects. In this Letter he profeſſes a great Piety, and a fixed Reſolution to govern his Kingdom after the moſt exact Rules of Juſtice, deſiring withal his Nobles to aſſiſt him in this good Deſign (7).

As ſoon as he came back to England, he applied himſelf to the Dedication of the Church of St. Edmund, which he had begun before his Journey to Rome. In fine, having ſpent ſome Years longer in continual Acts of Devotion (8), he died in 1036, in the nineteenth Year of his Reign (9).

Hiſtorians have not failed to give this Prince the ſirname of Great, a Title, which ſeems peculiar to Conquerors, as if true Grandeur conſiſted in invading the Rights and Properties of others. But, not to confine Grandeur within ſuch narrow Bounds, Canute may be ſaid to merit this glorious Title, if we conſider only the latter Part of his Reign. The End of his Life was very different from the Beginning. One would have thought he had not been the ſame Prince, who, to gain Kingdoms that belonged not to him, had cauſed ſo much Blood to be ſpilt, and trampled upon Religion and Juſtice. Some Years before his Death, he became Humble, Modeſt, Juſt, and truly Religious. If there be no Exaggeration in what Hiſtorians ſay of him, from the time he was thoroughly ſettled on the Throne of England, he gave daily Marks of Piety, Juſtice, and Moderation, which gained him the Affection of his Subjects, and an univerſal Eſteem among Foreigners. We have the following Story of him, which ſhews at once his good Senſe, and to what heighth Courtiers are apt to carry their Flatteries. One Day, as he was walking by the Sea-ſide (10), his Attendants extolled him to the Skies, and even proceeded to compare him with God himſelf. Offended at theſe extravagant Praiſes, and willing to convince them of their Folly and Impiety, he ordered a Chair to be brought, and ſeating himſelf in a Place where the Tide was about to flow, turned to the Sea, and ſaid; O Sea, thou art under my Dominion, and the Land I ſit on is mine: I charge thee not to preſume to approach any further, nor to dare to wet the Feet of thy Sovereign. Having ſaid this, he ſat ſtill for ſome time, as expecting the Sea ſhould obey his Commands. But the Tide advancing as

As they were both at his Court, and he could not help pitying their Caſe, he believed his Recommendatien might procure them ſome Favour in England. Perſuaded of this, as ſoon as he heard of the Death of Edmund's Sons, he ſent Ambaſſadors to Canute, to intreat him to give the two Princes ſome Part of the Kingdom of their Anceſtors. This Ambaſſy arrived in England, when Canute found himſelf ſo firmly ſeated in his Throne, that he thought he might ſafely diſregard the Sollicitations of the Duke of Normandy. Robert was ſo incenſed at his refuſal, that he reſolved to compel him to do Juſtice to the Engliſh Princes. To that purpoſe he fitted out a powerful Fleet, and embarking with a numerous Army, reſolved to make a Deſcent upon England, where he did not queſtion but the Engliſh would readily join him. But meeting with a violent Storm, he had the Mortification to behold the greateſt Part of his Fleet periſh; a Loſs which could not be eaſily retrieved. In the mean time, theſe Preparations ſatisfying Canute, that the Duke of Normandy really intended to attempt the Reſtoration of his Couſins, he endeavoured to amuſe him with offering them Part of the Kingdom of Weſſex. But Robert would not have been impoſed upon by this offer, had not his Misfortune at Sea conſtrained him to ſuſpend the Execution of his Deſign, as it induced Canute alſo to go from his Word. Some time after, Robert took a Reſolution to go in pilgrimage to Jeruſalem, deferring, till his return, his intended Invaſion of England. But he died in his way home. WHEN Canute eſpouſed the Princeſs of Normandy, it was agreed, that the Children by this Marriage ſhould ſucceed to the Crown of England. Notwithſtanding this agreement, Canute left England to his Son Harold born in Denmark, and gave Denmark to Hardicanute, his Son by Emma of Normandy (2). In all appearance, he did not think the Engliſh had been ſufficiently inured to the Daniſh Yoke, to venture to place on their Throne his youngeſt Son, who was not above fifteen or ſixteen Years of Age, and of no great genius. However this be, that Article of his Will met with great Oppoſition from the Engliſh. They looked upon Hardicanute, born in England, of a lawful Wife, Widow of one of their Kings, as the only Perſon capable of ſucceeding; whereas Harold was conſidered but as a Foreigner and a Baſtard. The Danes, on the contrary, were firmly bent to perform Canute's laſt Will and Teſtament. This difference might have been of ill conſequnce, if Harold had not with the utmoſt Expedition ſeized the Treaſure laid up by the King his Father at Wincheſter (3). By the help of this, he was enabled to make himſelf feared, and to gain ſeveral of his Oppoſers. Conſequently, in a General Aſſembly in Mercia (4), he ſecured a Majority of Voices, and got himſelf proclaimed King of England. The Danes were all for him to a Man, and of courſe, the Engliſh Mercians, or the Inhabitants on the North of the Thames, who looked upon the Danes as their Maſters, durſt not directly oppoſe their Will.

Harold proclaimed in Mercia, Sax. Ann. G. Malmſb. Ingulph.

Mean time, the Weſt-Saxons, who did not think themſelves conquered, as ſoon as they came home, convened an aſſembly of the States of Weſſex, and by the management of Earl Goodwin, Hardicanute was elected and proclaimed King of Weſſex, the Weſt-Saxons leaving the Mercians free to acknowledge Harold for their King (5). For the better underſtanding this matter, it muſt be remembred, there were Danes, or People of Daniſh Extraction, diſperſed all over England, but their chief Settlements were in Mercia, Eaſt-Anglia, and Northumberland. And therefore, in all the Country North of the Thames, called then by the general Name of Mercia, there were more Danes than Engliſh. On the contrary, in Weſſex, that is, South of the Thames, the Engliſh were the moſt numerous, having admitted among them ſuch of their Countrymen, who, to avoid living under the Dominion of the Danes, had quitted the northern Parts. By this means Weſſex was exceeding populous, and become more powerful than ever, being capable of bringing into the Field as great Armies as the reſt of England. After this manner the Kingdom of Judah in old time grew ſtrong at the Expence of that of Iſrael. The Forces therefore of the Weſt-Saxons and Mercians being equal, it is no wonder they were jealous of one another, and every one deſired to have for Sovereign, him of the two Princes that was like to be moſt favourable. It was very probable, this Diviſion would cauſe a War between the two Nations. But Harold, who was not poſſeſſed of his Father's Qualities, imagined he was not ſtrong enough to undertake the Conqueſt of Weſſex. It was owing therefore to the equality of their Forces, that the two Kingdoms remained in Peace.

and Hardicanute in Weſſex. Sax. Ann.

Hardicanute, who was in Denmark (6), made no haſte to come and take Poſſeſſion of the Crown of Weſſex; whether he was detained by other Affairs, or on this, as well as on all other Occaſions, gave way to his natural Sluggiſhneſs. During his Abſence, Earl Goodwin held the Reins of the Government in an abſolute manner, independent of Emma, the Queen-Mother, who was not beloved by the Weſt-Saxons. Mean while Harold was contriving to gain by ſecret Practices, a Kingdom which he found himſelf unable to ſubdue by Arms. As he had been deprived of it by the ſole Credit of Earl Goodwin, he believed there was no readier way to aſcend the Throne of that Kingdom, than by gaining the Earl to his Intereſt. He took advantage therefore of his Brother's abſence, to make Goodwin his Friend, by means, which, though not declared in Hiſtory, may be eaſily gueſſed at (7). Be this as it will, he ſucceeded to his wiſh. Goodwin, who was not very ſcrupulous, finding his accouut in what was propoſed to him by Harold, promiſed to place him on the Throne of Weſſex. This affair was ſo dexterouſly managed, that ſuddenly, on pretence that Hardicanute neglected to come into England, Goodwin procured Harold to be acknowledged King of Weſſex. This change however was not made with the unanimous consent of the West-Saxons, but by the sole contrivance of Goodwin and some other Lords, who engaged so heartily in the Affair, that it was done before any measures could be taken to obstruct it. Thus the West-Saxons saw a new King on the throne, without having the liberty to deliberate whether they should approve or reject him. This is not the only instance of the like intrigues producing the like events.

Emma forms a design to place on the throne one of her Sons by her first Husband. S. Dunelm. Ch. Mailros. Hoved. M. West.

Emma, Mother of Hardicanute, was extremely surprised at this revolution, which not only depriv'd her Son of the crown of Wessex, but herself also of the hopes of ever having any share in the government. She perceived, as matters stood, there was no possibility of recovering the crown for her Son Hardicanute; and therefore turning her thought another way, she formed a project, the execution whereof seemed to her very practicable, which was, to cause one of her Sons by Ethelred, to mount the throne. She was in hopes, the English would countenance with all their power an enterprize, tending to set the crown on the head of a Prince of the race of their antient Kings. Perhaps the desire of pulling down Goodwin influenc'd her project as much as her Son's advancement. To succeed in this design, there was need of great prudence and dissimulation. Above all it was necessary to find some pretence, without raising the King's jealousy, to send for the two Princes her Sons, who were in Normandy, that they might form a party for themselves. With this view, she feigned to be unconcerned at the expulsion of Hardicanute, confining herself to Winchester, where she daily frequented the Churches, and seemed to be wholly taken up with the care of her Salvation. When she imagined the King was sufficiently convinced of her disregard of State-affairs, she begged leave to send for the two Princes her Sons to Wincheſter, whom she had not seen since her second marriage. Her request being granted, Alfred and Edward arrived soon after in England, without discovering any other intention but to visit their Mother. They were caressed by great numbers of people, who, having English hearts, always firmly adhered to the antient Royal Family.

Alfred and Edward come into England.

Goodwin acquaints the King with the Queen's designs.

Goodwin, who was a person of great sagacity, quickly perceived the Queen's design. It was difficult to impose in ihis manner upon so refin'd a Politician. As soon as he began to suspect her, he employed so many Spies, that he found at length his suspicions were not groundless. He acquainted Harold with the matter, who seemed startled at it. But the Earl, who was not so easily alarmed, gave him to understand, the conspiracy was yet but in embryo, and might with ease be prevented; that the difficulty did not lie so much in avoiding the present, as in guarding against future danger: That to screen himself, once for all, from the like practices, he saw no better expedient than to make away with the two Saxon Princes, since so fair an opportunity offered. Harold approving of this project, Goodwin advised him to put on a seeming security, to draw them the more readily into the snare. This resolution being taken, Harold made as if he were ignorant of the Queen's designs, and the two Princes continued some time at Winchester, without his shewing the least uneasiness upon their account. At last, making use of an occasion, which naturally offered itself, he invited them to come and pass a few days at Court, before they returned into Normandy, where he feigned to believe, they intended to go very shortly. Emma was in great suspence on this occasion. She was very sensible it would be difficult for her Sons to gain a powerful party among the Nobility, without appearing at Court; where the Lords of the greatest credit were usually present. But on the other hand, she could not resolve to deliver them into the hands of a Prince whose interest it was to destroy them. In this perplexity, she took a course, which she judged proper to prevent the apprehended danger. This was, to send Alfred her eldest Son to the King, and detain Edward under some pretence: She imagined in case Harold had any ill design, he would defer the execution till he had both the Brothers in his power, seeing it would be to no purpose to make away one, whilst the other was alive. Goodwin, pleased that his advice had thus far succeeded, managed so that he was sent to meet Alfred, seemingly to do him honour, but in reality, because he was unwilling to trust another with the execution of his designs. Alfred's little train, composed of Normans, were at first charmed with the respect Goodwin paid to the Prince. But their satisfaction was quickly turned into a great consternation, when the Prince and all his attendants were stopped at Guilford castle, where they had been carried under colour of refreshing themselves. Alfred was immediately conducted to Ely, and, after his eyes were put out, shut up in the Monastery (1). The unhappy Prince had scarce time to be sensible of his misfortune, since he died a few days after, either out of grief, or by some more violent means. At least Goodwin was afterwards charged with his murder (2). As soon as Edward was informed of his Brother's tragical death he speedily returned into Normandy, for fear of the like treatment. Shortly after, Emma, receiving orders to depart the Kingdom, retired to Baldwin Earl of Flanders, who assigned her the city of Bruges to reside in. It seems somewhat strange, she should not go to Normandy to Duke William her Nephew; but probably, they who had the administration of affairs during the Duke's minority, did not think proper to receive her. And indeed, it was to be feared this intriguing Princess would increase the troubles of the Dukedom, where William was not yet firmly established.

Whilst these things were transacting, Hardicanute waking at length from his lethargy, formed a design of recovering by arms the kingdom of Wessex, usurped by his Brother. For that purpose he came to Bruges, to consult with the Queen his Mother. In all appearance, he would have found it very troublesome to execute this design, had not the death of Harold, which happened at that very time, removed all difficulties. This Prince died (3) in 1039 without issue, and without having done any thing memorable (4). He was sirnamed Harefoot, because his Foot was all over hairy, or, as others affirm, because he was light and swift of Foot (5). His death happened in one of the hardest Winters that had ever been known in England (6).

(1) His attendants were tortured in the most cruel manner by Goodwin's order, and decimated, that is, nine were killed, and the tenth only saved; six hundred are said to have been put to death in that manner. S. Dunelm. p. 179. M. West. p. 410. Knighton and Brompton mention one hellish kind of Torture, which, it may be supposed, was only practised then, and in the Irish Massacre in 1641. They rip up some of the People's Bellies, and tying one end of their Bowels to a Post, made them turn round that Post till they were all wound up upon it. Brompton, p. 935. Knighton, p. 2326. Rushworth, Hist. Col. Vol. IV. p. 411.

(2) This account of Alfred's death, Malmsbury says, was built on common Report, and not being recorded, refuses to vouch the Fact. But Matthew Westminster, and others, relate it without diffidence. Most of the ancient Manuscript Annals in the Cottonian Library, as also a Treatise called Encomium Emmæ (which, 'tis plain, Malmsbury never saw) being a Panegyrick wrote on that Queen, by a Monk of her own time, relate the matter thus. Harold seeking by treachery to get these two young Princes into his power, forg'd a Letter in the Name of Emma their Mother, earnestly inviting them into England, wherein, (personating her) "She gently chides them for their delay, in not coming over to inspect their own affairs, since they could not but "know that it daily confirmed the Usurper in his power, who omitted no artifice to gain the chief Nobility over to his party: Yet assured them the "English had much rather have one of them to reign over them; and therefore urged them to come as speedily and as privately as they could, to consult "what Measures were most proper to be taken." This Letter was sent to Normandy by an express Messenger, and received by the Princes with joy, who sent word by the same Hand, That one of them would be with her shortly, naming both time and place. Accordingly Alfred the youngest, (by others said to be the eldest) at the appointed time, with a few ships, and a small number of Normans, sailed for England; where they were no sooner landed, but they fell into the hands of Goodwin, who served them as Rapin has above related. What makes this account the more probable, is, that had both the Princes come over in the manner-above-mentioned, Harold would certainly have put them both to death, since it would have been in his power. The Saxon Annals say nothing of Alfred's death, and some place it after Harold's decease. Such is the uncertainty of this Matter; which makes it appear, how little traditional accounts are to be depended upon, though of no long standing, since this Story, transacted but a few years before the Conquest, is told so many ways. *Malmsb. He made but one Law, mentioned by Selden, which was, that if any Welshman coming into England without leave, was taken on this side Offa's Ditch, he should have his Right Hand cut off by the King's Officer.

(5) Brompton says, he had his Sirname for refusing to ride on Horse-back, and chusing always to walk on foot, which, says he, was very unbecoming his Royal State.

19. CANUTE, II. or HARDICANUTE, the fourth Daniſh King of England.

1039. Hardicanute is acknowledged King of all England. Sax. Ann. Malmſb. S. Dunelm.

AFTER the death of Harold, the great Men of both Nations unanimouſly made an offer of the crown to Canute, ſirnamed the Hardy, not to denote his courage, but his ſtrong conſtitution (1). He was then at Bruges, concerting meaſures with the Queen his Mother, for the recovery of the kingdom of Weſſex, by means of a powerful aid promiſed him by the Earl of Flanders. The news of Harold's death putting an end to their conſultations, he came to England with forty Ships. he had brought from Denmark (2). He was received with great demonſtrations of joy, both by the Engliſh and Danes. Earl Goodwin himſelf, though he had no reaſon to rejoice at his arrival, after what he had acted againſt him, was the foremoſt to do him homage.

He digs up his Brother's Corps. Malmſb. l. 2. c. 12. S. Dunelm. Brompt.

The new king began his reign with an uncommon act of cruelty. The ceremony of his coronation was hardly over, when out of impatience to be revenged on his Brother, though dead, he commanded his body to be dug up and thrown into the Thames (3). But all his care to prevent the Body from being buried again, proved ineffectual. Some Fiſhermen finding the corps floating on the water (4), delivered it to the Danes, who interred it in the burying-place of their Nation in London (5). It is further added, the King being informed of it, ordered the Body to be thrown once more into the River; but, being found again, it was privately buried at Weſtminſter.

1040. He impoſes a heavy tax. Sax. Ann. Malmſb. Sedition at Worceſter on that account. Camden in Worceſter.

Shortly after, Hardicanute impoſed an exorbitant tax on the kingdom (6), for the payment of the fleet ſent back to Denmark. Though the Engliſh had often paid the like tax, termed Danegeld, they were diſſatisfied to have it renewed on this occaſion, when there appeared no neceſſity for it. The inhabitants of Worceſter oppoſed the levying this tax with the greateſt heat. They even proceeded ſo far as to kill two of the Collectors (7). Whereupon the King immediately ordered Goodwin Duke of Weſſex, Leofric Duke of Mercia, and Siward Earl of Northumberland, to draw their forces together, march to Worceſter, and deſtroy the City with fire and ſword. Theſe Lords executed in part the King's orders, though with great reluctance. The City was burnt, after having been plundered four days together. But the inhabitants had leave to retire into a ſmall Iſland in the Severn, named Beverly, till the King was appeaſed (8).

The City burnt.

Not long after Prince Edward, Son of Ethelred II, and Brother of the King by the ſame Mother, appeared at court. He met with a very civil reception, and preſently demanded juſtice againſt Goodwin, charging him with the murder of his Brother Alfred (9). The King was well enough pleaſed with having an opportunity to puniſh the Earl, not ſo much perhaps for the death of Prince Alfred, as for what he had done in favour of the late King. He was cited therefore to appear and anſwer to what was alledged againſt him. But Goodwin, who knew the covetous temper of the King, wiſely diverted the ſtorm by a magnificent preſent before his tryal. This preſent was a Galley, with a gilt Stern, manned with fourſcore choice ſoldiers, every one of whom had upon his arm a gold Bracelet weighing ſixteen ounces, with Helmets and Swords all gilded, and a Daniſh Battle-ax adorned with Gold and Silver, hanging on his left ſhoulder, and a Lance of the ſame in his Right-hand. Every thing in the Galley was anſwerable to this magnificence. By means of this noble preſent, the Earl was acquitted, upon taking his oath, he had no hand in the death of Prince Alfred (10).

Hardicanute did not long enjoy a crown he was unworthy to wear. He died ſuddenly in the third year of his reign (11), at the nuptual feaſt of a Daniſh Lord at Lambeth (12). Perhaps his death was haſtened by poiſon (13); but his exceſſive cruelty and gluttony rendered him ſo odious, that he died unlamented, neither was any inquiry made into the manner of his death. All Hiſtorians unanimouſly agree, he ſpent whole days and nights in feaſting and carouſing (14). There is one however that praiſes him for keeping open table four times a day, and exclaims againſt the niggardlineſs of the Kings his ſucceſſors who aboliſhed ſo laudable a cuſtom.

HARDICANUTE leaving no iſſue, Edward, Son of Ethelred II. and Emma of Normandy, was the only Prince then in England that had any pretenſions to the crown. It was but reaſonable the race of the Saxon Kings ſhould be reſtored to the throne of which they were unjuſtly diſpoſſeſſed. But then it was no leſs right to recall out of Hungary Prince Edward, Son of Edmund Ironſide, and place him on the throne preferable to his uncle, who was one degree farther removed. On the other hand, the uninterrupted ſucceſſion of four Daniſh Kings, who had poſſeſſed the throne for the ſpace of twenty-eight years (15), with the conſent of the Engliſh, bred another difficulty, ſeeing Sweyn, Son of Canute the Great, was ſtill alive. It is true, he was reckoned by ſome as a Baſtard. But beſides that the King his Father had not treated him as ſuch in the partition of his dominions, it might be ſaid in his favour, he ought to have the ſame privilege with his Brother Harold, to whom his being born of the ſame Mother was no obſtacle to his mounting the throne. It was therefore no eaſy thing to ſettle the ſucceſſion to the ſatisfaction of all parties. On the contrary, it was to be feared that, on this occaſion, the old animoſities between the two nations would be re-

1041. viv'd, and the kingdom plunged into its former calamities. Edward, Son of Ethelred II, having ſpent moſt part of his days in Normandy, was little known in England. Beſides, his merit, which was not very conſpicuous, was incapable of adding any thing to his right. However, a fortunate advice, which neceſſity conſtrain'd him to follow, procur'd him a ſupport, by which alone he was enabled to maintain his pretenſions: I mean, Earl Goodwin. Though it was but a few months ſince, that Edward had proſecuted this Lord as the murderer of his Brother, he was adviſ'd to court his protection, which he obtained with greater eaſe than he durſt have expected. Goodwin was ſo powerful, and of ſo ſuperior a Genius to the reſt of the Nobility, that it would have been almoſt impoſſible for Edward to ſucceed in his deſigns, if he had not gained him to his intereſt. He was already diſtinguiſhed as well by his merit, as birth, when Canute the Great intruſted him with the command of the Engliſh troops, in the war againſt the Vandals. After that expedition, wherein he gloriouſly ſignalized himſelf, Canute made him Earl of Kent, Suſſex, and Surrey, and gave him in marriage Thyra, Siſter of Earl Ulphon, to whom Canute had given his own Siſter Eſtrith, widow of the Duke of Normandy (1). Goodwin had by his wife a Son, drown'd in the Thames by an unruly horſe. His ſecond wife was Gith, Siſter of Sweyn, who was King of Denmark after the death of Hardicanute. By this wife he had ſeven Sons, Harold, Toſton, Swane, Ulnoth, Gurth, Elfgar, Lewin, and a daughter nam'd Editha. His credit with Canute the Great; the ſuperiority of his genius; his noble alliances; his dignities of Earl of Kent, Duke of Weſſex, and High-Treaſurer, conferred on him by King Harold; and laſtly the government of the counties of Oxford and Hereford, in the hands of his eldeſt Son, had raiſed his fortune to ſuch a degree, that it would hardly admit of any addition. His intereſt was ſomewhat eclips'd in the reign of Hardicanute; but he had the addreſs to divert the danger he was threatned with. How great a grudge ſoever the late King bore Goodwin, he was ſuch an enemy to buſineſs, that he could not reſolve to undergo the neceſſary fatigue of governing a large kingdom, but left all to his management, as knowing him to be the moſt able of his ſubjects. Goodwin knew ſo well how to improve theſe favourable junctures to ingratiate himſelf with the Nobles and People, that his power far exceeded that of all the other Engliſh Lords. From what has been ſaid, it plainly appears how neceſſary Goodwin's aſſiſtance was, in order to Edward's mounting the throne, though his pretenſions had been ſtill better grounded. However, Goodwin was not one that neglected his own, in promoting the intereſt of others. Before he engaged in Edward's cauſe, he required certain conditions, and made him ſwear to marry his daughter Editha. The Prince complied with theſe terms, notwithſtanding his inward reluctance to eſpouſe the daughter of a Man, whom he looked upon as the murderer of his Brother Alfred.

As ſoon as Goodwin had received from Edward the aſſurances he demanded, he conven'd a general-aſſembly (2), where, by his management, that Prince was acknowledged (3) and proclaimed King (4), with unanimous conſent (5). It was happy for the Engliſh, there was then in the kingdom never a Prince of the family of Canute the Great, whom the Danes might have ſet up in oppoſition to Edward. If Sweyn King of Norway had been on the ſpot to head the Danes, it may reaſonably be preſum'd, either that his pretenſions would have cauſed a civil war, or England been once more divided into two kingdoms. Without doubt, the Danes would never have ſuffer'd the rights of the royal family of Denmark, four Princes whereof had ſucceſſively ſat on the throne, to be thus deſtroy'd. On the other hand, the Engliſh were ſo averſe to a Daniſh government, that probably they would have ventured all to free themſelves from that yoke. But the preſent juncture proving favourable to the Engliſh, they not only place on the throne a Prince of their own Nation, but alſo deliver themſelves from the fear of falling again under the dominion of the foreigners.

In the general-aſſembly above-mention'd, to which, in all likelihood, the Danes being then without a Leader, were not called, Goodwin ſtrenuouſly harangu'd, to demonſtrate to the Engliſh, "that a favourable opportunity "now offered, to free themſelves from the oppreſſions "under which they had groaned for ſo many years. He "deſcrib'd with his natural eloquence, the calamities "their country was overwhelm'd with, whilſt in ſub-"jection to foreigners. He diſplayed the extreme pride "of the Danes, who, not content with ſharing the king-"dom with the Engliſh, treated them like ſo many ſlaves. "He called to their remembrance the ſad times, when "an Engliſhman and a Dane meeting on a Bridge, the "former durſt not ſtir a ſtep till the latter was paſſed "over. That if an Engliſhman did not make a low re-"verence to a Dane, he was ſure to be ſoundly cudgel'd. "To all theſe miſeries he added that of the exceſſive "taxes they had been oblig'd to pay, particularly Dane-"Gelt (6), which was impos'd for no other end but to "ſatisfy the inſatiable avarice of their greedy Maſters." In fine, he omitted nothing that could inflame the rage of the Engliſh. This harangue wrought ſo upon the Hearers, that it was reſolved, no Dane for the future ſhould ever ſit on the throne of England. Some add, the enumeration of the calamities they had ſo long groan'd under, made ſuch an impreſſion on their minds, that with one conſent, they came to a reſolution to drive all the Danes out of the kingdom, and accordingly put it in execution forthwith.

This is one of the moſt difficult paſſages in the whole Engliſh Hiſtory; which way ſoever it is view'd, inſurmountable difficulties occur. In the firſt place it is hard to conceive, how in a general-aſſembly of the kingdom, it was poſſible to come to a reſolution to deſtroy all the Danes, and much more, how it came to be in the power of the Engliſh to put it in practice. The Danes alone were in a manner poſſeſſed of all the eaſtern and northern Counties, and in Mercia, that is, in the heart of the kingdom, were as numerous as the Engliſh. Four Kings of their nation had ſucceſſively reign'd, who far from humbling them, had no doubt ſhown them great favour, and given them the ſuperiority. And yet, without any extraordinary event, except the death of Hardicanute, a Prince of little merit and reputation, the Engliſh are ſaid to become on a ſudden ſuperior. But this is not all, 'tis affirm'd, this ſuperiority was ſo great as to enable them to expel all the Danes out of the kingdom. How is it poſſible to believe, the Danes ſhould ſuffer themſelves to be thus maſter'd, without making the leaſt reſiſtance? For it does not appear, there was any war or commotion in the kingdom on this occaſion. The Daniſh Hiſtorians make the matter ſtill more improbable. They ſay, all the Danes in England were maſſacred in one night by the treachery of Harold Son of Goodwin, who ordered all the Daniſh ſoldiers to march out of the gariſons, under pretence of ſolemnizing the funeral of the late King (7). But this account has not the leaſt appearance of truth: for, in the firſt place, Harold, who was then very young, had no ſhare in the government, and conſequently could give no ſuch orders to the Daniſh officers. In the next place, how was it poſſible that all the Engliſh Hiſtorians, Brompton only excepted, who however ſays much leſs of the matter, ſhould agree to paſs over in ſilence ſo remarkable an event? Nay, how could they write their Hiſtories without ever making the leaſt alluſion to it. If 'tis objected, they were ſilent, as aſham'd of their Nation for ſo barbarous an action, what is the reaſon they had not the ſame ſcruple with regard to the Maſſacre in the reign of Ethelred? Theſe are difficulties that are not eaſily to be clear'd. There ſeems, at firſt ſight, to be a plauſible way

(5) Brompton and ſome others relate this Matter otherwiſe: Upon Hardicanute's death, Alfred (whom ſome affirm to be ſlain in Harold's, ſome in Hardicanute's reign) being invited into England, Goodwin repreſented to the Lords that he was coming with great Numbers of Normans, to whom he had promiſed to give Eſtates. Upon which Goodwin was ſent to meet him at Southampton, where, in order to make way to the Crown for his own Son by Canute's daughter, he ſerved him in the barbarous manner before related in the reign of Harold. The Engliſh Nobles, who had not approved of this Treachery of Goodwin's, vowed revenge, which Goodwin being informed of, fled into Denmark, and his Eſtate in England was confiſcated. After this, the Engliſh ſent over to Edward, to deſire him to come and take poſſeſſion of the Crown. Shortly after his coronation, Goodwin hearing of King Edward's gracious temper, return'd into England, to petition for his Pardon and Eſtate again, and was accuſed by the King before an aſſembly held at London, of his Brother Alfred's murder. But with much ado, by the Interceſſion of Leofric and other Peers, the matter was made up, and he was reſtored to all his Lands. Brompton Chron. p. 934, &c. Huntingdon agrees in the main with this relation, but ſays, that Goodwin murdered Alfred, becauſe he thought him of too high a Spirit to marry his daughter, whom he aimed to make Queen of England, by marrying her to Edward, an eaſy and ſimple Prince. But this, Milton obſerves, is contrary to all records.

(6) This Tax amounted to forty thouſand Pounds a year. King Edward releaſed the Nation of this heavy burden in the year 1051. The occaſion of his ſo doing, though related by Ingulphus, will ſcarce be credited. Upon which he ordered it to be all paid back to the People, and Dane-Gelt to be aboliſhed for ever, after it had been paid thirty-eight years. Ingulph. p. 65. Edit. Gale.

to reſolve them, namely, to accuſe the Hiſtorians, as well Engliſh as Daniſh, of not telling the whole truth, or aggravating the facts they relate. But by this courſe, we run into ſtill greater difficulties. It is moſt certain, ſince the beginning of the reign of Edward the Confeſſor, the Danes have been ſo far from making any figure in England, that they are not mentioned in hiſtory any more than if they had never been known, though juſt before they were maſters of the whole kingdom. But whence could proceed ſo ſudden a fall, or rather, how could they all vaniſh in a moment, if neither expelled nor maſſacred? Hiſtorians do not ſay, war was made againſt them, their ſtrong-holds taken, and they brought under new laws. But, all on a ſudden, theſe ſo powerful and formidable Danes are reduc'd to nothing, in the reign of a Prince the moſt unwarlike that had ever ſat on the throne. Theſe are hiſtorical difficulties, the ſolution whereof I am forc'd to leave to others. But to return to Edward.

King Edward's Character.

He was a Prince of a weak conſtitution, and a narrow genius, not at all qualified to rule a large kingdom. His unſteadineſs on important occaſions, his inability in publick affairs, and his continual attachment to trifles, gave the Nobles opportunity of aſſuming an almoſt ſovereign power. As ſoon as they perceived the weakneſs of this Prince, they became ſo arbitrary in their governments, that they obeyed the King's orders no farther than was conſiſtent with their own intereſt. Earl Goodwin eſpecially uſurp'd by degrees ſo great an authority, that he had almoſt the ſame deference paid him as the King himſelf. Perhaps the meanneſs of Edward's genius was the principal motive of his procuring him the crown, to the end he might govern in his name. Nevertheleſs, how fair ſoever the King carried it towards him, in his heart he utterly hated him and his whole family. This was the true reaſon of his deferring his marriage with Editha as long as he could. But as he ſtood in fear of the Earl, he durſt not break his word with him; and therefore after ſtaying two years on ſeveral pretences, he eſpouſed his daughter, according to his promiſe. However, he did not conſummate the marriage, ſo great was his averſion to all that belong'd to Goodwin. The Queen, who was a perſon of ſtrict virtue, and endow'd with a greatneſs of Soul, bore this uſage with a wonderful patience. Inſtead of complaining of her hard treatment, ſhe never open'd her mouth about it; but finding it was not in her power to gain the affection of the King her Husband, diverted her thoughts with ſtudy and acts of devotion (1).

Ailred. p. 80.

The author of the life of Edward pretends, this Prince made a vow of chaſtity, long before his marriage, and perſuaded the Queen to do the like. But Malmsbury does not know what to think of this ſtrange proceeding, and ſhews a ſtrong inclination to believe, Edward's hatred to Goodwin was the real cauſe of his abſtaining from his daughter. He durſt not venture however to divorce her, for fear the Earl, by whoſe Intereſt he had mounted the throne, might ſtill have it in his power to depoſe him, or at leaſt create him a great deal of trouble. For this reaſon he continued to conceal, in all other reſpects, his averſion to him, and even to heap favours on him, in expectation of a favourable opportunity to ſhew his reſentment. But he did not conſider his diſſimulation increaſed the Earl's credit with the people, who imagining he was in great favour with the King, more firmly adher'd to him.

The State of the Court.

Goodwin wiſely improved theſe advantages, and became every day more formidable to the King, by the great number of friends he acquir'd. In all probability, he would have grown in time, as powerful as the Mayors of the Palace were formerly in France, if he had not met with a counter-weight, which prevented his riſing to that degree of power, ſo fatal to the royal authority; I mean, Siward Earl of Northumberland, and Leofric Duke of Mercia. Siward had the reputation of the braveſt and moſt worthy Peer in the kingdom. His excellent qualities gave him great authority at court, and among the Northumbrians, who were under his government. Leofric was univerſally eſteemed and reſpected for his merit. His power was ſo great in Mercia, that he was more a King there than Edward himſelf. Theſe two Lords uniting together, to prevent Goodwin from ſoaring too high, firmly adher'd to the perſon of the King, and endeavoured to the utmoſt of their power, to ſupport his authority. Without their aſſiſtance, Edward, who was naturally weak, would have found it very difficult to ſecure himſelf againſt the artifices of ſo able and powerful a ſubject as Goodwin. Thus matters ſtood at the court of England, during the firſt years of his reign. It was neceſſary to premiſe this, for the better underſtanding the ſequel.

Edward takes from the Queen his Mother all her Eſtate. Sax. Ann. S. Dunelm.

Edward, to whom is given the glorious titles of Saint and Confeſſor, mounted the throne with diſpoſitions repugnant to ſanctity. Beſides his hatred to Goodwin and his own wife, he cheriſhed in his breaſt againſt his Mother a deſire of revenge, which agreed no better with the maxims of the goſpel. It is true, his Mother who had never any great affection for him, had done enough to exaſperate her Son in marrying Canute the Great, mortal enemy of her firſt Husband. She had moreover given her conſent, that the children of her ſecond marriage ſhould ſucceed to the crown of England, which ſhewed but little friendſhip for thoſe of the firſt. This thing made ſo deep an impreſſion on Edward's mind, that all her endeavours afterwards to procure him the throne, were not able to efface it. As ſoon as he found it in his power to make her feel the effects of his reſentment, he delay'd not to ſatisfy his paſſion. On a ſudden, when ſhe leaſt expected it, he came to Wincheſter, where her treaſures lay, and without ſhewing the leaſt regard for her, ſtript her of All, leaving her only a moderate penſion for her ſubſiſtence (2). Thus this Princeſs, widow of two Kings, Mother of two more, and daughter of a Duke of Normandy little inferior to a King, ſaw herſelf in the latter end of her days, reduced to extreme poverty by the rigour of her own Son (3).

And makes her go thro' the Ordeal Trial. Brompt. Knighton. Camden.

But Edward was not content with ſhewing, by this act of violence, the little regard and affection he had for his Mother. Several Hiſtorians aſſure us, he moreover cauſed her to be accuſed of Incontinence with Alwin Biſhop of Wincheſter. They even ſay, that, regardleſs of her quality, he was ſo hard-hearted as to make her undergo the Ordeal trial. This trial conſiſted in obliging the party accus'd to walk bare-foot and hood-wink'd over nine red-hot Plough-ſhares. It is pretended, Emma came off unhurt, and gave in memory of this deliverance nine Manors to the next monaſtery (4). But, we have juſt obſerved, ſhe had none left to give. However this be, ſhe paſſed ten years in the ſad condition ſhe was reduced to by the King her Son, living in Wincheſter as a ſort of priſon, from whence ſhe was delivered by her death in 1052 (5).

Sweyn King of Norway prepares to invade England. S. Dunelm. Hoved.

Whilſt Edward was thus venting his reſentment upon his Mother, he received certain advice, that a great ſtorm was gathering in the North. Sweyn King of Norway, Son of Canute the Great, deſigning to proſecute his claim to the crown of England, was preparing for an invaſion with all expedition, which put the Engliſh in dread of the like miſeries, they had ſo long experienced, and from which for ſome time they had been happily freed. Edward, who was no leſs terrified than his ſubjects, made ſome preparations to repulſe an attack which he was extremely alarmed at (6). Gunilda, niece of Canute the Great, fell a ſacrifice to his fears. She was conſtrained to abandon the kingdom and her family, to prevent her contriving ſome plot in favour of the Danes. But by an unexpected happineſs, a war, which ſuddenly aroſe between the Kings of Denmark and Norway, broke the meaſures of the latter, and brought peace to the Engliſh contrary to their expectation. Some time after, Sweyn was depoſed by Magnus Son of Olaüs the Martyr, whom Canute the Great had diſpoſſeſſed of Norway. Magnus was no ſooner maſter of that kingdom, but he carried the war into Denmark; with intent to dethrone the King, whoſe name was alſo Sweyn. This laſt demanding aſſiſtance of England, Goodwin was of opinion, that to keep up the war between theſe two Princes, an aid of fifty ſail ſhould be ſent him. But Siward and Leofric, for reaſons unknown, prevented the

(5) This trial of Emma is related by Brompton and Knighton, and embelliſhed with ſome trivial circumſtances by Harpſfield. They tell us, Robert Archbiſhop of Canterbury, a Norman, (whom Edward had brought over with him) accuſed the Queen of conſenting to the death of her Son Alfred, of endeavouring to poiſon her Son Edward, and of maintaining an infamous commerce with Biſhop Alwin. For which ſhe was condemned by a Council held on purpoſe to purge herſelf by the trial of Fire Ordeal, as ſhe had offered to do, and as it is related above. But this whole matter admits of great Diſputes, for Malmſbury, Florence of Worceſter, Huntingdon, Hoveden, and Weſtminſter, who lived neareſt the time, ſay not a word of this miraculous purgation. Then again Brompton ſays, Robert immediately fled the kingdom; whereas he went not off, as Malmſbury aſſures us, till ſeveral years after upon another occaſion, as we ſhall ſee: Moreover he could not be Archbiſhop then, ſince Edſius lived till 1050, which was three years after Alwin's death, (according to Flor. Weſt. Hoved. Chron. Mailr.) whom Brompton ſuppoſes to be alive at the trial, for he ſays, he alſo gave nine Manors to the Church of Wincheſter. The Saxon Annals ſay, Edſius died in 1047, and Alwin in 1045; and therefore Robert could not be Archbiſhop till two years after his death, according to the Annals. Thus this whole ſtory ſeems to be a mere fiction.

The Daniſh Pyrates make a Deſcent on England. Sax. Ann. Huntingd.

The troubles in Denmark hindered not the Daniſh Pyrates from putting to Sea, and carrying terror to the Engliſh coaſts. In the year 1046, twenty-five Sail of Danes arrived unexpectedly at Sandwich, from whence they carried off a great booty. Then ſailing for Eſſex, they carried away great numbers of Slaves of both Sexes, and all conditions. The Engliſh were extremly terrified; but Goodwin, Siward, and Leofric took ſo juſt meaſures that the Danes, alarmed in their turn, haſtily retired, and carried their ravages elſewhere.

Swane, the Son of Earl Goodwin baniſhed. Sax. Ann. Huntingd. S. Dunelm.

The retreat of the Daniſh Pyrates did not entirely reſtore peace to the kingdom, the coaſts being that ſame year infeſted by a new enemy. Swane, Son of Goodwin, having deflowered an Abbeſs (1), with whom he was in love, and not daring to ſtay in England after ſuch an act, retired into Denmark, where he in vain expected his pardon, by the mediation of the Earl his Father. But whether Goodwin was willing he ſhould be chaſtiſed, or found the King inexorable, Swane was not able to procure a pardon ſo ſoon as he imagined. When he ſaw, contrary to his expectation, he was made to wait for it a long while, he manned eight Ships, and made open war upon the Engliſh, plundering the Merchants, and committing ſuch barbarities on the inhabitants of the Sea-coaſts, as exceeded thoſe of the moſt cruel enemies. His inſolence gave Goodwin's enemies a great advantage, who took occaſion from thence to exaſperate the King more and more againſt the Earl and his Family. He himſelf was in great perplexity about this affair. He was not willing to appear oppenly for his Son, leſt he ſhould be charged with abetting his rebellion. On the other hand, he could not but be extremely concerned at Swane's being conſidered as an enemy to the Publick. To free himſelf from this ſituation, he deſired Earl Beorn, Son of Ulphon and Eſtrith, Siſter of Canute the Great, to uſe his intereſt with the King in behalf of his rebellious Son. Though Beorn had openly declared againſt Swane, he was prevailed with by Goodwin to ſpeak to the King, who complied with his requeſt upon certain conditions. The matter being thus in a fair way, Beorn went to Swane, to perſuade him to ſubmit to the King's mercy; but Beorn was ill rewarded for his pains. Swane imagining the Earl was come to betray him, ſlew him with his own hand, and ordered his body to be thrown into the Sea (2). This brutal action prevented a reconciliation for the preſent. But the King forgave him afterwards, notwithſtanding the complication of his crimes: So much did this weak Prince ſtand in fear of Goodwin's revenging himſelf, in caſe he continued inflexible. Thus Goodwin, tho' hated by the King, obtained as many favours as if he had been really beloved by him. But theſe favours, inſtead of producing a mutual affection, ſerved only to foment their diſ-union. The Earl did not think himſelf at all obliged to the King for Benefits proceeding from the ſole motive of Fear; and the King increaſed his hatred, in proportion as he was forced to conceal it.

1048. Great Intereſt of the Normans with the King. Malmsb. Ingulph.

Beſides the private reſentment of the King towards Goodwin, the Earl had alſo to deal with other enemies, who were continually ſtirring up that Prince againſt him. I mean the Normans, who were very numerous at court, and in great credit there. Theſe looked upon Goodwin as a profeſſed enemy, becauſe he loudly complained of the great regard the King had for them, and made no ſcruple to ſay, they would ſoon become as troubleſome as the Danes. His complaints were not altogether groundleſs. Edward, who was educated among the Normans, went into all their manners, and expreſſed ſuch an affection for them, as raiſed the jealouſy of the Engliſh. The Norman language was more generally ſpoken at court than the Saxon. The King's favour to the Normans rendering them inſolent, they would have all the World cringe to them. They who could not bring themſelves to this, ſeldom failed of feeling the effects of their reſentment. Goodwin was of this number. He believed he was powerful enough to ſupport himſelf without their aſſiſtance. Inſtead of ſeeking their protection, he affected by his continual railleries to ſhew, he thought it not in their power to hurt him. Robert, Archbiſhop of Canterbury, of all the Normans, was in greateſt credit at court. The King had taken him from a Monaſtery in Normandy (3) to promote him to the Biſhoprick of London, and afterwards to the Archbiſhoprick of Canterbury, to the great regret of ſeveral Engliſh Biſhops, who aſpired to that dignity. This Prelate, who was naturally haughty, and whom the royal favour made ſtill more arrogant, kept no meaſures with Goodwin, who, on his part, ſhewed the utmoſt contempt for him. The Archbiſhop, incenſed to ſee himſelf thus treated, made uſe of all his addreſs to have a wrong interpretation put on all the Earl's actions, and to inflame the King's hatred to him to a higher degree.

Archbiſhop of Canterbury, enemy to Goodwin.

Matters ſtanding thus at court, an accident happened when leaſt expected, which brought Earl Goodwin to the brink of deſtruction, and gave the King room at laſt to diſcover his enmity to him. Euſtace, Earl of Boulogne (4), being come to viſit the King his Brother-in-law, was honourably and kindly received, Edward having a particular affection for him. Some time after, as he was on the road, in his return to France, one of his people, who was ſent before to provide lodgings at Dover, picked a quarrel with a townſman and killed him (5). This accident making a great noiſe among the inhabitants, they ran to arms, to ſeize the Murderer, who ſtood upon his defence, with ſome of the Earl's domeſticks that were with him. Euſtace, entering the town in the midſt of this tumult, and ſeeing his people attacked, was obliged to take their part, without having time to enquire into the occaſion of the quarrel. But being overpowered with numbers, twenty of his retinue were killed on the ſpot, and himſelf narrowly eſcaped with his life. Inraged at this affront, he returned to the King at Glouceſter, where the court then reſided, and loudly demanded ſatisfaction. Edward, willing to do him juſtice, ordered Goodwin to march immediately with ſome forces, and chaſtiſe the rioters that were under his government. But inſtead of obeying the King's order, the Earl warmly replied, "It "was not the cuſtom in England to puniſh people un- "heard, and the rights and privileges of the ſubjects "ought not to be violated; that the accuſed ſhould be "ſummoned, and make ſatisfaction with their bodies or "eſtates if guilty, or if innocent, ſhould be diſcharged. "Adding, in a very haughty tone, that being Earl of Kent, "'twas his buſineſs to protect thoſe that were under his go- "vernment, againſt the inſults of foreigners." Some ſay, he even charged the King to deliver up the Earl of Boulogne into his hands, that he might be puniſhed upon the place, if found guilty of this riot. Edward was extremely provoked with this bold anſwer, which was not only a refuſal to obey his commands, but alſo a ſtinging reproach for his partiality to foreigners. The Archbiſhop and the reſt of the Normans eagerly improved this occaſion to exaſperate him againſt the Earl, and to blow up a flame, which was already but too much kindled.

How angry ſoever the King might be, he was forced to conceal it, not being in condition to puniſh on the ſpot, a Lord who rival'd him in power. Siward and Leofric being abſent, there was no appearance of ſucceeding, ſhould he attempt any thing againſt Goodwin, without being firſt aſſured of their concurrence. Mean while, as he was in the utmoſt impatience to be revenged, he diſpatched truſty meſſengers to theſe two Lords, to inform them of his reſolution to chaſtiſe Goodwin, and to order, or rather deſire them, to repair to him immediately. How privately ſoever this matter was tranſacted, Goodwin had notice of his deſign, and took his meaſures accordingly. As he was very ſenſible he ſhould be infallibly ruined, was he not beforehand with his enemies, he drew together ſome troops, which were ſoon reinforced with others from his Son's government (6). An incurſion of the Welſh at the ſame time into Herefordſhire, furniſhed him with a pretence to levy this army. He pretended theſe forces were deſigned to drive the enemy out of the kingdom, though he had received no orders to that purpoſe. In the mean time, the King cauſing him to be ſummoned before a general aſſembly convened at Glouceſter (7), he came with his Sons, but ſo well attended, that he had nothing to fear. to call him to an account, that the King was adviſed by the moſt prudent to hide his reſentments. They repreſented to him, if the Earl ſtood on his defence, as he ſeemed reſolved, it was to be feared, he would draw to his ſide the majority of the people, whoſe intereſts he ſeemed to eſpouſe; and therefore the affording him a pretence to carry his audaciouſneſs any farther, could not be done without danger. In purſuance of this advice, ſuch a peace was patched up as Goodwin deſired, that is, he was cleared for ſome excuſes which related more to his manner of acting, than the thing in queſtion.

Is reconciled to the King.

This reconciliation was of no long continuance. Edward, who could not digeſt the affront he had received, took new meaſures againſt Goodwin, in gaining ſome of his principal friends by preſents and promiſes. As ſoon as matters were ordered to his mind, he convened a general-aſſembly, where Goodwin and his Sons were ſummoned to appear. But being informed a deſign was laid to apprehend them, they refuſed to come, without a ſafe-conduct, and hoſtages for their ſecurity. Upon which, they were baniſhed the kingdom, and the combination againſt them was ſo ſtrong, that they ſaw themſelves abandoned on a ſudden by their principal adherents, and forced to ſubmit to the ſentence paſſed upon them. Edward not content with being thus freed from Goodwin, ſhut up the Queen in the nunnery of Wharwel (1), with deſign, in all appearance, never to take to her again. Goodwin retired to the Earl of Flanders, Father-in-law of his Son Tonſton, and Harold ſailed for Ireland, where he hoped to meet with aſſiſtance. To deprive the Earl and his Sons of all hopes of returning, the King diſpoſed of all their Poſts, the chief whereof were conferred on Alfgar Son of Leofric.

1052. Goodwin takes meaſures to reſtore himſelf to his former State. Sax. Ann. G. Malmſb.

In the mean time, Goodwin, who thought himſelf unjuſtly oppreſſed, took meaſures to right himſelf by arms, there being no other remedy, as matters ſtood between the King and him. The Earl of Flanders furniſhing him with ſome Ships, he infeſted the Eaſtern Coaſts of England, whilſt Harold his eldeſt Son did the ſame to the Weſtern. But theſe faint attempts were to little purpoſe, ſeeing their forces were not very conſiderable. Wherefore Goodwin returned to Flanders, where for two years together, he left no ſtone unturned to perſuade the Earl his protector, it was for his intereſt to lend him a powerful aſſiſtance, and to have ſuch a friend as he in England. Baldwin being at length prevailed with, granted him an aid capable of rendering him formidable, whilſt on the other hand, Harold equipp'd a good number of Ships in Ireland. Edward having intelligence of theſe proceedings, fitted out a fleet with all expedition, the command of which was given to Randulph of Mantes his nephew (2), and another Lord named Odda. Theſe two admirals hearing Goodwin had been ſeen off Rumney point, reſolved to go and attack him, but he had time to retire elſewhere. His meaſures being thus broken by the King's expedition, he ſteer'd his courſe again for Flanders, and ſent back Harold into Ireland. His view was to make the King believe, he gave over his undertaking, by reaſon of the obſtacles he met with. Mean while, he kept his fleet always ready, that he might improve any occaſions that ſhould offer. Shortly after one preſented itſelf, which he did not fail to make advantage of. Whether the two admirals were wanting in point of duty or conduct, or through court intrigues, which hiſtory has not taken care to diſcover, Edward on a ſudden removed theſe two Lords from the command of the fleet. This alteration, and the breaking ſome of the inferior officers, raiſed ſuch diſcontents among the Sailors, that they deſerted in crowds. Thus the King's Ships not being in condition to keep the Sea, were brought up the Thames in order to be new-manned. Goodwin by his ſpies being informed of this diſorder, puts to Sea immediately, and makes a deſcent on the Iſle of Wight, where he extorted great ſums from the inhabitants, whilſt he waited for his Son Harold to join him. After their junction, they ſailed up the Thames, and advanced towards London, where the King's fleet lay. Edward giving way to his paſſion, would have gone himſelf with ſuch Ships as were ready (3), and tried the fortune of a battle; but his council oppoſed it. They repreſented to him, that inſtead of hazarding his perſon in an action, the conſequences whereof might prove very fatal, it would be more for his own and the kingdom's advantage, to try to make Goodwin return to his obedience, by gentler methods. This was wholſome advice; but the King would hardly have followed it, had not Goodwin, who was informed of what was tranſacting at court, ſmoothed the way, by ſaving him the ſhame of making the firſt advances. He ſent the King word, that he was not come to fight againſt his Sovereign, but moſt humbly to intreat him to hear his juſtification: That his coming thus armed was only to defend himſelf againſt the inſults of his enemies, and he ſhould always glory in being the moſt faithful of his ſubjects. How reſpectful ſoever this meſſage might be, Edward, looking upon it as a ſort of banter, flatly refuſed to hearken to any accommodation; affirming, he could not reſolve to pardon his Brother's murderer. His obſtinacy had like to have produced a fatal effect. Goodwin's army, entirely conſiſting of foreigners, who were in hopes of enriching themſelves with the plunder of London, they were for engaging the King's fleet without delay. But the Earl, who was perfectly informed how the council ſtood diſpoſed, check'd the ardour of his ſoldiers, and behaved in a very ſubmiſſive manner with regard to the King, His moderation was attended at laſt with the ſucceſs he expected. Edward was prevailed with by the principal Lords, and eſpecially Stigand Biſhop of Wincheſter, a great friend of Goodwin's, to receive the Earl into favour again, at leaſt, as to outward appearance. He even agreed, he ſhould be acquitted, by the general aſſembly of the kingdom, of the murder of Prince Alfred, which he was charged with afreſh, but on condition he ſhould give hoſtages for his good behaviour for the future (4). Goodwin ſubmitting to the King's terms, put into his hands his Son Ulnoth, and his Grandſon Hacune, who were immediately ſent into Normandy, Edward not thinking he could ſecure them in England. Goodwin and his Sons were reſtored to their eſtates and dignities, and the King honourably took again the Queen his Wife, whom he thought he had been rid of for life.

Goodwin makes his Peace with the King; and gives him hoſtages. Sax. Ann. Knighton. Brompt.

Upon the firſt news of the agreement between the King and the Earl, the Archbiſhop of Canterbury retired to the monaſtery of Jumiege in Normandy. Shortly after his departure, he was baniſhed the kingdom by an aſſembly general, as an incendiary and fomenter of diviſions between the King and his Subjects (5). Stigand was made Archbiſhop in his room, on ſuppoſition the See was become vacant by his baniſhment, a ſuppoſition that the court of Rome would by no means allow. Thus ended the affair of Goodwin. This Lord ſeemingly was very like to have been undone for ever; but, contrary to the expectation of his enemies, his diſgrace tended only to render him more powerful and formidable. This ſame year he loſt his third Son Swane, who going in pilgrimage to Jeruſalem, died on the road in ſome place in Syria, where he fell into the hands of robbers (6).

Edward prepares to repulſe him.

The court of England enjoying a profound quiet after Goodwin's return, William the Baſtard, Duke of Normandy, took this opportunity to pay a viſit to Edward (7). Some ſay, Edward ſent him word by Archbiſhop Robert, that he deſigned to make him his heir, and that his aim in this viſit was to get a confirmation of this promiſe. But this is only conjecture. However that be, during William's ſtay in England, the King took a pleaſure in ſhowing his gratitude for all the civilities he had received, both from him and the Duke his father. It is pretended, after having thus publickly teſtified his gratitude, he privately gave him a more ſubſtantial mark of his affection, by making his will, and nominating him his heir and ſucceſſor (8). If it be true that Edward made ſuch a will, which however no body ever ſaw, it is more probable he did it at this time, than when he was in Normandy. Whilſt the throne of England was filled by the Danes; whilſt Alfred his eldeſt Brother, and alſo the children of Edmund Ironſide were alive; how could Edward foreſee he ſhould ever be King of England? But at the time William the Baſtard was in England, Edward, bearing ſtill a mortal hatred to Goodwin in his heart, notwithſtanding their feigned reconciliation, might ſuſpect the Earl of aſpiring to the crown, and hope by this ſettlement to beak his meaſures. But after all, it is much more probable he made no will, but contented himſelf with giving the Duke of Normandy ſome verbal promiſe.

However this be, it was this Will, real or forg'd, or this verbal promiſe, that furniſhed the Duke with a pretence of becoming maſter of England after the death of Edward. But it is very likely Goodwin knew nothing of this Will, or verbal promiſe; which may be plainly inferred from his taking no meaſures to prevent a Norman Prince from reigning over the Engliſh, though he was a ſworn enemy to the Norman nation. By the way, the ſituation of affairs then in England, where Goodwin almoſt equalled the King himſelf in power, renders incredible what ſome have ventured to advance, that Edward got his Will in favour of Duke William confirmed by a general aſſembly.

1053. Goodwin's Death. Brompt. Rievallenſis. M. Weſt. Huntingd. Ingulph.

Edward in vain uſed all ſorts of means to obſtruct Goodwin's advancement. This Earl's power was grown to ſuch a height, that it might have proved of dangerous conſequence, had not death freed the King from this hated, and then moſt formidable, Subject. If we believe certain Hiſtorians, Goodwin's death was attended with extraordinary circumſtances, deſerving a ſerious regard, were they better atteſted. They ſay, as the King was one day ſitting at table with the Earl, he let fall ſome words, which plainly ſhowed, the murder of the Prince his Brother was not yet thoroughly blotted out of his mind. They add, Goodwin taking it as a reflection upon him, roſe up, and addreſſing himſelf to the King, I perceive, my Lord, (ſays he with great emotion) by what you juſt now ſaid, you ſtill think me guilty of the death of the Prince your Brother, though I have been publickly acquitted of it. But to give you a freſh proof of my innocence, I pray God that this morſel I am going to eat may choak me this moment, if I had any hand in the death of that Prince. It is pretended, that upon ſaying theſe words, he went to ſwallow the fatal morſel, but it ſtuck in his throat and choaked him immediately, to the great aſtoniſhment of the Standers-by. But this circumſtance, had it been true, was too remarkable to be omitted by the Hiſtorians of the beſt credit, who make no mention at all of it. They agree, Goodwin died ſuddenly, as he ſat at table with the King, but ſay not a word of the above-mentioned circumſtances, which probably were invented to blacken the memory of the Earl and his Family (1).

Sax. Ann. S. Dunelm.

Harold his Son ſucceeds him. Sax. Ann.

Harold his eldeſt Son ſucceeded him in all his Poſts, thoſe he had himſelf before his Father's death being given to Alfgar, Son of Leofric Duke of Mercia.

Harold's prudent Conduct.

The death of Goodwin cauſed no great alteration. Harold had the ſame Friends, the ſame creatures, and the ſame intereſt as the Earl his Father when alive. All the difference to be obſerved between the Father and Son, was, that the Son was of a temper more courteous and pliable, carried himſelf with much leſs pride, and behaved in a more reſpectful and ſubmiſſive manner to the King. He was in hopes, by this carriage, to remove the King's inveterate hatred to his family; but it was to no purpoſe. Edward perhaps had not ſo great an averſion for him as he had for his Father; but he feared him as much, and indeed very juſtly. Harold, of as great parts and abilities as his Father, but withal of more honour and conſcience, firmly gained to his intereſt both the Nobles and People, by his civil and obliging behaviour; whereas Goodwin's haughtineſs and pride frequently loſt him many friends. Mean while the ſame reaſons that conſtrained the King to carry it fair with the Father, obliged him to do the ſame with the Son. Though he loved him not, he durſt not ſhew his ill-will, leſt it ſhould prove the occaſion of a rupture, which muſt have been of very bad conſequence, conſidering Harold's great credit at court and with the people.

1054. War for Cumberland. S. Dunelm. Huntingd. Brompt. Ingulph.

If the overgrown power of the Goodwin family created uneaſineſs in the King, it was in ſome meaſure alleviated by the ſatisfaction he had to ſee his kingdom exempt from war, ever ſince his acceſſion to the throne. But this tranquillity, which could not but be very grateful to a Prince of ſo unwarlike a temper, was a little diſturbed by a quarrel with Mackbeth King of Scotland, who had made himſelf maſter of Cumberland. This little kingdom, which had been long under the protection of the crown of England, was contended for between Mackbeth and Malcolm, a Lord of the royal family of Cumberland. Edward eſpouſing the cauſe of Malcolm, commiſſioned Siward to reſtore him to his kingdom. This war was of ſhort duration. Siward by one deciſive battle obliged Mackbeth to abandon Cumberland, and leave his rival in poſſeſſion (2). Siward had ſcarce finiſhed this affair, when he was ſeized with a diſtemper (3) that laid him in his grave. When he found he was near his end, he got upon his legs, and cauſing his armour to be put on, expired in that poſture, declaring it diſhonourable for a brave Man to die in his bed (4).

1055. Death of Siward. Sax. Ann. Huntingd. Brompt.

After the death of Siward, the government of Northumberland was conferred on Toſton, Brother of Harold (5), Edward not having reſolution enough to refuſe him that favour, though he dreaded nothing more than the advancement of that family. Some will have it, this was done out of policy. They pretend, the King, by feigning to gratify Harold, filled the vacant poſt with the propereſt perſon to give a check to his ambition, by reaſon of the mutual jealouſy between the two Brothers. But it does not appear Harold and Toſton were then at variance, tho' it be true, they became enemies afterwards. 'Twas therefore great imprudence to truſt any one family with two ſuch important poſts as Duke of Weſſex, and Earl of Northumberland, which put one moiety of the kingdom in the power of the two Brothers. Thus the King, tho' he ſtood in the greateſt dread of the Goodwin Family, either out of weakneſs, or ill policy, did every thing to render them more powerful.

Toſton Harold's Brother made Earl of Northumberland. Sax. Ann. Ingulph. Brompt.

It was not only by the King's favours that Earl Harold daily got ground. His perſonal merit and liberal temper daily procured him ſuch friends, as were able to ſupport him againſt the attempts of the King himſelf. Though he had married the Duke of Mercia's daughter, Alfgar his Brother-in-law carried it very coldly towards him, purely out of envy at his greatneſs. This Lord, being of a reſtleſs and turbulent ſpirit, entered into a dangerous conſpiracy, and privately held intelligence with Griffin King of Wales, to the detriment of the publick. Edward being informed of it, cauſed him to be accuſed of treaſon, and condemned to baniſhment. Alfgar retired to his friend Griffin, who received him with open arms, and cheriſhed his diſcontent to the utmoſt of his power (6). Some time after they made an inroad together into Herefordſhire and defeated Radulph of Mantes Earl of that County, who had attempted to drive them thence. Encouraged by this ſucceſs, they began to make farther advances (7), when they met Earl Harold, who ſtopt their career. He had of his own accord levied an army in his governments, and boldly marched towards them, to give them battle. They quickly found the difference between him and Radulph. Harold, ſuperior in valour and conduct, put them to rout, and compelled them to retire into Wales, from whence they durſt not come forth any more. A peace being the conſequence of this victory, Harold made uſe of all his intereſt to obtain a pardon for Alfgar, and got him at length reſtored to his eſtate and honours. By this uncommon act of generoſity, he gained the friendſhip of Alfgar, and exceedingly increaſed the eſteem people already had for him.

1057. The people talk of Harold's ſucceeding to the Crown.

The reputation acquired by Harold in his laſt expedition, his generoſity to Alfgar, his affable and obliging behaviour, his beneficent temper, entirely gained him the hearts of the people. It began to be the publick diſcourſe, that

(1) The Saxon Annals ſay only, This year Earl Goodwin deceaſed the 17th of the Kalends of May, and was buried in the old Monaſtery of Wincheſter, Anno MLIII. Almoſt all our Hiſtorians ſays, King Edward celebrating the Feaſt of Eaſter at Wincheſter (ſome ſay Windſor) Earl Goodwin was taken ſpeechleſs as he ſat at table; and being carried into the King's Chamber by his Sons, he lay in a languiſhing condition four Days, and died the fifth. This is the account of his death; but the Norman Monks, and ſuch as write in favour of them, add the above circumſtances, which ſhow either his Guilt or their Malice. He was a Man of an active or turbulent Spirit, not over conſcientious in getting or keeping what he could. But had he not been ſo great a Lover of his Country, and an Enemy to Foreigners, thoſe who wrote in the Norman times would have given him a fairer Character. S. Dunelm. p. 187. *Chr. As ſhe was one Day walking in a Wood near her Father's Houſe, accompanied only with her Women, a huge Bear ruſhing from among the Trees, and frightening away her Attendants, carried off the young Lady alone; and getting her with Child, ſhe had a Son by him, named Bernus, who was born with Bear's Ears; however by his Mother's right he ſucceeded to her Father's Earldom. In proceſs of time he proved a valiant Soldier, and marrying, begot the brave Earl Siward, who came and ſettled in England. Brompt. p. 945.

(6) Hiſtorians are divided in their Opinions, whether this Earl was baniſhed juſtly or not. The Sax. Ann. and Huntingd. (p. 366.) ſay, that he was convicted of treaſon: But S. Dunelm. (p. 187.) Brompton and Ingulph affirm, he was unjuſtly baniſhed. Simeon of Durham and Brompton ſay, he went to Ireland firſt, and procured eighteen Ships, went and joined Griffin. He was baniſhed again in 1058, but, by the Aſſiſtance of Griffin, and of a Norwegian Fleet, was reſtored. S. Dunelm. p. 189. Ingulph. p. 66.

ſince the King had no heirs, no one was more worthy to ſucceed him than Harold. The affection of the Engliſh for the Earl, very ſenſibly touched Edward, who had all along lived in expectation of an occaſion to ruin him. Hitherto this Prince ſeems to have intended to leave the crown to the Duke of Normandy, ſince he was not ignorant he had a Nephew in Hungary, and yet had never once thought of recalling him home, and ſecuring him the ſucceſſion. But the moment he found Earl Harold aſpired to the crown, or at leaſt, that the people marked him out for his ſucceſſor, he judged it would be very difficult to ſet up a foreign Prince, againſt an Engliſh Earl of ſo great power and credit. This conſideration probably induced him at laſt to ſend for his Nephew Edward, Son of Edmund Ironſide, out of Hungary (1). He ſhould have done this long before, had he not deſigned to diſpoſe of the crown in favour of another. Prince Edward came into England in 1057, bringing with him his young Son Edgar, with Margaret and Chriſtiana his Daughters, who were all three born in Hungary. The arrival of this Prince, Son of a King of England, whoſe memory was dear to the Nation, could not but be very agreeable to the Engliſh; and therefore, without heſitation, they conſidered him as the King's preſumptive heir, their eſteem for Harold giving place to their affection for the royal family. Indeed, there was no conteſting this young Prince's right to ſucceed his Uncle, ſince, had he not been abſent when it was debated who ſhould ſit on the throne after Hardicanute, he would have been unqueſtionably preferred even to King Edward himſelf. Which conſideration was probably the reaſon of his Uncle's leaving him ſo long in Hungary, leſt his preſence might occaſion ſome dangerous commotions. But this Prince, who ſeemed deſigned for the crown, died ſoon after his arrival in England, leaving his juſt, though empty title to Edgar his Son, ſirnamed Atheling (2).

Death of Prince Edward, and of Leofric, Duke of Mercia. Sax. Ann. Godiva's Adventure. Brompton. M. Weſt.

Leofric, Duke of Mercia, quickly followed him, this ſame year (3). Hiſtorians give this Lord a great character; but eſpecially they extol Godiva his wife, above all the Women of her time. It is related of this Lady, that in order to free the inhabitants of Coventry from a heavy tax laid on them by her Husband, ſhe readily conſented to a very extraordinary condition, on which the Earl promiſed to eaſe them of their burden, namely, that ſhe ſhould ride ſtark naked from one end of the town to the other. This condition gave the Burghers little hopes of being relieved. But Godiva perform'd it, covering her Body with her hair, and commanding all perſons to keep within doors, and from their windows, on pain of death. Notwithſtanding this ſevere penalty, there was one, who could not forbear giving a look, out of curioſity, but it coſt him his life. In memory of this event, there is a Statue of a Man looking out of a window, always kept in a certain houſe at Coventry (4). Alfgar ſucceeded to his Father's Earldom, by Harold's intereſt, who earneſtly interceded for him (5).

but can't obtain them.

Harold's ambition and hopes were revived by Prince Edward's death. That Prince indeed had left a Son who inherited all his rights, but ſo young, that it ſeem'd very eaſy to ſupplant him. Beſides, he might poſſibly die before the King. Accordingly, Harold reſolved to improve the preſent favourable conjuncture. But before he openly diſcovered his deſigns, he thought it requiſite to get out of the hands of the Duke of Normandy, Ulnoth his Brother, and Hacune his Nephew, whom the Earl his Father had given for hoſtages to the King. But tho' he demanded them very urgently, alledging, ſince Goodwin was dead, there was no reaſon to detain them, and unjuſtly deprive them of the benefit of an Engliſh education, yet he could not prevail with the King. Edward always put him off with ſaying, they were not in his power, but the Duke of Normandy's, and therefore to that Prince he muſt make application. In fine, Harold perceiving he could obtain no other anſwer from the King, deſired leave to go into Normandy, and ſolicite the Duke for their deliverance. His requeſt was readily granted. Nothing could be more agreeable to the King, than the Earl's reſolution of going to Normandy, where he did not queſtion but the Duke would detain him. At leaſt, he hoped Duke William would take ſuch meaſures as would free him from all obſtacles the Earl might lay in his way.

He ſets out for Normandy. Malmsb. Brompt. S. Dunelm.

Harold having obtained the King's conſent, embarked for Roan, without the leaſt ſuſpicion of the danger he was running into, being ignorant of the King's intention concerning the ſucceſſion (6). Hardly was he at Sea, when a tempeſt aroſe, which drove him into Picardy, and compelled him to put in at one of the Ports of the Earl of Ponthieu, where he was immediately ſeized. As ſoon as he was known, he was carried to the Earl of Ponthieu, who, glad to find himſelf maſter of ſo rich a prize, reſolved to ſet a round price on his head. It would have been difficult for Harold to get off, had he not, whilſt he pretended to treat about his ranſom, found means to inform the Duke of Normandy of the accident befallen him. As ſoon as the Duke received the news, he ſent and demanded the priſoner of the Earl of Ponthieu, telling him he had no right to detain a ſtranger that was coming to Roan, and by a tempeſt caſt on his coaſts. The Earl not daring to diſpute with the Duke, ſet the priſoner at liberty, who immediately went on to Roan. Duke William not being ignorant of Harold's deſign with reſpect to the crown of England, was at a loſs how to behave. He had but two ways to take, both equally dangerous. Harold was either to be detained by force, or gained by fair means. If he took the firſt method, he was apprehenſive of declaring too ſoon, ſince it was not for his intereſt the Engliſh ſhould yet know, he had any thoughts of the Crown. Beſides, Harold had ſo many friends in the kingdom, that it was to be feared, his detention would occaſion a rupture between England and Normandy, which would break all the meaſures the King ſhould take in his favour. And indeed, in caſe Edward died during the war, how was it poſſible for him to leave the crown to a Prince actually in arms againſt the Engliſh Nation? Moreover, Harold being Duke of Weſſex and Earl of Kent, all the ſtrong places in the ſouthern parts were in the hands of his creatures, and it was this chiefly that could moſt obſtruct the Duke's deſigns. In fine, the Duke had not perfect information what ſteps Harold had made to pave his way to the crown; as on his part, Harold was ignorant of the deſigns of the King and Duke. The Duke conſidered further, that by detaining Harold, he ſhould break the moſt ſacred rights of hoſpitality, which a great Soul cannot be guilty of without offering extreme violence to it ſelf. Theſe conſiderations induced him to take the other courſe, tho' it was no leſs dangerous. By diſcovering his intentions to Harold, he put it in his power to prevent their execution. However, believing he ſhould gain him by this proof of his confidence, he plainly told him his hopes, of one day mounting the throne of England, founded on the Good-will the King bore him (7). This diſcovery was followed with promiſes, in caſe he would ſupport his pretenſions, and the aſſurance of a reward proportionable to ſo important a ſervice. He let him know moreover, that his ambition to aſpire to the crown, tho' not of the royal family, was no ſecret to him, and endeavoured to make him ſenſible, how difficult it would be to attain his ends. To divert him from his purpoſe, he repreſented to him all the obſtacles he was of courſe to expect, as well from Edgar, as the other Engliſh Lords, who would look on his ambition with a jealous eye. To theſe conſiderations he added another that was no leſs urgent. He plainly told him, tho' he ſhould be ſo fortunate, as to ſurmount all other obſtacles,

(6) Harold's going to Normandy is variouſly related as to the Time, Manner, and Occaſion of it. With our Author agree Simeon of Durham, Brompton, and Eadmer, only with this addition, that King Edward foretold him what would happen to him. Malmſbury ſays the occaſion of it was this. Harold being at his Houſe at Boſenham in Suſſex, had a mind to go out in a Fiſher-boat for his diverſion, but ſailing farther than he was aware, a tempeſt aroſe and drove him as is here related by Rapin. Matthew Paris believes alſo he was driven by a tempeſt to Normandy, where to gain his liberty he was forc'd to do as is here related. So uncertain are traditional Accounts! Our Author's conduct through this whole affair ſeems to be moſt natural and likely.

Harold diſſembles the Matter, and promiſes to ſtand by the Duke.

Harold was too wiſe not to ſee, that, on this occaſion, he had but one courſe to take; which was, to pretend to be convinced by the reaſons the Duke had alledged. He returned him therefore in anſwer, that indeed, before the arrival of Prince Edward, he had believed if the King died without heirs, he was as worthy to aſcend the throne as any other nobleman of the kingdom. He even owned, he had begun to take ſome meaſures, which inſpired him with hopes of ſucceſs; but had dropt his deſign ſince the coming of Edward, being ſenſible there was no room to pretend to the crown, as long as there were Princes of the royal family in England. He added, ſince he was acquainted with his pretenſions, and the King's pleaſure, which till then he had been ignorant of, he had much rather the kingdom ſhould be governed by ſo great a Prince as the Duke, than by Edgar Atheling, who ſcarce knew how to govern himſelf. To convince him the more of his ſincerity, he required certain conditions, and among others, demanded one of his daughters in marriage, as a reward for his future ſervice. Whatever Harold required was immediately and gladly complied with. But as the Princeſs, the Duke deſigned for him, was too young, the intended marriage was deferred till a more convenient time. Mean while, Duke William not truſting wholly to Harold's bare word, made him ſwear on the Goſpels, that he would punctually perform his promiſes, eſpecially, that he would never attempt to mount the throne of England. This agreement being made, they parted both of them extremely well ſatisfied in outward appearance, and Harold returned into England (1).

Harold takes new Meaſures to ſecure the Succeſſion to himſelf.

He was no ſooner at liberty, but he looked upon his oath as extorted, and conſequently not binding. He could not underſtand upon what foundation the Duke of Normandy pretended to the crown of England, or by what right Edward could transfer it to a foreigner. And therefore, ſo far was he from any thoughts of ſtanding to his engagements, that he reſolved to take advantage of the Duke's confidence, and contrive juſter meaſures to fruſtrate his deſigns. From thence-forward he uſed a double diligence to ſtrengthen his party in ſuch a manner, as ſhould put it out of the power of the King or Duke to lay any obſtacle in his way. If hitherto he had entertained any ſcruple with regard to Prince Edgar, it entirely vaniſhed upon conſideration that in mounting the throne himſelf he ſhould do no injury to that Prince, ſince the crown would be otherwiſe diſpoſed of even by his uncle the King. He laboured therefore more and more to ſecure an intereſt in all the great Lords of the kingdom, to which he found the way very open. The Duke of Normandy was abſent, and but little known in England, where moreover the Normans were extremely odious. Prince Edgar, by reaſon of his youth, was in no condition to oppoſe deſigns ſo detrimental to him. As for the King, he was ſo unreſolved in the affair of the ſucceſſion, that he promoted the intereſt neither of the Prince his nephew, nor of the Duke. He was no doubt at a loſs how to reconcile his promiſe to the Duke of Normandy, with his recalling his nephew from Hungary. He thought only of paſſing his days in peace, without troubling himſelf about what ſhould happen after his death. Thus every thing concurring to favour Harold's deſigns, he neglected nothing that might ſerve to confirm the good opinion conceived of him by the Engliſh. Two opportunities that offered themſelves preſently after, were extremely favourable to him.

1063. Harold ſubdues the Welſh. S. Dunelm. Flor. Wig. Sax. Ann. Malmſb.

The Welſh renewing their incurſions under the conduct of Griffin their King, Harold and his Brother Toſton joined their forces to repulſe them. They were ſo fortunate in their expedition, that, after ſeveral advantages gained upon the Welſh, they compelled them to dethrone Griffin, and become tributary to England. Griffin being afterwards reſtored, and renewing the war with the Engliſh, Harold marched to the frontiers, and ſtruck ſuch a terror into the Welſh, that they ſent him the head of their King (2). This event which ſhowed how formidable Harold was to the enemies of the State, confirmed the Engliſh in their opinion, that he, who knew ſo well how to defend it, deſerved to wear the crown.

Toſton drove out of Northumberland. Sax. Ann. Malmſb. S. Dunelm. Brompt.

Harold had another opportunity to add new luſtre to his glory, as it enabled him to give proofs of his moderation and equity, as he had lately done of his valour and conduct. Toſton his Brother, Earl of Northumberland, treated the Northumbrians with ſuch ſeverity, and committed ſo many acts of injuſtice, that at laſt, the people not being able to bear his oppreſſions any longer, took up arms againſt him, and expelled him Northumberland. This action being of a dangerous conſequence, Harold was ordered to chaſtiſe them, and reſtore his Brother. As ſoon as he approached the borders, the Northumbrians ſent deputies to inform him of the reaſons of their inſurrection. They told him, they had no deſign of withdrawing their obedience from the King, but only from an unjuſt and cruel governor, who exerciſed over them a tyrannical power, to which neither they nor their forefathers had ever been ſubject. Intimating withal, they were reſolved to hazard their lives, rather than ſubmit to the like power again. However, they ſolemnly proteſted, provided the King would ſet over them one that would govern them according to the laws and cuſtoms of their country, nothing ſhould be able to ſhake their fidelity. To theſe remonſtrances they added a long liſt of the grievances they had ſuffered under Toſton, intreating Harold to prefer the Good of the publick before the intereſts of his own family. Harold finding this affair related chiefly to Toſton, and that the King was not directly concerned in it, ſent an impartial account of the whole matter to the court. At the ſame time he interceded for the Northumbrians, and not content with obtaining their pardon, procured them Morkard, Son of Alfgar Duke of Mercia, for their governor (3). By this equitable proceeding, he entirely gained the affection of the northern people, and contracted a ſtricter friendſhip with Alfgar than before. This union was abſolutely neceſſary for the execution of his projects.

Harold ſent to reſtore him; but approves of his being driven out.

Malmſb.

But if this action ſtrengthened the people's eſteem and affection for him, it exaſperated to the laſt degree his Brother Toſton, who never forgave him. But as it was not in his power to vent his fury on Harold's perſon, he turned his rage upon ſome of his domeſticks (4), whom he cauſed to be cut in pieces, barrell'd up, and ſent to his Brother for a preſent. After ſo barbarous a deed, not daring to ſtay any longer in England, he retired into Flanders to Earl Baldwin his Father-in-law (5).

A barbarous act of Toſton's. Huntingd. M. Weſt.

Whilſt Harold was thus paving his way to the crown, Edward never concerned himſelf about the ſucceſſion, which he had exceedingly embroiled by his engagement with the Duke of Normandy. His thoughts were wholly employed about the ſtructure of the Church and Monaſtery of Weſtminſter, on which he laid out the money he had vowed to expend on a journey to Rome, which was diſpenſed with by the Pope upon that condition. There was formerly in the ſame place, called Thorney by the Saxons, a famous temple ſacred to Apollo. Sebert, King of Eſſex, embracing the Goſpel, converted this Pagan temple into a Chriſtian Church, which was deſtroyed by the Danes. This Church having been long buried in its ruins, Edward undertook to rebuild it, with an adjoining Monaſtery, which from its lying Weſt of London, was called Weſtminſter (6). In proceſs of time a City was built here by degrees, which almoſt rivals London itſelf, and keeps the name of the Monaſtery. Theſe two Cities ſeparated only by a Gate, have diſtinct magiſtrates and privileges, though they are often confounded under the name of London. The King as he was at dinner ordering Harold to ſerve him with the Cup, Toſton was ſo enraged at his being preferred before him, that he flew in his Face in the King's preſence, and pulled him down to the ground by his hair. But the Soldiers coming in and parting them, Toſton in a rage left the court, and going to his Brother's Country-Houſe, ſerved his domeſticks as is above related. Upon which the King commanded him to be baniſhed, and the Northumbrians expelled him their Country. But this does not ſeem probable; for what occaſion had the Northumbrians to riſe againſt him, ſeeing he was baniſh'd before by the King?

(6) It was dedicated to St. Peter. This fabrick of Edward's was demoliſhed by Henry III. about one hundred and ſixty years after, who erected a new one, which was fifty years in building. The Abbots very much enlarged it on the Weſt-ſide, and Henry VII. added to the Eaſt a Chapel, which Leland calls the Miracle of the World. Edward was buried the next day after his death, in his newly dedicated Church.

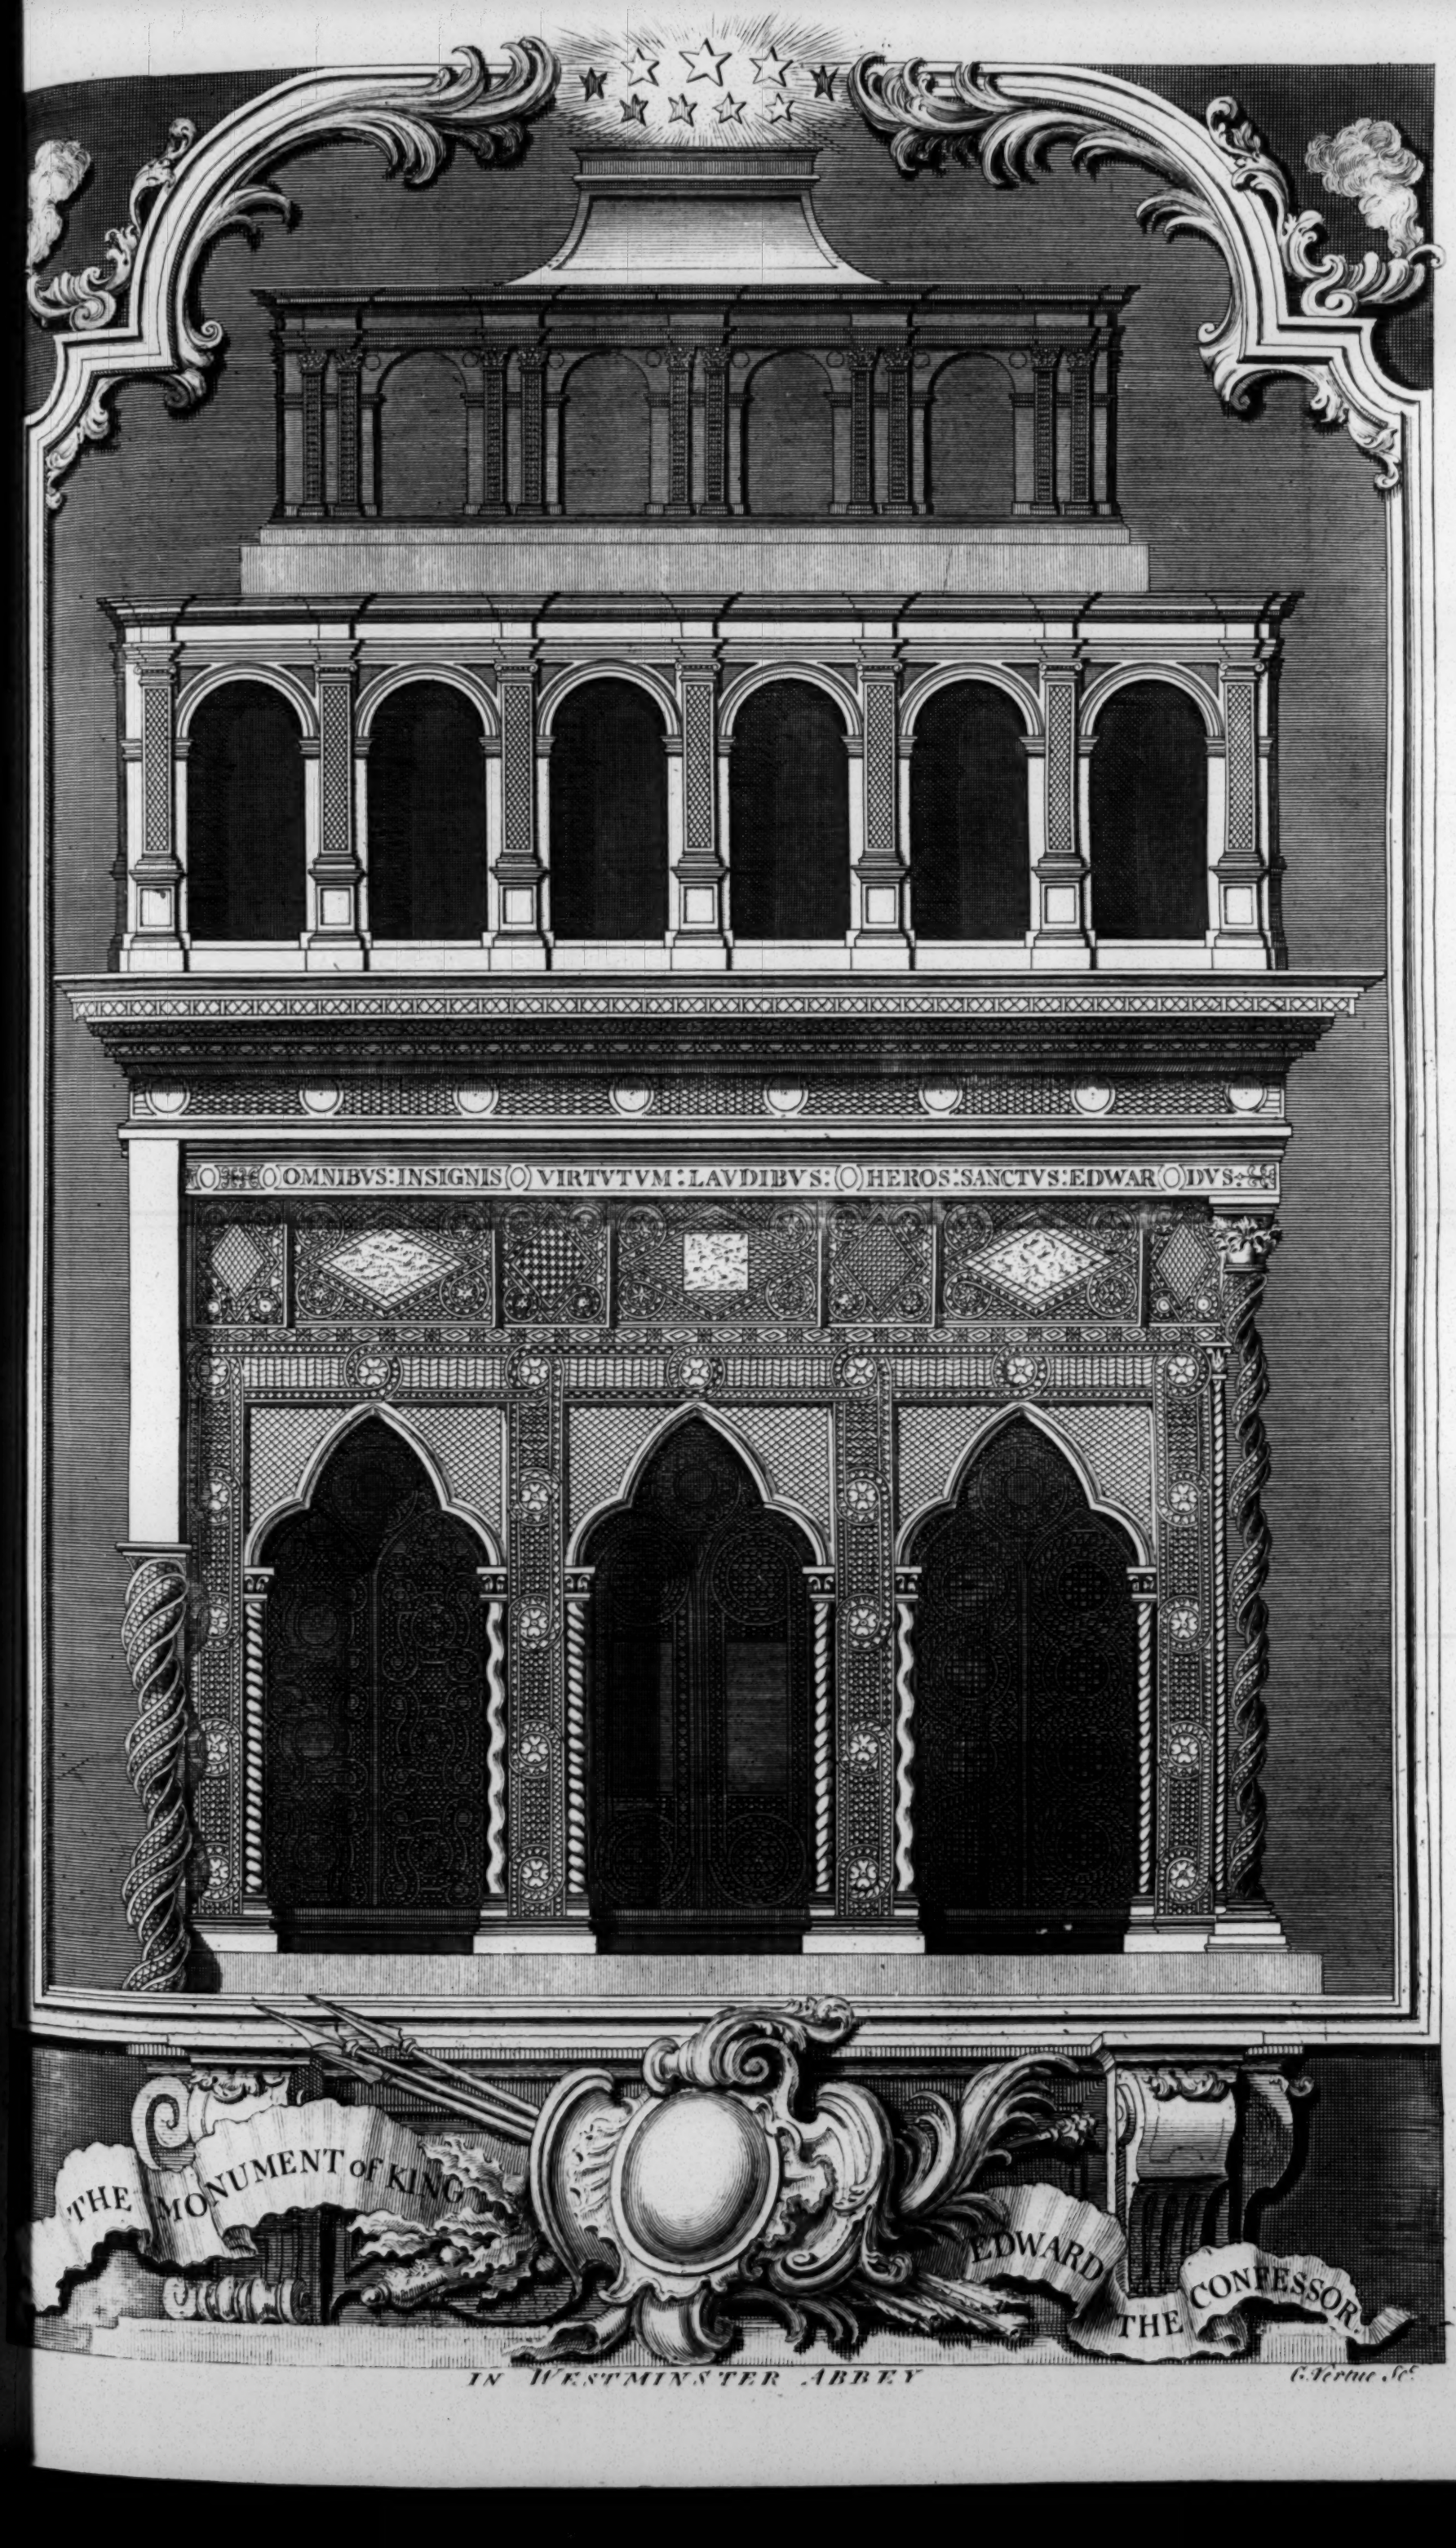
But the Soldiers coming in and parting them, Toſton in a rage left the court, and going to his Brother's Country-Houſe, ſerved his domeſticks as is above related. Upon which the King commanded him to be baniſhed, and the Northumbrians expelled him their Country. But this does not ſeem probable; for what occaſion had the Northumbrians to riſe againſt him, ſeeing he was baniſh'd before by the King?

(6) It was dedicated to St. Peter. This fabrick of Edward's was demoliſhed by Henry III. about one hundred and ſixty years after, who erected a new one, which was fifty years in building. The Abbots very much enlarged it on the Weſt-ſide, and Henry VII. added to the Eaſt a Chapel, which Leland calls the Miracle of the World. Edward was buried the next day after his death, in his newly dedicated Church.

Edward



OMNIBVS: INSIGNIS VIRTVTVM: LAVDIBVS: HEROS: SANCTVS: EDWARDVS:
THE MONUMENT of KING
EDWARD
THE CONFESSOR.
IN WESTMINSTER ABBEY
G. Vertue Sc.

Edward was deſirous the dedication ſhould be performed in a very ſolemn manner (1). To this end he ſummoned to meet at London a general aſſembly, at which were preſent all the Biſhops and great Men of the kingdom, to be witneſſes of this ceremony. At this very time it was, that the King was ſeized with a ſudden illneſs, of which he died in a few days. As ſoon as he found the time of his diſſolution approaching, his principal care was to finiſh the ceremony for which the great Men were aſſembled (2). As for the ſucceſſion, he would not meddle with it, ſurrounded as it was with ſo many difficulties. In his own mind he was for the Duke of Normandy: The right was manifeſtly in Prince Edgar his Nephew; but Harold had the hearts and hands of the Engliſh. So many difficulties, upon which he could never determine whilſt in health, becoming inſurmountable in his preſent condition, he reſolved to leave the deciſion to God alone. Knighton.

Harold's Cabals. The Nobles ſend a deputation to the King, who leaves it to them to chuſe a Sovereign.

Mean while, Harold was not idle. Almoſt all the Lords of the kingdom, both ſpiritual and temporal, being then aſſembled at London, he found means to induce them to act in his favour, and come to a reſolution of ſending deputies to the dying King to intreat him to name a ſucceſſor. But withal, theſe deputies had orders to inſinuate to the King, that in caſe he nominated any but Harold, he would infallibly involve the kingdom in endleſs troubles, which would be inconſiſtent with his wiſdom, and the affection he had all along expreſs'd for his people. Edward, not being then in a condition to examine a propoſal of this nature, replied, That ſince they were met in a body, he left it to them to chuſe the perſon they judged moſt worthy to rule over them. He died a few moments after (3), leaving the ſucceſſion as unſettled at his death as it was during his life.

Edward's Death.

This Prince, who was born at Giſlip (4) near Oxford, reigned twenty-four years, without ever ſuffering any misfortune from foreign enemies. However, he cannot be ſaid to have reigned happily, ſince he lived in continual fears, occaſioned by the over-grown power of Earl Goodwin and his family. His mild and peaceable temper were a great means however to procure him ſome tranquillity. Had he attempted to humble Goodwin's pride, and leſſen Harold's power, he would certainly have been involved in troubles, from whence he would have found it difficult to extricate himſelf. But by ſhutting his eyes at their ſecret practices, and feigning to know nothing of their deſigns, he prevented them from acting more openly, cauſed them to lay more diſtant ſchemes, and thereby gained time to arrive at the end of his days. He was remarkable neither for his Virtues or Vices; and his natural parts were but mean. His piety has been exceedingly cried up, and has acquired him the glorious title of Confeſſor; and yet we do not find he was any ſufferer on account of religion, unleſs we conſider as a ſort of Martyrdom, the mortifications he privately laid upon himſelf from a religious motive. It is certain he was very charitable, and expended in alms the Sums vainly laviſhed away by other Princes upon their pleaſures. This joined to his Good-nature, of which he gave from time to time uncommon inſtances, made him paſs for a Saint among the people, and particularly among the Monks, who reaped great advantages from his liberal diſpoſition. They have not been ſatisfied with extolling his Virtues to the Skies, but have even, if I may ſo ſay, canoniz'd his very faults, and endeavoured to repreſent them as ſo many proofs of his Sanctity. Of this we need no other witneſs but his own Hiſtorian or rather Panegyriſt, who attributes his voluntary chaſtity to a vow made before his marriage. This Writer aſſures us, Edward eſpouſed Editha, daughter of Goodwin, purely to exerciſe his Virtue by a continual temptation. But it is eaſy to ſee he acted from a very different motive, ſince he parted with his wife the moment he thought he could do it with ſafety. However, the opinion of his ſanctity taking by degrees deep root in the minds of the people, he was canonized by Pope Alexander III, under the name of Edward the Confeſſor (5). Ailred.

His Character.

It was not thought ſufficient to allow this Prince all the Virtue neceſſary to carry him to Heaven, unleſs he had a place given him alſo among the Saints of the firſt claſs. We are told he was favoured with ſeveral revelations, with the gift of propheſy, and many other miraculous powers, in proof of which ſuch weak and trifling inſtances are produced, as are not worth mentioning. However, I can't paſs over in ſilence one ſpecial privilege he is ſaid to receive from Heaven, of curing the King's Evil. Nay, it is affirm'd, this privilege has deſcended to the Kings of England his ſucceſſors. Hence the cuſtom in England of the King's Touching for the Evil at a certain time of the year (6). But the late King William III. of glorious memory, was ſo perſuaded he ſhould do no injury to perſons afflicted with this diſtemper, by not touching them, that he refrained from it all his reign. The Kings of France alſo have claimed the ſame privilege ever ſince the time of Clovis, the firſt Chriſtian King of that kingdom (7). Ailred. Malmſb.

What has been moſt commended in King Edward, was his Good-nature, the exceſſiveneſs whereof has been carefully inſinuated by ſeveral circumſtances of his Life, of which I ſhall content my ſelf with producing two as a ſpecimen of the reſt. One day being laid down upon the bed, one of his domeſticks, who did not know he was in the room, ſtole ſome money out of a cheſt he found open, which the King let him carry off without ſaying a word. Quickly after, the Boy returning to make a ſecond attempt, the King call'd to him without the leaſt paſſion, Sirrah, you'd beſt be ſatisfied with what you've got, for if my Chamberlain comes and catches you, he'll not only take away all you have ſtol'n, but whip you ſeverely (8). Another time, as he was hunting, a countryman maliciouſly ſpoiling his ſport, he gallop'd up to him, and ſaid to him in anger, By our Lady, I would be revenged on thee if it was in my power. Theſe are the inconteſtable proofs of his extraordinary Good-nature, which, according to his Panegyriſts, advanc'd him ſo far above all other Men. Ailred. Rievallenſ. Malmſb.

Edward was the laſt King of Egbert's race, though not the laſt Saxon King, as ſome have affirmed, ſince his ſucceſſor was of that nation. Had not this weak Prince prepoſterouſly abſtain'd from converſing with his Queen, a very beautiful and virtuous Lady, he might perhaps have had children, and thereby prevented a revolution, which involv'd the Engliſh in Slavery.

Union of three ſorts of Laws under Edward. Brompt. Knighton.

Before the reign of Edward, the Weſt-Saxon, Mercian and Daniſh Laws were obſerved in England, namely, the firſt in Weſſex, the ſecond in Mercia, and the laſt in Northumberland. This Prince reduced them all into one body; and from that time they became common to all England, under the name of the Laws of Edward, to diſtinguiſh them from thoſe of the Normans, introduced afterwards (9).

(6) It will not be amiſs to relate the firſt Inſtance of this Hereditary Miracle, as Mr. Collier calls it. A young married Woman having the misfortune to be barren, and troubled at the ſame time with the diſtemper ſince called the King's Evil, was, after all human means had been tried in vain, admoniſhed in a Viſion to go to the King, by whoſe merits ſhe ſhould be cured upon his Waſhing, Touching, and Signing with the Croſs the Parts affected. The Woman runs to Court next Morning overjoyed, and tells the King the whole matter; who thereupon diſdains not to Waſh, Touch and Croſs, her putrified Sores, which immediately breaking, and Corruption and Worms burſting out, the Parts were in a few days healed without the leaſt Scar remaining; and moreover, her barrenneſs was removed, and ſhe ſoon became the joyful Mother of Children. This is the firſt Act, as it is given us by Ailred in his Hiſtory of the Life and Miracles of Edward the Confeſſor, of that Supernatural Power, enjoyed by the Kings of England ever ſince. But though Mr. Collier ſays, to diſpute this Matter is to go to the Exceſſes of Scepticiſm, yet there are ſome, who doubt of it on the following accounts.

I. This Power is generally fixed to the Lineal Succeſſion; whereas it is plain, there was no ſuch thing in thoſe days, neither was Edward himſelf the next Heir.

II. It is plain from Ailred, that this privilege was given him not as a King, but as a Saint; and Malmſbury ſays, they are to be blamed that attribute it to his Royalty and not to his Sanctity. Conſequently there is no Reaſon his Succeſſors, who were certainly no Saints, ſhould be ſo highly favoured of Heaven.

III. Ailred reckons up many other Miracles which he performed; as the reſtoring to their Sight ſix or ſeven blind Men, &c. but does not ſay a word of his Power of curing the Evil deſcended to his Succeſſors, any more than his Power of reſtoring the Blind to their Sight, or of his removing Barrenneſs, which one would think ſhould be joined to the other, ſince they were cured both by the ſame Touch.

IV. As there is no evident Reaſon why the Kings of England ſhould have this privilege above any other Chriſtian Prince, ſo if Heaven had granted ſuch a Power to our Kings, one would think they ſhould have it in ſuch a degree as to render it viſible to all, and that the Cure ſhould immediately follow the Touch: Whereas Multitudes are not cured at all, and thoſe that are pretended to be ſo, not till a conſiderable time after they have been Touched.

(7) This Miracle is appropriated by Laurentius, Phyſician to Henry IV. to the Crown of France; but Dr. Tucker is even with him, for he makes the Kings of France to do it by virtue of their Alliance to the Royal Family of England. And Mr. Collier will have the antiquity of this Power to be on the ſide of England, ſince he ſays, Lewis the Godly was the firſt that Touched for the Evil two hundred years after our Edward. Eccl. Hiſt.

(8) The Story goes on, that the Chamberlain coming in after the Boy was gone, and miſſing the Money, fell into a great rage; but the King calmly ſaid to him, Be contented, it may be the poor Rogue that has it wants it more than we do; there's enough left for us. Ailred. 21. HAROLD II.

HAROLD II. 1066.

IF the great Men aſſembled to appoint a ſucceſſor to Edward, had been ſwayed only by juſtice, equity, and the antient cuſtoms of the kingdom, they would not have long debated, to know to whom the crown was devolved. Edgar Atheling was the only Prince of the family of their antient Kings, and conſequently, the only perſon who had a right to lay claim to the crown. But Harold had ſo well laid his meaſures, that he was unanimouſly elected, without any regard to the right of the lawful heir. As for the Duke of Normandy, his pretenſions grounded on the late King's promiſe, do not ſeem to have been conſidered at all. It is certain this Prince had never publickly declared his deſign of aſpiring to the crown of England. Accordingly, the Engliſh Lords might be ignorant of the matter, or at leaſt pretend to be ſo. But ſuppoſing they had been informed of his pretenſions, it would have ſerved only to furniſh them with a freſh motive, to place on the throne a King more capable than Edgar Atheling, of defending the kingdom againſt the attacks of a foreign Prince.

Elected by the Aſſembly-General. Sax. Ann. S. Dunelm.

Various opinions about Harold's ſucceeding to the Crown. Sax. Ann. S. Dunelm. Malmſb. Mat. Weſt. Brompt.

The manner of Harold's ſucceeding to the crown is variouſly related by Hiſtorians: Several affirm (1), he was elected with one common voice, and without any conſtraint, by the Wittena-Gemot then aſſembled, and crown'd the day after his election by the Archbiſhop of York. Others ſay, he uſurped the crown by compelling the great council to elect him, after extorting his nomination from the late King juſt as he was dying (2). There are ſome, who look upon this election as a fiction, affirming, Harold, without troubling himſelf about the conſent of the Nobles or People, put the Crown on his head himſelf without any formality (3). The reaſon of this diverſity among the Hiſtorians, proceeds from their eſpouſing either the right of Harold, or of the Duke of Normandy, as if Prince Edgar's claim was to be reckoned as nothing; whereas in truth he alone had a right to ſucceed to the crown. But as among this variety of opinions, a Man is in danger of being ſwayed by the paſſions and prejudices of the Hiſtorians, rather than by juſtice and equity, it will not be amiſs to explain this matter, by laying before the reader, what might be alledged for and againſt each of the three competitors.

Edgar's title.

As for Prince Edgar, it ſuffices to ſay for him, he was the ſole Prince of the royal race. It is true, his being born out of the kingdom might be objected againſt him. But as Prince Edward his Father was not legally baniſhed, his being forced by Canute to live in exile, ought not to have prejudic'd his Son's right.

The Duke of Normandy's Right enquired into. Knighton. Brompt. Ann. Margam.

As for the Duke of Normandy, he can hardly be imagined to aſpire to the crown of England without ſome foundation, and yet it cannot be conceived upon what title he ſupported his pretenſion; ſo great is the diverſity of opinions upon this ſubject. Some tell us, he was invited over by the Engliſh to free them from the tyranny of Harold (4). Others ſays, Edward, when in Normandy, promiſed him, if ever he came to the crown, to make him his heir. In fine, ſeveral affirm, that Edward appointed him his ſucceſſor by his laſt Will; and ſome even aſſure us, this Will was confirmed in Edward's life-time by the general aſſembly of the Nation; but this pretended Will was never produced. Neither does it appear that Duke William ever founded his claim upon any ſuch thing, as if it were known, or he had it in his hands. In all probability therefore the foundation he went upon, was ſome verbal promiſe made him by Edward, when he was in England. It was doubtleſs in conſequence of this promiſe, that he required Harold not to riſe up in competition againſt him. Had the Engliſh done Edgar juſtice, and placed him on the throne, it is not likely Duke William would have attempted, upon ſo trifling a pretenſion, to wreſt the crown from a Prince to whom of right it belonged. But he had to deal with Harold, who, being only a private Man, had procured himſelf the crown by indirect practices, and without any manner of right. Accordingly, ſetting aſide Prince Edgar, he compared his right only with that of the reigning King. His intereſt induced him to think, that Edward's promiſe was equivalent to an election, ſince it was thought proper to exclude the lawful heir. To this may be added, that he looked upon the crown of England as what he could not miſs of, eſpecially after binding Harold by an oath. And therefore, the indignation at being deceived, the deſire of Revenge, and chiefly his Ambition, the root of the quarrel, all concurred to inſpire him with a reſolution to make an attempt upon the Engliſh crown, in ſpite of all oppoſition. Perſuaded as he was, that he had no leſs right than Harold, he thought he might uſe force to wreſt the crown from a Prince, who had naturally no title to it. Theſe, probably, were the motives that engaged Duke William in ſo great an undertaking, the ſucceſs whereof ſeemed however very doubtful.

The examination of Harold's title.

As for Harold's right it ought alſo to be conſidered under a double view, with regard to the Duke of Normandy, and with regard to Prince Edgar. If we examine the election of this King, in oppoſition to the Duke, we find nothing but what was regular and according to form, and againſt which the Duke could have any juſt reaſon to object. It is certain, ſuppoſing Edward had nominated Duke William his ſucceſſor, either by Will, or otherwiſe, the nomination would have been of no force, unleſs confirmed by the aſſembly of States (5). Accordingly this is what ſome affirm, being ſenſible the Duke's title without this approbation was little worth. And in truth, where is the nation, that, without being forced to it, would ſuffer their King, by his own bare nomination, to ſubject them to a Foreigner, in excluſion of the Princes of the royal Blood, or even of the moſt worthy Lords of the kingdom? If this were ever the caſe, it was done by ſurprize, before the people had time to oppoſe it. The election therefore of Harold was very lawful, at leaſt with regard to the Duke of Normandy, ſince it was made by the aſſembly-general, whoſe power Duke William had no right to diſpute.

But in comparing Harold's title with Prince Edgar's, it is hard to give it ſo favourable a conſtruction. It may indeed be ſupported by the opinion of thoſe who maintain, that during the Saxon government, the crown was elective, and the Nobles and People had a power of giving it to whom they pleaſed. But beſides the difficulties attending this opinion, ſuppoſing that were ſo, this argument would not be ſufficient to juſtify Harold's election. How extenſive ſoever ſome would make the privileges of the aſſembly-general in the time of the Saxon Kings, yet no one, I believe, will affirm they had a power of beſtowing the crown on a private perſon, in prejudice of the Princes of the royal family. At leaſt it would be exceeding difficult to produce any inſtances from the hiſtory of the Anglo-Saxons, to eſtabliſh this opinion. The queſtion then amounts to this, whether the Nation had a right to elect Harold on excluſion of Edgar, or whether, on this occaſion, they did not ſtretch their power beyond its natural bounds. As I deſign to treat of this matter in another place (6), I ſhall not undertake to decide the queſtion at preſent, but only remark, that ſuppoſing the Nation had ſuch a power, yet it muſt be owned it was abuſed at this juncture, and that Edgar had great injuſtice done him. But notwithſtanding all its defects, this election gave Harold an incomparably better title than the bare nomination of King Edward gave Duke William, granting the forementioned Will was as real, as it appears to be imaginary. From what has been ſaid, it is eaſy to ſee, the Duke of Normandy's claim was built on a weak foundation. But to return to our hiſtory.

Toſton prepares to diſturb his Brother.

After Harold was crown'd, there was not a perſon in the kingdom, but what owned him for ſovereign, and paid him obedience. But tho' he found no oppoſition at home, it was otherwiſe abroad. Not to mention the Duke of Normandy, who, before he diſcovered, put himſelf in a condition to execute his deſigns, Earl Toſton was preparing to diſturb the King his Brother in the poſſeſſion of his new dignity. He could not forgive him his impartial proceedings, when, in favour of the Northumbrians, he diſpoſſeſs'd him of his government. Though Harold's acceſſion to the crown ſhould have rendered him more formidable to him, this conſideration ſerv'd only to inflame his hatred the more, and put him upon deviſing all poſſible means to dethrone him. As he was not ignorant of the Duke of Normandy's intentions, with whom he had contracted a ſtrict friendſhip, on account of their marrying two Siſters, Daughters of the Earl of Flanders, he S. went to him to concert measures with him against the King his Brother. There is no doubt but Duke William encouraged him to execute his design (1). But it does not appear that he furnished him with any Money, Troops, or Ships, of all which he had himself so great need against his intended invasion. Probably therefore it was the Earl of Flanders, his Father-in-law, that supplied Toston with Ships, by means of which he infested the English coasts, and plundered the Isle of Wight. After which, he landed some troops at Sandwich. But being informed the King was marching towards him, he set sail for the North, and entering the Humber with his little fleet (2), made a descent on Yorkshire, and commited ravages as if he had been in an enemy's country. Harold, not thinking it adviseable to leave the southern parts, commissioned Earl Morcard to go against his Brother; who, having been made governor of Northumberland in the room of Toston, was particularly concerned to put a stop to his incursions. As for the King, he remained at London, that he might have an eye to Edgar's party, and prevent them from exciting any troubles upon that young Prince's account. This seemed to him, at that time, to be what he had most to fear; being sensible, the injustice done Edgar sat heavy upon the minds of those who were well-affected to the ancient royal family. Accordingly, to prevent their discontents from breaking out into action, he caressed the Prince as well as those of his party. He even insinuated from time to time, that he had accepted the crown purely on account of Edgar's youth, willing they should understand, as if he meant to restore it to the Prince when he was of age to govern. With this view, he created him Earl of Oxford, and seemed to take a very particular care of his education, as it were to qualify him for the government of the kingdom.

He plunders the Isle of Wight, and lands at Sandwich, and then in the North.

Harold's behaviour to Edgar.

Mean while Morcard, accompanied with his Brother Edwin, Earl of Chester, marched with all expedition against Toston, who was now on the south side of the Humber. He came upon him unawares in Lincolnshire, and put his little army to flight, compelling him to betake himself to his Ships. Toston finding he could do nothing considerable with so small a number of forces, steered towards Scotland, in expectation of assistance from thence (3). But perceiving the King of Scotland was not disposed to support him, he puts to Sea again, with design to make another descent upon England. Prevented by contrary winds, he was driven on the coast of Norway, where he accidentally stumbled upon what he had been seeking so industriously.

He is driven to Norway. Sax. Ann.

Harold Harfagar King of Norway, had lately taken some of the Orcades (4), which belonged to Scotland, and was fitting out a more numerous fleet in order to carry on his conquests. Toston being informed of this Prince's designs, went directly to him, pretending he was come on purpose to propose to him a more noble undertaking. He represented to him, that a favourable opportunity offered to conquer England, if he would but turn his arms that way. The better to persuade him, he told him, there were in the kingdom two powerful factions, both enemies to the King, the one for Prince Edgar, the other for the Duke of Normandy, and therefore, the English being thus divided, it would not be difficult to subdue them. Adding, that he himself had a strong party in Northumberland, which would very much promote the execution of his design. In fine, he made him believe the King his Brother was extremely odious to the English, and would be certainly deserted by them, as soon as there appeared in England a foreign army strong enough to support his enemies. Harfagar, greedy of fame, and already devouring in his imagination so noble a prize, wanted not much solicitation to engage in this project. Prepossessed by Toston of the practicableness of the thing, he resolved to employ all his forces in making so glorious a conquest.

The Duke of Normandy prepares for the Invasion of England. Dunelm. Camden. M. West. Ingulph.

Whilst the King of Norway was making his preparations, the Duke of Normandy was no less seriously thinking of means to wrest from Harold a crown, he had so long been in expectation of, and which he could not bear to see on his Head without extreme regret. Though his Rival, in all appearance, was firmly seated in his throne; the Duke imagined he was able to pull him down, since the way by arms was still open; when all other methods failed. However, to proceed regularly, he sent ambassadors to Harold, to require him to deliver him up the crown, and in case of refusal, to charge him with the breach of his oath, and declare war against him. Harold told the ambassadors, "Their master had no manner "of right to the crown of England: That supposing the "late King had disposed of it in his favour, a thing "the English knew nothing of, it was contrary to the "laws of the Land, which allowed not the King to give "away the crown according to his fancy, much less to "a Foreigner. As for his part, he had been elected by "those, who had the power of placing the Kings on the "throne, and therefore could not resign it, without the "breach of that trust reposed in him by the English. "As for the oath, the violation whereof he was charged "with, it having been extorted from him at a time "when he had not the power to help himself, it was null "and void, by the laws of all the Nations in the "World. In fine, he added, that he knew how to de"fend his right against any person that durst dispute "it with him." This quarrel being of too great consequence to be decided without coming to blows, each party took such measures as he judged most likely to prove successful (5).

The Duke's vexation to be deceived, the desire of revenge, the shame of renouncing his pretensions, and the pleasing hopes of being master of England, spurred him on to use all possible endeavours to succeed in his designs. On the other side, Harold finding he was like to have so formidable an adversary, thought nothing would be of more service to him, than gaining the people to his interests. To this purpose, he made himself more popular than ever. He lessened the taxes, and caused justice to be duly and impartially administred. In fine, he forgot nothing that might serve to confirm his Subjects in the esteem and affection they already had for him. His labour was not in vain. The English, charmed with his first proceedings, which afforded them so pleasant a prospect, resolved to sacrifice their lives and fortunes to support him on the throne to which they had raised him. Duke William for his part, not being ignorant of the resolution of the English, perceived he had no other way to attain his ends, but by setting on foot forces proportionable to those of the enemies he was resolved to attack.

Duke William continues his preparations. Harold gains the Affections of the People. Dunelm. Brompt.

The main difficulty was, to raise a sum of money sufficient for the charge of so great an undertaking. His first method was, to convene an assembly of the States of Normandy, to obtain their concurrence. But he found them very backward to comply with his desires. They told him, that "Normandy having been drained "of Men and Money by the late wars, they were so "far from being in a condition to think of making "new conquests, that they were hardly able to defend "their own territories against the attacks of a power"ful Invader. Besides, how just soever the Duke's "claim to England might be, they could not see that "any advantage would accrue to their country from this "expedition. In fine, that they were not obliged by "their allegiance to serve in foreign wars, wherein the "State had no concern." This stout answer destroying the Duke's hopes of raising money in a publick way, he bethought himself of an expedient, which succeeded to his wish. This was to borrow money of private persons; and gaining some of the chief Men, the rest were inspired with an emulation who should be most zealous in assisting their Prince. William Fitz-osbern undertook to fit out forty Ships at his own expence. The most wealthy, every one according to his ability, subscribed very large Sums: So that the Duke by this method raised more money than he could have done by a pub-

(4) They are now called the Isles of Orkney. Whatever the Antients have said of their Number, there are but twenty-six inhabited, the rest are used only for Pasturage, and are called Holmes. Orkney lies North of Caithness, in the Latitude of fifty-nine and sixty Degrees. Eagles are in such plenty here, and do so much mischief, that whoever kills one, is entitled to a Hen from every House in the Parish. The largest of these Isles is Mainland, anciently Pomonia, twenty-four Miles long, whereon stands the only remarkable Town, called Kirkwal, famous for St. Magnus's Church, and the Bishop of Orkney's Palace. The Isles were first inhabited by the Picts, who kept possession of them till destroyed in 839, by Kenneth II. of Scotland, from which time they were subject to the Scots, till delivered up by Donald Ban the Usurper in 1099, to Magnus King of Norway, but in 1263, they were surrendered to Alexander III. King of Scotland, by treaty with St. Magnus King of Norway, who is said to build the stately Cathedral at Kirkwal. They have since remained annexed to the Crown of Scotland. In Hoy, one of these Isles, lies a Stone called Dwarfie Stone, thirty-six Foot long, eighteen broad, and nine thick, hollowed by Art with a square Hole of two Foot high for the Entry. Within, at one end, is a Bed big enough for two Men, excellently hewn out of the Stone, with a Pillow; at the other end is a Couch, and in the middle a Hearth for a Fire, with a Hole over it for the Chimney. Orkney gives title to an Earl.

(5) Brompton says, Duke William sent a second Message to King Harold, offering to desist from his Claims, provided he would marry his Daughter. But this is very improbable; for besides that our best Historians tell us the young Lady was dead, it is not likely the Duke's Ambition would be so easily satisfied.

lick tax. But as this was not ſufficient, he engaged ſeveral of the neighbouring (1) Princes to furniſh him with troops and tranſports, on condition of their having Lands aſſigned them in England after the conqueſt. He even demanded the aſſiſtance of France; but it was not the intereſt of that crown that the Duke of Normandy ſhould become more powerful. Very fortunately, King Philip, who was then a Minor under the care of the Earl of Flanders, obſtructed not his proceedings, which a Prince that had been old enough to have known his own intereſts, would infallibly have done. It is true indeed, the court of France endeavoured to diſſuade the Duke from this enterprize, but to no purpoſe (2).

The Pope applauds his deſign. Malmſb. Ingulph.

Mean time Duke William, who was too wiſe not to be ſenſible of the weakneſs of his title, omitted nothing that might ſerve to give it ſome colour of juſtice. With this view he bethought himſelf of an expedient very proper to blind the eyes of the world; which was, to procure the Pope's approbation of his undertaking, to whom, it is ſaid, he made promiſe of holding the kingdom of England of the Apoſtolick See. However this be, the Pope very heartily eſpouſed his cauſe, and ſent him a conſecrated Banner (3), as a mark of his approbation. Moreover, willing that all Chriſtians ſhould know that Religion was concerned in this affair, he ſolemnly excommunicated all that ſhould dare oppoſe the Duke in the execution of this project. This approbation was of great ſervice to the Duke, as it furniſhed him with means to juſtify his intended expedition, and at the ſame time removed the ſcruples of ſuch, as he was endeavouring to engage in his quarrel. But it had not the ſame effect in England. Whether the Engliſh knew nothing of the Pope's excommunication, or looked upon it as a great piece of partiality, it prevented not Harold from equipping a large fleet, and raiſing a numerous army, with which he reſolutely expected his enemy.

Harold diſmiſſes his Army upon a falſe information. Camden.

The charge of keeping ſo conſiderable an armament, could not but be very burthenſome to the people, a thing the King would have been glad to avoid. After he had in vain expected ſome months the arrival of Duke William, finding he did not appear, and the autumnal Equinox approaching, he imagined, purſuant to ſome falſe informations he had received, that the Duke had deferred his expedition till the Spring. Accordingly, he thought he might ſafely lay up his Ships for the Winter, and disband his troops (4), to ſave an unneceſſary expence.

The King of Norway ravages Northumberland. S. Dunelm.

But as he was returning to London out of Kent, where he had given his laſt orders for disbanding the army, news was brought him that the King of Norway, accompanied wish Earl Toſton, was entered the Tyne, with a fleet of five hundred ſail (5). Surprized at this unexpected invaſion, he haſtily drew his army together again, which were diſperſing themſelves. But before they were ready to march, the Norwegians had made a great progreſs. Having ſacked the Counties on both ſides the Tyne, they put to Sea, and entering the Humber, landed their forces on the North ſide (6), and ravaged the country with inexpreſſible cruelties. Morcard and Edwin, who were upon the ſpot, endeavoured to ſtop their career, with ſome troops levied in haſte; but were ſo beaten, that their whole army was deſtroyed (7). Fluſht with this ſucceſs, the Norwegians advanced towards York, and laid ſiege to the City, which they quickly became maſters of; the inhabitants, who were unprovided with all things neceſſary for their defence, chuſing rather to ſurrender upon terms, than expoſe themſelves to certain ruin. Mean while, Harold having drawn his army together, advanced with all expedition, to give the Norwegians battle, who having left their fleet in the Humber, were marching towards the North, to compleat the reduction of Northumberland, before they proceeded to other conqueſts. As they marched but ſlowly, and as Harold made all poſſible haſte, he came up with them at Stanford Bridge, on the River Derwent, a little below York (8). The Norwegians, upon his approach, intrenched themſelves in ſo advantagious a poſt, that it ſeemed impoſſible to force them. They were poſted on the other ſide of the river, where there was no attacking them but by the bridge, of which they were maſters. Notwithſtanding this, Harold, who was very ſenſible how much it behoved him to come to an engagement, ordered the bridge to be attacked without delay. The Norwegians ſtoutly defended it, but could not withſtand the efforts of the Engliſh, though animated by the aſtoniſhing valour of one of their own Men, who defended the bridge alone againſt the Engliſh army for a conſiderable time. At length, the brave Norwegian being ſlain (9), Harold became maſter of the bridge, and paſſed his army over. Then furiouſly falling upon the enemy, after an obſtinate fight, entirely routed them. There had never been ſeen in England an engagement between two ſo numerous armies, each having no leſs than threeſcore thouſand Men. The battle, which was very bloody, laſted from ſeven in the morning till three in the afternoon. Harfagar and Toſton were both ſlain, and Harold obtained a compleat victory. Of the whole army that came from Norway in five hundred Ships, the remains were carried off by Olaüs, Son of Harfagar, in twenty Veſſels, with the Conqueror's leave. The booty which was taken upon this occaſion was very great, ſince there was found in the camp all that the Norwegians had brought from home, and all they had plundered in the kingdom (10). But Harold having been ſo impolitick as to retain the ſpoil to himſelf, raiſed ſuch diſcontents in his army, as proved of very ill conſequences to him afterwards (11). One would think this Prince, who was naturally generous, ſhould have ſecured the hearts of his Soldiers, by a liberality which would have coſt him nothing, eſpecially at a time when he ſtood in ſo great need of their ſervice. But he conſidered, the expending this booty in the war againſt the Duke of Normandy, would very much eaſe the people, whoſe affection he was deſirous to preſerve at any rate. Nevertheleſs, he ſhould have conſidered the gaining the hearts of his ſoldiers was no leſs neceſſary. Doubtleſs it would have been better for him to cultivate their affection, as he too plainly diſcovered to his coſt on another occaſion. It has been often obſerved, that ſoldiers are never ſo little regarded, as when by their bravery they have procured their Maſters ſome ſignal advantages, becauſe their own victories ſerve to render them uſeleſs. But 'tis no leſs certain, that ſooner or later a diſcontented army give their Prince or their General cauſe to repent of uſing them ill.

Whilſt Harold was buſied in the North, in rectifying the diſorders occaſioned by the Norwegian invaſion, the Duke of Normandy, who had long waited for a wind at St. Valery, ſet ſail about the end of September, and had a ſpeedy paſſage to Pevenſey (12) in Suſſex. 'Tis affirmed, that in leaping aſhore, he fell all along on his face; at which one of the ſoldiers ſaid merrily, See, our Duke is taking poſſeſſion of England; which the Duke took as a good omen. No body appearing to oppoſe his landing, his firſt care was to run up a fort near the place where he diſembarked (13), to favour his retreat in caſe of neceſſity. Some however will have it, that he ſent his Ships back to Normandy, to let his army ſee they had nothing to truſt to but their valour (14). After ſome days ſtay at Pevenſey, he marched along the ſhore as far as Haſtings (15), where he built a ſtronger Fort than the former, reſolving there to expect his enemy of whom he had no intelligence. 'Twas here he publiſhed a Manifeſto, ſhowing the reaſons of his coming into England; namely, firſt, to revenge the death of Prince Alfred, Brother of King Edward. This, if ever any, was a frivolous pretence, ſince Earl Goodwin, the contriver of that murder, was dead, and Harold never charged with it. Secondly, To reſtore Robert Archbiſhop of Canterbury to his See. This was no better reaſon than the firſt, for Robert was baniſhed by the general aſſembly in Edward's reign, and conſequently the preſent King could not be blamed for it. 'Tis very likely this article was inſerted in the Manifeſto on the Pope's account, to ſerve as a cover for his partiality to the Duke. Thirdly, and principally, to offer the Engliſh his aſſiſtance to puniſh Harold for preſuming to ſeize the Crown, without any right, and directly contrary to his Oath. It is to be obſerved, he made no mention either of Edward's Will, or verbal Promiſe, and that his Silence on that head renders this third motive very trifling. For indeed, without ſuch a Will or Promiſe, what pretence could the Duke of Normandy have to concern himſelf with the affairs of England? Some affirm he founded his right on his Kindred to Edward; but he was no way related to the late King, only by Emma of Normandy, who had never any title to the Crown; and beſides, he was himſelf a Baſtard. But he did not ſo much build his hopes on his Manifeſto, as on the ſtrength of his Army. He was very ſenſible, if he obtained the Victory, his reaſons would be readily admitted. Mean while, not to terrify the Engliſh, he charged his Army to injure none, but ſuch as were actually in Arms againſt him. But neither this precaution, nor his Manifeſto gained him any Friends. The Engliſh could not conceive upon what Foundation he had entered the Kingdom with an Army, or what advantage any one could have by taking his Part.

Harold comes to London. G. Dunelm.

The news of the deſcent of the Normans was quickly brought to Harold, who was ſtill in the North, little expecting this Invaſion till the Spring. As ſoon as he was informed of it, he marched to give theſe new Enemies Battle, whom he did not think more formidable than the Norwegians. By haſty marches, he came to London, where, upon a Review, he found his Army very much diminiſhed, not only by the Battle of Standford, but by unuſual deſertions, occaſioned by the diſcontent of his Troops. The Nobility come in to him. However, all the Nobility of the Kingdom repaired to him, and offered their Aſſiſtance on an occaſion where it was no leſs their Intereſt than his to repel the Foreigners. Whilſt Ambaſſadors from the Duke, he expected at London ſome of his Troops that were behind, Duke William ſent Ambaſſadors to require him to reſign the Crown, and to charge him with breach of Oath. He was ſo moved at the haughtineſs wherewith the Ambaſſadors addreſs'd him, that he could hardly refrain from uſing them ill. However he governed his Paſſion; but and from Harold to the Duke. was even with his Enemy, by ſending him a menacing and inſulting Meſſage. The Duke patiently heard what Harold ordered to be ſaid to him, and diſmiſſed the Ambaſſadors without any anſwer.

Harold encamps near the Normans. Malms. M. Weſt.

Mean time, Harold having drawn all his Forces together, encamped about ſeven Miles (1) from the Norman Army, with a reſolution to give them Battle. Whilſt the two Armies lay thus near one another, Spies were continually ſent out on both Sides, each Leader being equally deſirous to know the ſtrength and poſture of his Enemies. But the Engliſh Spies magnified in ſuch a manner the number and diſcipline of the Normans, that the principal Officers began to doubt of the ſucceſs of the War (2). Gurth, Brother to Harold, took occaſion from theſe reports, to perſuade the King to defer the Battle. He repreſented to him, "That by prolonging the time, "he would find his Army to increaſe continually, whereas "the Enemy's Forces would daily be diminiſhed. That "nothing could annoy the Normans more than wintering "in an Enemy's Country, where they had not yet ſo "much as one fortified Town, and from whence, in all "probability, the want of Neceſſaries would compel them "to retire. That, as he was accuſed of breach of Oath, "he had reaſon to fear, in caſe he was guilty of the "Charge, Heaven would not proſper his Arms: Nevertheleſs, if he was abſolutely bent to come to an Engagement without any farther delay, it would be moſt "prudent for him, not to be preſent himſelf in the Battle, that he might diſcourage the Enemies with the dread "of having a freſh Army to deal with, though they were "ſo fortunate as to obtain the Victory. In a word, if he "would truſt him with the Command of his Forces, he "would promiſe him, not indeed the Victory, which "was in the hand of God alone, but to die in the de"fence of his Country." The King was deaf to all his Brother's reaſons, replying, "That by his former Acti- Harold's Anſwer. "ons he had gained the eſteem of the Engliſh, and there"fore could not think of loſing it again by an inglorious "Flight. That he had rather run the hazard of a "Battle, the ſucceſs whereof was yet uncertain, than "forfeit his Reputation, as he ſhould moſt aſſuredly do, "if after ſo near an approach to the Enemy, he ſhould "be known to withdraw. That after all, the Nor"mans were not more formidable than the Norwegians; "and if he was to fight, he could not do it at a better "time, than whilſt his Army was fluſh'd with their late "Succeſs. In ſhort, that he was reſolved to let his ſub"jects ſee he was not unworthy of the Crown he wore." Duke William perceiving by all Harold's Motions, that Gurth's Speech to his Brother. Malmſb. W. Weſt.

he was bent to give him Battle, advanc'd a little to ſeize an advantagious Poſt, where he could conveniently draw up his Army.

Whilſt they were preparing for a Battle, which was to decide the fate of both Princes, Duke William ſeem'd to abate ſomething of his haughtineſs. 'Tis to be preſum'd, the thoughts of a Battle in an Enemy's Country, where his loſs would be irretrievable, inſpir'd him with ſome dread of the Iſſue. On the other hand, he could not well forbear reflecting beforehand on the blood that was going to be ſpilt in a quarrel, the Juſtice whereof he could not be thoroughly convinced of, how much ſoever he ſeem'd to be ſo. Be this as it will, before they engag'd, he ſent the King by the hands of a certain Monk theſe four Propoſals, for him to take his choice. The firſt was, to reſign the Crown, as he was bound by Oath. By the ſecond, he offered to return into Normandy, provided Harold would do him Homage for the Kingdom of England. By the third, he was ready to refer the differences to the Judgment of the Apoſtolick See. Laſtly, he propoſed the deciding of their quarrel by ſingle Combat. 'Tis no wonder, Harold rejected theſe four Propoſals, ſeeing they were all ſo advantagious to the Duke. As for the two firſt, 'tis viſible, how detrimental they were to Harold. The third ſeemed at firſt ſight ſomething fairer; but the Pope having already declared in favour of the Duke, what Juſtice could Harold expect from him? As for the fourth, the advantage plainly lay on the Duke's ſide, ſince in a ſingle Combat, he hazarded only his Perſon, whereas Harold ventured his Crown with his Life. The Victory would have procured the Duke of Normandy a noble Kingdom, whereas it would have only acquir'd the King the bare glory of conquering. Beſides, Harold was of opinion, the deciſion of an Affair, where the whole Nation was concerned, ought not to depend on the ſtrength and ſkill of a ſingle Arm. His anſwer therefore was, God ſhould determine on the morrow the Juſtice of their Rights. The Duke ſends Propoſals to Harold. Malmſb. M. Weſt.

The Engliſh ſpent the whole night in carouſing and ſinging, as if they were ſure of the Victory. The Normans, on the contrary, were employed in preparing for the Battle, and offering up Prayers to God for Succeſs. At length, on the 14th of October, Harold's Birth-day, but much more memorable for one of the greateſt Events that ever happened in England, the two Armies engaged. In the Front of the Engliſh ſtood the Kentiſh Men, a Privilege they had enjoyed ever ſince the time of the Heptarchy. Harold placed himſelf in the Center, and would fight on foot, that his Men might be the more encouraged, by ſeeing their King expos'd to equal danger with the meaneſt Soldier. The Normans were drawn up in three Bodies. Montgomery and Fitz-osbern conducted the firſt. Geoffrey Martel commanded the ſecond, and the Duke himſelf headed the Body of Reſerve, to ſuccour thoſe who ſhould moſt want it (3). The Normans began the fight with a volley of Arrows, which being ſhot upward, were like a thick Cloud over the heads of the foremoſt Body of the Engliſh. As their Ranks were very cloſe, the Arrows did great execution. The Engliſh not being us'd to this way of fighting, were at firſt put into ſome little diſorder. The Normans willing to take advantage of it, vigorouſly attack'd them. But the Engliſh immediately falling into good order again, gave them ſo warm a reception, that they were obliged to draw back and take breath. Quickly after, they renewed the attack, but met with as brave a reſiſtance as before, neither was it in their power to break their Enemy's Ranks. The Engliſh chuſing rather to die than give way, and the Normans aſham'd to retreat, both ſides fought ſtoutly for a conſiderable time, without either gaining ground. The preſence of their Leaders animating the Soldiers, they every where fought with equal Bravery, without the leaſt ſigns of advantage on either ſide. We may judge of the valour of the Troops in both Armies by the length of the Fight, which began at ſeven in the Morning, and laſted till Night. The Battle of Haſtings. Malmſb. M. Weſt. The Victory a long time doubtful

I ſhall not take upon me fully to deſcribe this bloody Battle. I find ſo much confuſion in the accounts of the Hiſtorians, that I dare not flatter my ſelf with being able to give a clear and diſtinct Notion of the thing. I ſhall content my ſelf therefore with the mention of two Circumſtances, which, all Hiſtorians unanimouſly agree, gave the Normans the Victory. The Fight had laſted all day, and the Succeſs was yet very uncertain; when Duke William bethought himſelf of a Stratagem, which made Victory incline to his ſide. This Prince, who was very experienc'd, perceiving there was no breaking the The Duke's Stratagem. Hunting'd.

(1.) All the Hiſtorians ſaye Nine. See Dunelm. p. 194. Brompt. &c.

(2.) Some of the Spies took the Normans to be an Army of Prieſts, becauſe they were ſhaven, it being the Cuſtom then among the Engliſh to wear long Beards. Mat. Weſt. p. 436. Malmſb. p. 100.

(3.) The chief of William's Generals were, Euſtace Earl of Bologne, William Fitz-Richard Earl of Evreux, Geoffrey Son of Rotrou Earl of Mortaigne, Robert Son of Roger Earl of Beaumont, Aimeri de Touars, Hugh Earl of Etaples, Walter Giffard, Hugh de Grentemeſnil, and William de Warren. *P. ranks of the Engliſh, ordered his Troops to retreat as they fought, as if they were diſcouraged, but withal, to be very careful to keep their Ranks. This order being executed, the Engliſh looked upon the Enemies Retreat as the Beginning of their Victory. Poſſeſſed with this notion, they encouraged one another with reiterated ſhouts, to preſs the retiring Enemies. Their eagerneſs made them break their Ranks, that they might puſh them with the greater Impetuoſity, imagining they were upon the point of taking to flight. Then it was, that the Normans, finding their Stratagem had taken effect, ſtood their ground, and by a Diſcipline they had long been uſed to, cloſed their Ranks, and falling on the diſordered Engliſh, made a terrible Slaughter of them. Harold, enraged to ſee the Victory, which a moment before he thought himſelf ſure of, ſnatched out of his hands, uſed his utmoſt endeavours to rally his Troops that were in extreme Diſorder. His labour was not altogether in vain, for at laſt he drew up, on a riſing ground at a little diſtance from the field of Battle, a good Body of Foot, which became at length very conſiderable, by being continually joined by the flying Troops. The Duke of Normandy's Victory being yet far from complete, whilſt ſo ſtrong a Body of the Engliſh kept together, he ordered them to be attacked with great Fury. But the Engliſh received them with that Bravery, and the Normans loſt ſuch numbers of their Men, that the fortune of the Day ſeemed ſtill very doubtful. The approach of the night, and the reſolution of the Engliſh, making the Duke deſpair of penetrating their Ranks, he began to think himſelf conquered ſince he was not entirely victorious. Probably, the Engliſh Army might have retreated in good order, by favour of the Night, if Harold could have reſolved to leave his Enemy in poſſeſſion of the Field of Battle, at a time when the loſs on both Sides was pretty equal. But apprehending his retreat might be prejudicial to his Affairs, and derogatory to his Reputation, he would maintain his Poſt, and not give the enemy that advantage. Beſides, he was in hopes of rallying his whole Army during the Night, and renewing the fight the next Morning.

Harold rallies his Troops again, and repulſes the Normans.

He could not think of retreating.

Mean time, the Duke perceiving the Night was like to rob him of the glory of a complete Victory, made one effort more to drive the Engliſh from their Poſt. In this laſt onſet, Harold was ſlain by an Arrow ſhot into his Brains (1.) His Troops diſheartned at this fatal accident, began to give ground, and betake themſelves to flight. Thus Harold's death was the ſecond thing that procured the Normans the Victory, and put the Engliſh entirely to rout. They were purſued as long as day laſted; and in this Purſuit it was, that a terrible ſlaughter was made of the Fugitives, the Conquerors killing without mercy all they could overtake, to ſave the trouble of guarding the Priſoners. The darkneſs of the Night however ſaved a good part of the Engliſh Army, who retreated under the Conduct of Morcard and Edwin. Theſe two Lords, who had all along firmly adhered to Harold, ſeeing he was ſlain, as well as Gurth and Lewin his Brothers, ſubmitted at length to Providence, having given, the whole day, viſible marks of their Valour. This long and bloody Battle coſt the Duke of Normandy ſix thouſand Men (2); but the Engliſh loſt a much greater number (3).

Harold's ſlain, and the Engliſh entirely routed. Malmſb. Huntingd.

S. Dunelm.

Duke William, at the height of his Wiſhes, gave orders for the whole Army to fall on their Knees, and return God Thanks for ſo ſignal a Victory. After diſcharging ſo juſt a duty, he cauſed his Tent to be pitched in the Field of Battle, and ſpent the reſidue of the Night among the ſlain. On the morrow, he ordered his own dead to be buried, and gave the Engliſh Peaſants leave to do the ſame office for the others. The Bodies of the King and his Brothers being found, he ſent them to Gith their Mother, who gave them as honourable a burial as the circumſtance of the time would permit, in Waltham-Abbey, founded by the King her Son (4). Malmſb.

Thus fell Harold, with his Sword in his Hand, in defence not only of his own, but of his Country's Cauſe, againſt the ambition of the Duke of Normandy. The Hiſtorians, who wrote in the Reigns of the Conqueror and his Sons, have endeavoured to blacken the memory of Harold, thereby to juſtify, in ſome meaſure, the ambition of the Duke. But all they have ſaid againſt this laſt Saxon King, tends only to the imputation of breach of Oath, on which we have ſeen what he alledged in his own vindication. He might have been much more juſtly blamed for his ſecret practices, in procuring Prince Edgar to be excluded from the Throne, who alone had a Right to aſpire to it. But the Sticklers for the Duke took care not to dwell on that head, ſince their Reproaches againſt Harold would have touched the Duke no leſs than his Adverſaries. However this be, Harold may be ſaid to have been more worthy of the Crown, had he been leſs forward to obtain it. He gained the love and eſteem of the Engliſh whilſt he was but a private Man, and acted nothing during his ſhort Reign (5), which tended to leſſen their affection. He fought within the ſpace of a few days, two great Battles, with very different Succeſs. In the firſt, his conduct and valour procured him a ſignal Victory over the King of Norway; and his unhappy Succeſs in the laſt muſt be wholly aſcribed to his ill Fortune. As for his other perſonal Qualities, he was Honeſt, Obliging, Affable, exceeding Generous, in a word, he was endowed with all the Virtues which form a great Prince. Harold's Character.

Harold was twice married. By his firſt Wife, whoſe name is unknown, he had three Sons, Edmund, Goodwin, and Magnus, who retired into Ireland after the death of their Father. By his ſecond Wife, Algitha, Siſter of Morcard and Edwin, he had a Son called Wolf, who was but a Child at the time of the Battle of Haſtings, and was afterwards knighted by William Rufus. By this ſecond Marriage, he had alſo two Daughters; of whom Gunilda, the eldeſt, falling blind, paſſed her days in a Nunnery. The youngeſt was married to Waldemar King of Ruſſia, by whom ſhe had a Daughter, who was Wife to Waldemar King of Denmark (6). His Iſſue.

Thus ended in England the Empire of the Anglo-Saxons, which began above ſix hundred years before in the Perſon of Hengiſt the firſt King of Kent. We ſhall ſee in the following Book how England fell under the dominion of the Normans.

(1) R. de Diceto (p. 480.) and Huntingd. (p. 369.) ſay, that Harold was not killed outright, but the Multitude ruſhing on made an end of him.

(2) He had three Horſes killed that Day under him, without loſing one drop of his Blood. Malmſb. p. 101.

(3) This Battle was fought near Heathfield in Suſſex, in the place where the Town of Battle now ſtands, ſo called from this Day's Action, wherein our modern Hiſtorians ſay were ſlain above threeſcore Thouſand Engliſh Men.

(4) An antient Manuſcript in the Cottonian Library relates, that the King's Body was hard to be known by reaſon of its being covered with Wounds, but was at laſt diſcovered by one who had been his Miſtreſs, by the means of certain private Marks known only to herſelf. The Duke ſent the Body to his Mother without any Ranſom, though ſhe is ſaid to have offered him its weight in Gold. But though all others agree that Harold fell in this Battle, yet Knighton from Giraldus Cambrenſis aſſerts he was not ſlain, but eſcaping retired to a Cell near St. John's Church in Cheſter, and died there an Anchoret, as was owned by himſelf in his laſt Confeſſion when he lay a dying. In memory whereof they ſhewed his Tomb when Knighton wrote.

(5) Of nine Months and nine Days.

(6) Tyrrel ſays, (from Speed) ſhe was Mother to Waldemar the firſt King of Denmark of that Name. From whom the Daniſh Kings for many Ages after ſucceeded.

STATE of the CHURCH,

FROM THE

Reign of ETHELRED II, to the Norman Conqueſt; that is, from 979, to 1066.

State of the Church.

AFTER ſeeing what paſſed in England from the beginning of the Reign of Ethelreld II, to the end of the Empire of the Saxons, it is not to be expected that this period ſhould afford much matter for an Eccleſiaſtical Hiſtory: In general, this Century may be termed the Age of ignorance, with reſpect to all Europe, but more eſpecially with regard to England. If there was occaſion, it would be very difficult to aſſign the cauſes of this univerſal ignorance, not only in this Kingdom, but in all other Chriſtian States. But it will ſuffice to alledge one, peculiar to England; I mean the Wars the Kingdom was inceſſantly troubled with. The Arms of the Pagans, which triumphed throughout the whole Kingdom, ſcarce left the Engliſh the liberty of profeſſing their religion, and conſequently, our knowledge of the affairs of the Church in thoſe days muſt be very imperfect. Accordingly, I ſhall confine what I have to ſay on this ſubject to a few Heads, concerning the Doctrines, Councils, ſome particulars relating to certain Sees, and the Perſons that were moſt diſtinguiſhed among the Clergy.

The Senſe of the Church of England relating to the Euchariſt

What attempts ſoever have been made at ſundry times to prove the antiquity of Tranſubſtantiation, it could never be ſhewn to be the Doctrine of the Church of England, before the time I am ſpeaking of. On the contrary, it evidently appears from the Homilies or Sermons which were read in Churches for the inſtruction of the People, that the Church in thoſe days was very far from believing any ſuch Thing. There is ſtill extant a Tranſlation of thoſe Homilies (1), attributed to Elfric, who lived under Ethelred II; from whence any Man may be convinced, that the Church of England was then of a quite contrary Opinion. But that the Reader may judge for himſelf, it will not be amiſs to lay before him an Extract of one of theſe Homilies relating to this Subject.

Extract of a Saxon Homily on this Subject.

" There is a great difference between the inviſible " virtue of this Sacrament, and what it appears to us in " the qualities of its own Nature. In its own Nature 'tis " corruptible Bread and Wine, but by virtue of the di- " vine inſtitution, 'tis truly the Body and Blood of our " Lord Jeſus Chriſt, after conſecration, not in a Corpo- " real but Spiritual Manner. The Body in which Jeſus " Chriſt ſuffered, and the Euchariſtical Body are widely " different. The firſt was born of the Bleſſed Virgin, " and conſiſted of Blood, Bones, Nerves, Limbs, ani- " mated with a rational Soul. But the Body which we " call Euchariſtical, is made up of ſeveral grains of " Wheat. It has neither Blood, Bone, Nerve, Limb, " nor Soul in it. We are therefore not to form any " Corporeal Idea of it, but to underſtand it wholly in " a ſpiritual Senſe. In the Euchariſt, whatever repairs " our Nature, and forms us to a better Life, proceeds " entirely from a myſtick virtue, and ſpiritual Opera- " tion. For this reaſon the Euchariſt is called a Sacra- " ment, becauſe one thing appears to our Senſes, and " another to our Underſtanding. What in the Sacrament " is the object of Sight, has a corporeal Figure: But " what is repreſented to our Underſtanding has a ſpiritual " force and efficacy. Moreover the Body of Chriſt, " which ſuffered and roſe from the dead, is eternal and " impaſſible, and no more ſubject to decay or death; " whereas the Euchariſt is not eternal, but corruptible, " ſubject to the force of time, and diviſible into many " Parts. 'Tis ground by the Teeth, and paſſes through " the common Channels of the Body; but notwith- " ſtanding, the ſpiritual efficacy of it remains in every " Part. A great many Perſons receive this Holy Body " or Euchariſt, and yet the multitude of receivers wea- " kens not the force of the Operation, the virtue of the " Sacrament being lodged in every part of what is conſe- " crated, the leaſt part having as much Efficacy as the " greateſt. The reaſon is, becauſe the virtue does not " operate in proportion to the corporeal magnitude, but " by means of the Divine Inſtitution.

" The Sacrament is a Type and Pledge, but the Body " of our Lord Jeſus Chriſt is the Truth and Reality of the " repreſentation. God has vouchſafed to give us this Pledge " or Earneſt, till we come to the Truth itſelf, and then " the Pledge will diſappear. For, as hath been obſerv- " ved; the Holy Euchariſt is the Body of Jeſus Chriſt not " corporeally but ſpiritually (2). The Apoſtle St. Paul, " ſpeaking of the Iſraelites, has theſe Words: I would 1 Cor. x. " not that you ſhould be ignorant, how that all our Fathers " were under the Cloud, and paſſed through the Sea; and " were all baptized unto Moſes, in the Cloud and in the " Sea; and did all eat the ſame ſpiritual Meat; and did " all drink the ſame ſpiritual Drink: For they drank of the " ſpiritual Rock that followed them, and that Rock was " Chriſt. That Rock, from whence the water flow'd, " was not Chriſt in reality, but a type and repreſenta- " tion of Jeſus Chriſt, who made this gracious Declaration " to all the faithful; If any Man thirſt let him come to John vii. 38. " me and drink; and out of his Belly ſhall flow Rivers of " living Water. By this he underſtood the Holy Ghoſt, " which thoſe that believ'd on him ſhould receive. The " Apoſtle declares, that the Children of Iſrael, who were " in the Wilderneſs, eat the ſame ſpiritual Meat, and drank " the ſame ſpiritual Drink, becauſe the Manna, with which " they were ſupported forty years together, and the water " which flow'd from the Rock, were types of the body " and blood of Jeſus Chriſt, which are daily offered in " the Church. That Manna and that Water were the " ſame which we now offer, not corporeally, but ſpi- " ritually. To underſtand this, obſerve that our Lord " Jeſus Chriſt, before his Paſſion, conſecrated the Bread " and Wine into the Sacrament of the Euchariſt, and " ſaid, This is my Body; This is my Blood: Although his " Paſſion was not over when he pronounced theſe words, " yet by a myſtical Operation, he changed the Bread into " his Body, and the Wine into his Blood, juſt as he had " done in the Wilderneſs before his Incarnation, when he " turned the Manna into his Fleſh, and the Water that " flow'd from the Rock, into his own Blood."

As this Explanation is a clear evidence, that at the time this Homily was penn'd, the Church of England believed not Tranſubſtantiation, ſo it is no leſs manifeſt that Elfric, who tranſlated it into Latin, was of the ſame opinion with the Author. 'Tis true, there is ſome diſpute about the Perſon of the Tranſlator. Some believe him to be Elfric Archbiſhop of Canterbury. Others ſay it was Elfric the Grammarian, ſirnam'd Putta, who was Archbiſhop of York. But which ever of the two it was, they both liv'd in the reign of Ethelred II, and neither of them was ever accus'd of Heterodoxy. But as it might be objected, that Elfric was not of the ſame opinion with the Author, whom he tranſlated, tho' that is not very likely, the contrary is evident from the following words of the ſame Elfric, in one of his Letters to the Clergy. The Sacrifice of the Euchariſt is not the Body in which our Saviour ſuffered for us, nor the Blood he ſhed for our ſakes; but 'tis the ſame Body and the ſame Blood ſpiritually, juſt as the Manna was which fell from Heaven, and the Water which flow'd from the Rock. 'Tis therefore moſt certain, from the Teſtimony of a Prelate, who was at the head of the Church of Eng- Anglia Sacra. Vol. I. p. 125.

(1) Theſe Homilies are in Latin ſtiled Sermones Catholici: The Tranſlation of them into Old Engliſh is preſerved in the Bodleian Library, and in that of Bennet College in Cambridge.

(2) Non Corporaliter ſed Spiritualiter.

land,

land, that the Doctrine of Tranſubſtantiation was not introduced into that Church in the time of Ethelred II, who aſcended the Throne in 979. There is no way to evade the force of this proof, but by aſſerting the Homily beforementioned to be ſpurious. But this is much eaſier ſaid than prov'd.

Invocation of the Virgin Mary, and of the Saints. Conc. Vol. I. P. 537.

It is not the ſame with regard to the Invocation of the Bleſſed Virgin, and of the Saints in Glory, ſince, on the contrary, we find it was practiſed in England in this very Century. This is manifeſt from Canute the Great's Charter to the Abbey of Glaſſenbury, where there is mention of the Bleſſed Virgin, and all the other Saints. But as the Authority of the Charters of thoſe days are not equally admitted by all, the ſame thing may be proved from a publick Litany then read in the Church. Here we ſee that after the Invocation of the Holy Trinity, theſe words are thrice repeated, O Holy Mary, pray for us: After which the Angels and Saints were addreſſed to [by name]. It is to be obſerved, when this Practice was firſt introduced, the Application to the Bleſſed Virgin and Saints was not ſo direct; May the Holy Virgin the Mother of God, and all the Saints intercede for us. Theſe are the words in the publick Office of canonical hours uſed by the Anglo-Saxons (1). This Office, which is in Latin, affords this remark, that although the Leſſons, Prayers, Pſalms, Lord's Prayer and Creed, are in the ſame Tongue, yet at the end of each Article of Verſe, there follows a Saxon Tranſlation in a paraphraſtical way, that the people might underſtand what was ſaid.

Elfric's Canons. Spelman. Conc. Tom. I. P. 572. Extreme Unction.

Among the Canons, which go under the name of Elfric, of whom I have already ſpoken, and who lived in the reign of Ethelred II, the XXXIIId obliges Prieſts to have by them two ſorts of conſecrated Oil, one for Children, and another for the ſick; and enjoins that the ſick ſhould be always anointed upon their beds, and ſhould confeſs themſelves before the Ceremony of anointing paſſed upon them, which no Prieſt was to preſume to perform till deſired by the ſick perſon. Whence it may be inferred, they did not ſtay till the ſick were in their laſt Agonies, before they adminiſtred the extreme Unction (2).

In the XXXIIId Canon, the four firſt General Councils (3) are put upon the ſame foot with the four Goſpels; but thoſe of later Ages are not of ſo great Authority. Hence 'tis evident that the Author of theſe Canons did not think all the general Councils were infallible. Had he been of this opinion, he would not have given a greater Authority to the four firſt than to the other Councils (4).

From the beginning of the Reign of Ethelred II, to the Norman Conqueſt, we find in the Eccleſiaſtical Hiſtory of England but two Councils. In all appearance, the wars with the Danes prevented the Biſhops from aſſembling more frequently, or rather were the reaſon that the acts of theſe Conventions are loſt. Both theſe Councils (5), one at Engſham, and the other at Haba, were held, whilſt Elphegus was Archbiſhop. The moſt remarkable Canons are as follow.

The Synod of Engſham. Spelman. Conc. Tom. I. P. 513.

In the Council of Engſham, the IId Canon enjoins the Celibacy of the Clergy.

The IXth forbids all Perſons to do any wrong to the Church, or eject a Clergyman out of his Benefice without the Conſent of the Biſhop.

By the XVIIth, every Friday was to be a Faſt, unleſs it fell upon a Holiday (6).

The XXth enjoins frequent Confeſſions, and the People are ordered to receive the Sacrament three times, at leaſt, in a year (7).

Synod of Haba.

The Council of Haba has but one Canon worth notice. By the ſecond, every Chriſtian was obliged to faſt three days with Bread and Water, before the Feaſt of St. Michael, and to diſtribute among the poor what he ſhould have eaten in theſe three days.

This is all worth remarking in theſe two Synods. But to ſupply the want of Councils, we have the Eccleſiaſtical Laws of Canute the Great, and Edward the Confeſſor; ſome of which I ſhall inſert, to ſhew the great regard theſe two Princes had for the Clergy. The following ones are Canute's (8).

Canute's Eccleſiaſtical Laws.

The IVth enjoins all Chriſtians to pay great reſpect to the Clergy, becauſe their Sacerdotal Functions are extremely beneficial to the People.

By the Vth, if a Prieſt was accuſed of any crime, he had the liberty of purging himſelf by ſaying Maſs, and receiving the Euchariſt.

The XIIth recommends Celibacy to the Clergy, and ranks them among the Thanes of the ſecond Claſs, that is, among the Gentry (9).

The XXth ordains, that at Funerals the Dues ſhall be paid upon the breaking up of the ground; and that the Dues ſhall be paid to the pariſh the deceaſed belonged to, tho' he was buried elſewhere.

The XXIId enjoins the obſervance of Sunday from Saturday three a-Clock in the afternoon, till Monday break of Day.

The XXIIId determines the times of Faſting, and places the Vigils of the Feſtivals of the Bleſſed Virgin, and of the Apoſtles among the Faſts.

There are ſeveral others, relating to the payment of Tythes and Peter-Pence, the Violators of the Privileges of the Clergy, and the like, in favour of the Church.

It is likewiſe decreed by theſe Laws, that every Chriſtian ſhould learn the Lord's-Prayer, and the Apoſtles Creed; otherwiſe, they were allowed neither to ſtand Godfather, nor receive the Communion, nor have Chriſtian Burial.

Eccleſiaſtical Laws of Edward. Spelman. P. 625.

The Eccleſiaſtical Laws of Edward the Confeſſor run chiefly upon the protection of the Church and Clergy.

The Iſt forbids the moleſting a Clergyman, contrary to the tenour of the Privileges of the Church.

The IId appoints certain Days, whereon all proceedings in the Courts of Juſtice were to ceaſe.

By the IIId, the Church's Cauſes are to be tried firſt.

The IVth firmly eſtabliſhes the immunities of thoſe who in any wiſe depend on the Church, and ordains that they ſhall not be obliged to anſwer any Plea, &c. except in the Eccleſiaſtical Court.

The Vth confirms the Privilege of Sanctuary to Churches, and extends it even to Prieſts Houſes.

By the VIth, if any Perſon broke in upon the Privileges of the Church, he had no way to get off, but by ſubmitting to the ſentence of the Biſhop.

The VIth orders the punctual payment of Tythes, and ſets forth what is to be paid.

The IXth determines the circumſtances relating to the Ordeal Tryal.

The XIIth ſettles the fine of Manbote, or the ſum to be paid to the Lord for killing any of his Vaſſals or Slaves: The King's and the Archbiſhop's Manbote is fixed at the ſame Sum.

By the XIIIth all found treaſure belongs to the King, unleſs it be found in a Church or Church-yard; then the Gold is the King's, and the Silver the Church's (10).

It is viſible throughout theſe Laws, that the Clergy took care of themſelves, when they met with devout and eaſy Princes, or ſuch as ſtood in need of their Intereſt.

Elections of Biſhops and Abbots.

But notwithſtanding the great condeſcenſion of the Saxon Kings for the Clergy, they could not retain the privilege of chuſing their Biſhops and Abbots. Whilſt the Prelates confined themſelves within the bounds of their paſtoral Functions, and meddled not with civil Matters, the power of electing was freely left to the Chapters. But when the Biſhops were become rich and popular, and began to interpoſe in State-Affairs, by reaſon of the Fiefs they were poſſeſſed of, it was of great conſequence to the Kings, to have ſuch Biſhops and Abbots as were in their Intereſt, or at leaſt, were obliged to them for their Preferments. Accordingly, the Kings began to interpoſe in Elections, by way of canvaſſing, or recommendation, and very often by refuſing to put in poſſeſſion of the Fiefs belonging to the Church or Abbey, ſuch Prelates and Abbots

(1) Sancta Dei Genetrix Virgo Maria & omnes Sancti Dei intercedant pro nobis peccatoribus ad Dominum, ut mereamur ab eo adjuvari & ſalvari, qui vivis & regnas Deus. Now this amounts to no more than a Wiſh for their Interceſſion, and is far from a direct Invocation. This Office is tranſlated by Mr. Elſtob. Immediate Addreſs, as far as we can diſcover, did not prevail in England till the tenth Century: At which time, in the Homily of the Aſſumption of the Bleſſed Virgin, there is a direct Prayer to the Bleſſed Virgin to intercede for them. Coll. Eccl. Hiſt. p. 214.

(2) The XXIIId orders the Prieſt to read, on Sundays and Holydays, the Goſpel, the Lord's Prayer, and Creed, in Engliſh.

(3) Nice, Conſtantinople, Epheſus, and Chalcedon.

(4) This is directly oppoſite to the Doctrine of the Modern Church of Rome, which pays the ſame ſubmiſſion to the Decrees of the Council of Trent as of Nice, and reckons the Church in all Ages alike infallible.

(5) They were made up of Seculars as well as Eccleſiaſticks, and the Conſtitutions paſſed there related both to Church and State. Coll. Eccl. Hiſt. p. 208.

(6) The XIXth enjoins Widows to ſtay twelve Months after the Death of their Husbands, before they marry again.

(7) The XXIIId orders, that the yearly naval Expedition be performed ſooner after Eaſter.

(8) In the Preamble, it is ſaid theſe Laws were drawn up at Wincheſter by the Advice of the Wiſe Men of the Nation, that is, the Prelates and Nobles.

(9) This in Dr. Wilkins is the VIth. The Law ſays, if a Prieſt abſtains from a Woman, may God have mercy upon him, and let him have the world'y Honour of a Thane. Wilkins, p. 129. c. 6.

(10) The original Law in Dr. Wilkins, p. 199. c. 14. ſays, the Gold is all the King's, and half the Silver, and the other half goes to the Church.

as they did not like. In fine, the authority of the Court by Degrees prevailed ſo, that in the time of Ethelred II, the Monks had entirely loſt the privilege of chuſing their Abbots, as appears from Ingulphus. In thoſe days, ſays he, the Monks and Abbots ſeldom reſorted to Court. But ever ſince the Monks and Abbots ſeldom reſorted to Court. But ever ſince the Kings have diſpoſed of the Abbies, the Monks have made intereſt with the Courtiers, which ſometimes coſt them very dear. This Hiſtorians loudly complains of this abuſe, though he himſelf was inſtalled in the Abbey of Croyland by the ſame method, that is, by the ſole will and pleaſure of William the Conqueror.

Ingulph. p. 63.

Tranſlations of Sees.

There were but two removals of Biſhops Sees within the Period I am going over. The See of Kirton in Weſſex (1) was removed to Exeter (2), and the See of Lindiſfarn in Northumberland to Durham. Aldhun Biſhop of Lindisfarn, being diſturbed in that little Iſland by the Incurſions of the Danes, reſided at Durham, carrying with him the Relicts of St. Cuthbert. He built a Cathedral, and fixed his See there, where it has remained to this day (3).

S. Dunelm.

The Biſhops of Landaff firſt conſecrated by the Archbiſhop of Canterbury.

In 981, the Archiepiſcopal See of Canterbury acquired a new Juriſdiction in Wales. Gucan, a Welſh Prieſt, being choſen Biſhop of Landaff, and conſecrated by Archbiſhop Dunſtan, this Precedent was followed by his Succeſſors, who like him owned the Archbiſhop of Canterbury for their Metropolitan. Some infer from hence, that all the Britiſh Biſhops at the ſame time owned the Superiority of the Church of Rome. But this conſequence cannot be admitted. It is certain, the Biſhops of St. Davids all along exerciſed the Archiepiſcopal Functions in Wales, till the time of Henry I, and that without the ornament of the Pall, the mark of ſubmiſſion to the Pope (4).

As the Archbiſhops of Canterbury and York made the greateſt Figure among the Engliſh Prelates, during the laſt Period of the Saxon Monarchy, it will not be amiſs briefly to carry down the Succeſſion of each of theſe Sees. This will be of ſervice towards clearing what has been already, or ſhall be hereafter, related of the Affairs of the Church.

Succeſſion of the Archbiſhops of Canterbury. Malmſb. de Pontific. Gervaſii. Act. Pont.

Ethelgar, Dunſtan's Succeſſor, was Archbiſhop but one year and three months, and was ſucceeded by Siricius. This Prelate is blamed by all the Hiſtorians, for adviſing Ethelred to give Money to the Danes, which ſerved only to allure them hither, inſtead of keeping them away. But perhaps they who exclaim againſt him moſt, would have given the ſame advice, had they been in his place. Elfric, Tranſlator of the Saxon Homilies, whom I mentioned elſewhere, ſucceeded him in 995, and was followed in 1006, by Elphegus, who was murderded by the hands of the Danes. Lanfranc, Archbiſhop of Canterbury in the Conqueror's time, very much queſtioned whether Elphegus might properly be called a Martyr, ſince he was not maſſacred on account of Religion, but only becauſe he would not conſent the People of his Dioceſe ſhould be taxed to pay his Ranſom. Anſelm, Abbot of Bec, whom he conſulted on this occaſion, told him, he who choſe to die rather than do an unjuſt thing, received by his death the Crown of Martyrdom. Livingus ſucceeded Elphegus in 1013. He was kept Priſoner ſome time by the Danes, and after the recovery of his Liberty, retired into France, till the Storm was over. Afterwards, he returned to his See, and died in 1020. Egelnoth, called the Good, was his Succeſſor. In the time of theſe two Archbiſhops, St. Auguſtin's Monaſtery was much degenerated, by the licentious Lives of the Monks, who indeed wore the religious Habit, but with little obſervance of the rule. The cauſe of this alteration was, the maſſacring of all the Monks, except four, when Canterbury was taken by the Danes. The ſecular Clergy, who afterwards ſupplied the place of the dead Monks, were willing to enjoy the Revenues and Privileges of the Monaſtery, but not to be ty'd to the rule obſerved there before. They took greater liberties than the old Monks, and gave the Title of Dean to their ſuperior, inſtead of that of Abbot, which remained till the time of Archbiſhop Lanfranc, who changed it into Prior. But to return to Egelnoth: This Prelate rais'd the See of Canterbury to its former Luſtre, being ſupported by Canute the Great, with whom he was much in favour (5). He was ſucceeded by Edſius, who had been King Harold's Chaplain (6). He governed the Church till the year 1050, either by himſelf, whilſt his Health permitted, or by a Chorepiſcopus, when diſabled by ſickneſs. This Chorepiſcopus, who exerciſed all the Archiepiſcopal Functions, reſided at St. Martins in the Fields (7). Robert, a Norman Monk, made Biſhop of London by Edward the Confeſſor, was by the ſame Prince promoted to the See of Canterbury after Edſius. He was driven from thence, in the manner before related, and baniſhed the Kingdom by an Aſſembly General, and Stigand Biſhop of Wincheſter placed in his room. Robert appealed to the Pope againſt theſe Proceedings; but Stigand, notwithſtanding the Appeal, and without ſtaying for the Pope's determination, who for that reaſon ſuſpended him, got himſelf conſecrated. But, notwithſtanding his Suſpenſion, and tho' he had never applied to Rome for the Pall, he exerciſed all the Metropolitical Functions, till he was depoſed in William the Conqueror's time (8). Very probably, in thoſe days, the Engliſh were not of opinion, that the Archbiſhops elect could not exerciſe their Functions till the Pope was pleaſed to impower them, or that the Pope's bare ſuſpenſion was ſufficient to put a ſtop to their acting as Primates.

Malmſb. l. 2. Geſt. Reg. c. 13.

Stigand, tho' ſuſpended, and without the Pall, exerciſes the Functions of Archbiſhop.

Succeſſion of the Archbiſhops of York. Stubbs.

The Succeſſion of the Archbiſhops of York was as follows. After the death of Oſwald (9), mentioned in the foregoing Book, Adulph ſucceeded him in 993, and governed his Church till 1002, when by his death he made room for Wulſtan II, who, after twenty one years, was ſucceeded by Elfric Putta, ſirnamed the Grammarian, thought by ſome to be the Author of the Tranſlation of the Saxon Homilies. To him ſucceeded Kinſius (10), in 1050, after whom came Aldred, who was alive at the Conqueſt.

Among the Biſhops of note in thoſe days, Wulfſtan Biſhop of Worceſter was a Perſon of an extraordinary Character in ſome Mens opinion, tho' Lanfranc thought him unqualified for the Office of a Biſhop, for his Stupidity and want of Learning. But this is not the firſt time that weak Men have been made to paſs for Saints. This Prelate being conſecrated by Aldred Archbiſhop of York, made his profeſſion of canonical obedience to Stigand Archbiſhop of Canterbury, though ſuſpended by the Pope. To account for this diſregard of the Pope's ſuſpenſion, 'tis pretended, the ſubmiſſion was made to the See of Canterbury, and not to the Perſon of Stigand: But when ſuch like Aſſertions are advanc'd, they ſhould be ſupported with ſome Authorities, whereas this here is deſtitute of all.

Osbern. Hoveden. Eadmer.

Edmund Biſhop of Durham was remarkable for the manner of his Election. The Chapter of Durham being met to elect a Biſhop, and not being able to agree upon their Man, Edmund, a Prieſt of that Church, ſaid jeſtingly, that ſince they were at a loſs whom to chooſe, they had as good take him and make him a Biſhop. As Miracles were then much in vogue, the Chapter looked upon this motion as a divine impulſe, and ſo unanimouſly agreed to elect him. Edmund became famous for his courage and boldneſs in reprimanding Vice, even in Perſons of the higheſt birth and ſtations.

A great Change in St. Auguſtin's Monaſtery. Gervas.

We muſt alſo reckon in the number of illuſtrious Perſons of that Age, certain Engliſh Eccleſiaſticks, who flouriſhed in Sweden and Norway. Olaus Scot-Kunung, King of Sweden, deſigning to turn Chriſtian, deſired Ethelred to ſend him ſome Miſſionaries to inſtruct him in the Goſpel. Sigefrid, Archdeacon of York, (and not Archbiſhop, as a Swediſh writer will have it,) Eskil, Gunichild, Rudolf, and Bernard, or David, undertook this Miſſion. Sigefrid was made Biſhop of Wexia, a City in the Province of Smaland in Sweden, and baptiz'd Olaus. Some ſay however, he received Baptiſm at the Hands of Bernard; but this is not very material. The greateſt part of theſe Miſſionaries were martyr'd by the Pagans, to whom they preached (1).

I have ſpoken elſewhere, though in a very general manner, of the diviſion of the Kingdom into Pariſhes. But ſince I am arrived at the end of the Saxon Empire, it will not be foreign to the purpoſe to conclude what I have to ſay of the Anglo-Saxon Church, with a more particular account of this matter.

The Diviſion of Pariſhes when ſettled. Coll. Eccl. Hiſt.

Auguſtin, the firſt Biſhop of the Saxons, received from the King of Kent ſome Lands, for the maintenance of himſelf and the Monks he brought with him, diſpoſed of the Profits of theſe Lands, and the offerings of Chriſtians as he thought fit. But becauſe he wanted Inſtructions in this matter, he conſulted Gregory I, who told him, it was the cuſtom in the Church of Rome, to divide the Offerings into four Portions, and diſtribute one of them for the maintenance of the inferior Clergy. However, as Auguſtin and his Companions were Monks of the ſame Order, the Pope exhorted them to live together as Brethren. Thus alſo lived Aidan and Finan Biſhops of the Northumbrians, who were Monks as well as Auſtin, though of a different Order. But it cannot be inferred from hence, that in all the Churches, the Biſhop and his Clergy lived in common, as ſome pretend. On the contrary, it ſeems to follow, from the Biſhop's being obliged to diſtribute the fourth part of the Church's Revenues among the Clergy, that they did not live in common. Be this as it will, the Biſhop and Clergy were maintained as well out of the profits of the Lands given to the Church, as by the daily offerings of the People.

The number of Chriſtians encreaſing every day, and there being at firſt in each Dioceſe, which contained a whole Kingdom, but one Church, it could not but be very incommodious to many of the new Converts to reſort thither. It was neceſſary therefore that others ſhould be built, and Prieſts ſent to officiate in them. Theſe Prieſts were not however fixed upon any particular Church, but kept with the Biſhop, who ſent out ſometimes one, ſometimes another, to miniſter in the remote Churches, after which they returned to him. In proportion therefore as Chriſtians encreaſed, new Churches were erected for the conveniency of thoſe who lived at a diſtance from the Cathedral. Theſe Churches were no more than Chapels of eaſe to the principal Church, to which belonged all the Offerings that were made in the others. Accordingly the Prieſts at their return, put the Offerings they had received into the Biſhop's hands, which ſerved for the maintenance of the Biſhops, and the Clergy that were about him. The Prieſts then at firſt had no other Titles, but that of belonging to a certain Dioceſe: for theſe firſt rural Churches are not to be conſidered as diſtinct Pariſhes, but as Chapels belonging to the Cathedral.

Stillingfleet.

Theſe rural Churches were not at firſt very numerous. The reaſon is, becauſe the Lords who had large Eſtates, were the only Perſons that founded them, and generally were contented with building one ſingle Church for the uſe of their Vaſſals. The number of Chriſtians being exceedingly encreaſed, it was become neceſſary to provide for the conſtant reſidence of a Prieſt in each of theſe Churches. But as the great Men, as well as the People, did not care to have a new Prieſt at every turn, the Biſhops were willing to continue the ſame to them; and from this time, Pariſhes may properly be ſaid to commence. However, leſt the Prieſts, thus fixed to one Cure, ſhould be unmindful of their dependance on the Cathedral, the Biſhops reſerved in their own hands the Revenues and Oblations theſe Churches were endowed with. This gave the Founders ſome uneaſineſs. They could not bear to ſee the Prieſt, who did all the duty, have ſo ſmall a ſhare of their Donations. Wherefore, the zeal of erecting new Churches beginning to cool, at a time when there was moſt need of them, the Biſhops thought fit to yield a little. To this purpoſe, they compounded with thoſe who had a mind to build Churches, and were ſatisfied with reſerving to the Cathedral, a third or fourth part of the Incomes, with the right of Baptiſm and Burial. This obſtacle being removed, theſe private Oratories became very numerous, almoſt every great Man building one for the conveniency of himſelf and Vaſſals. Moreover, when any Lord alienated part of his Eſtate, the Purchaſer ſeldom failed of erecting a Church in his new Purchaſe. On the other hand, the Biſhops being greatly enriched by the Grants made to their Churches, built likewiſe Churches on their Lands, as well for the conveniency of their Tenants, as to imitate the Nobles, among whom they themſelves began to be ranked. By all theſe means the rural Churches abounding every where, there was no neceſſity of ſending Prieſts from place to place, ſince each Church, as was before obſerved, had one of its own. And thus by degrees the Parochial Diviſion was ſettled. However, the Biſhops were long in poſſeſſion of the Tithes and Oblations, till at length, in order to quicken more and more the zeal of Chriſtians, they removed this difficulty which obſtructed the building and endowing of Churches. They not only left to the Parochial Prieſts the Revenues the Founders were pleaſed to aſſign, or at leaſt, the much greater part, but alſo granted them the power of adminiſtring the Sacraments in their reſpective Churches. This is the riſe and progreſs of the Parochial Diviſion, which was almoſt quite ſettled in the Reign of Edgar, or perhaps of Canute tho Great. Between that time and the Reign of Edward the Confeſſor, there were ſome farther Subdiviſions; but, in all appearance, there were few new Pariſhes after the Norman Conqueſt. At leaſt, we find by ſeveral Charters of the latter Saxon Kings, that the Pariſhes of Cambridgeſhire, Huntingdonſhire and Lincolnſhire, were the ſame as at preſent. Whence it may be preſumed the Pariſhes of the other Counties agreed with our modern Diviſion (2).

(1) Through the Lazineſs or Ignorance of the Monks, the only Writers in thoſe Days, we have but few Hiſtorians from Aſſer to the Norman Conqueſt. Next to Aſſer was Ethelward, who wrote in the Reign of Edgar, and lived till 1090, though he did not continue his Chronicle ſo far. He was (as he himſelf ſays) deſcended of the Blood Royal. His Works conſiſt of four Books, which were publiſhed by Sir H. Savil. Biſhop Nicolſon ſays, the whole is an imperfect Tranſlation of the Saxon Annals. His Style is boiſterous and obſcure, and in ſome Places hardly Senſe; and therefore but of little uſe, unleſs in ſettling the Reigns and Deaths of ſome of our Saxon Kings, who lived about his Time, concerning which the Copies of the Saxon Annals differ. From him to the Conqueſt we meet with no Hiſtorians, except Oſbern, who has wrote the Lives of St. Dunſtan and St. Alphage, which are publiſhed in the firſt Volume of Anglia Sacra; and the Author of a Treatiſe called Encomium Emmæ, being a ſhort Account of the Times immediately preceding the Reign of Edward the Confeſſor.

DISSERTATION

ON THE

Government, Laws, Manners, Customs, and Language

OF THE ANGLO-SAXONS.

The greateſt Part of the Laws in Europe from the North.

THE Revolution that happened in Europe, about the beginning of the fifth Century, is one of the moſt remarkable events in Hiſtory. The Roman Empire, which was almoſt of equal extent with the known World, was then divided into two Empires, one containing the eaſtern, the other the weſtern Provinces. The weſtern Empire was ſo harraſſed by the continual Invaſions of the northern Nations, that loſing by degrees all its Provinces, it was reduced to nothing, and the very name of Emperor of the Weſt vaniſhed with that Empire. This great Revolution quite altered the State of Europe, by introducing new Inhabitants, who raiſed new Kingdoms upon the ruins of the Roman Empire, brought at the ſame time new Laws and Cuſtoms into the conquered Countries. Spain was peopled with Colonies of Wiſigoths, Catti, Alani, and Suevi. Gallia was overwhelmed with a deluge of Wiſigoths, Burgundians, and Francs. Italy was ſo expoſed to the ſucceſſive Invaſions of the Heruli, Oſtrogoths, and Lombards, that the antient Inhabitants, inſtead of preſerving the ſuperiority of Number, made no figure at all. The Saxons, Suevi, and Bavarians, ſpread themſelves over all Germany, and became Maſters of that vaſt Tract of Land. In a word, Great-Britain was ſo over-run with Saxons, Angles, and Jutes, that hardly could any remains of the antient Britons be diſcovered. It was very natural for theſe Conquerors to eſtabliſh in their new erected Kingdoms their own Country Cuſtoms. And therefore it may be advanced for certain, that the Laws now in force, throughout the greateſt part of Europe, are derived from the Laws thoſe antient Conquerors brought with them from the North. This might be eaſily proved with reſpect to all the Countries concerned in this great Revolution. But at preſent I ſhall confine my ſelf to England alone. By what I am going to ſay, whoever has any knowledge of the Engliſh Conſtitution, will eaſily be convinced, that the Cuſtoms now practiſed in that Kingdom, are, for the moſt part, the ſame the Anglo-Saxons brought with them from the northern Countries, and laſtly from Germany.

The Laws of England derived from the Saxons.

In the ſecond Book of this Hiſtory we have ſeen how the Saxons were no ſooner arrived in Great-Britain, but they formed a deſign of ſettling there, and at length ſucceeded after a War of 150 years. This long War bred ſuch Enmity between them and the Britons, that there is no probability the Saxons, who in the end proved victorious, ſhould borrow from the vanquiſhed the Form of Government, eſtabliſhed in their Conqueſts. If therefore we would trace the Origin of the Laws and Cuſtoms of the Anglo-Saxons, we muſt ſearch for it in Germany and the northern Countries, rather than among the antient Britons. And indeed, ſuch is the reſemblance between the Laws of the Saxons, Francs, Suevi, Lombards, and the other northern Nations, that it muſt neceſſarily be concluded, they had all the ſame Origin, of an older date than the ſeparation of theſe People. This reſemblance is ſtill much ſtronger between the Laws of the Anglo-Saxons in Great-Britain, and thoſe of the Saxons in Germany, ſince they were both the ſame Nation, part whereof ſettled in England. An Engliſh Hiſtorian, by comparing the Laws and Cuſtoms of the Germans with thoſe of the Engliſh, has plainly ſhown, the Engliſh introduced into Great-Britain the ſame Laws that were in uſe in their own Country. Nay, he affirms, that till the Norman conqueſt, there was not ſo much as one Law in England, but what, in the main, the Germans had the ſame. 'Tis true, as the Anglo-Saxons conſiſted of three ſeveral Nations, who had alſo their ſeparate quarters in England, there might be ſome difference, upon that account, among the ſeven Kingdoms of the Heptarchy. But this difference could not be very great, ſince the three Nations were united in Germany, before their coming into England, and made but one and the ſame People under the general name of Saxons. All that can be inferred from hence, is, that the Laws eſtabliſhed by the Anglo-Saxons in England, were compoſed of thoſe of the Angles, Saxons, and Jutes. But to look for the Origin of the Engliſh Conſtitution among the antient Britons, would be without Foundation, though 'tis not impoſſible impossible but their forms of Government might in some respects be alike. The Laws and Customs therefore, introduced into Great-Britain by the Anglo-Saxons, are to be considered, as composed of the Laws their Ancestors brought into Germany, and of those they found among the antient Germans. And indeed, what Tacitus says of the German Customs, corresponds so exactly with several of the Saxon ones, that it can hardly be doubted that the Saxons borrowed many things from the Germans, unless we should chuse to say, the customs of both Nations flowed from the same Fountain. But to trace back these matters to their first original, would be a work of infinite Labour. It suffices to give a general Idea of them. And therefore, without carrying this inquiry any further, let us be satisfied with seeing what was the form of Government, established by those Conquerors in England.

The Title of King among the Saxons.

The Saxons had no Kings in Germany, when they sent their first Troops to the assistance of the Britons under the conduct of Hengist (1.) Their Territories were divided into twelve Provinces, over each of which a Head or Governor was appointed by the Assembly-General of the Nation, wherein the supreme Power was lodged. This Assembly was called Witten-a-Gemot, that is to say, the Assembly of the wise Men (2); and also, the Mycel-Synod, that is, the Great Assembly. Besides the Governors of the Provinces, there were others also set over the Cities and Boroughs. In time of war, the Assembly elected a General to command the Army, and to be the Chief or Head of the Commonwealth (3). Doubtless this General had great Prerogatives; but we are ignorant of their number and extent. It even appears, by the perpetual contests in England, between the Princes invested with this high dignity and the other Kings, that these Prerogatives had no fixed and settled Bounds.

Though the Title of King was not in use among the Saxons, it was however assumed by Hengist as soon as he was in possession of Kent. Indeed, it would have been difficult for him to have found any other so proper to express his Sovereignty over that Province. 'Tis true, the Titles of Duke and Earl, or, their equivalent Heretogh and Ealdorman, were not then unknown. But they were not yet used to signify Sovereigns. 'Twas not till long after, that certain Dukes and Earls being invested with Sovereign power, these titles were made use of to denote the supreme Authority. The other Saxon Leaders, who settled in Great-Britain after Hengist, followed his example, in assuming the title of King. Thus, whereas in Germany, the Saxon Territories were divided into twelve Governments, their conquests in England were parted into seven Kingdoms; but with this difference, that in Germany, each Governor depended on the Assembly-General of the Nation, whereas in England, each King was Sovereign in his petty Kingdom. However this did not exempt him from all dependance on the Witten-a-Gemot of his own State, which in conjunction with him regulated all important affairs. Moreover, by mutual consent, there was established a General Assembly of the whole seven Kingdoms, where matters relating to all in common were settled. Hence this form of Government, which considered the seven Kingdoms as united in one Body, was called the Heptarchy, that is, the Government of seven.

The form of Government established by the Saxons in England.

These first Kings having scarce any other Subjects but their own Countrymen, durst not think of assuming a despotick Power. Perhaps they had never any such thoughts, having been accustomed to the contrary in their own Country. They established therefore, or rather continued, each in his own Kingdom, a Witten-a-Gemot, where the same affairs were determined, as were wont to be in the like Assemblies in Germany. As for what concerned the common Interest of the seven Kingdoms, it was debated in a General Assembly of the Kings and great Men of the Heptarchy. 'Tis not precisely known what were the Rights and Privileges of the General Witten-a-Gemot. Probably, they were much the same the States-General of the United Provinces enjoy at this day. Each King was Sovereign, but executed the determinations agreed upon in common, to which he had given his consent, either in Person or by Proxy. Be this as it will, the common opinion is, that there was a Witten-a-Gemot, for each Kingdom in particular, and a General one for all the seven (4).

A Witten-a-Gemot in each Kingdom.

Upon this supposition it is easy to define the nature of the Anglo-Saxons Government. 'Twas Monarchical, as each Kingdom had its King; but then it was also Aristocratical, as the King had not the power of making Laws without the consent of the Assembly General, consisting of the chief Lords of the Nation. Several believe too, it was partly Democratical, and that the People sent their Representatives to the Witten-a-Gemot, as they now do to the Parliament. This opinion shall be fully examined hereafter. Mean time, it will be necessary to take a view first of the several ranks and degrees of Men among the Anglo-Saxons, since otherwise there is no having a distinct Knowledge of the nature of their Government.

The Nature of the Saxon Government.

The several Degrees and Orders of Men among the Anglo-Saxons.

The King.

I shall say nothing here of the King, because I shall have occasion elsewhere to speak of his Power and Prerogatives.

The Queen.

The Queen was the second Person in the State; tho' only with regard to the respect that was paid her, for she had no share in the Government. If sometimes the Queens sign'd the Charters with the Kings, it was not because it was necessary, but on account of their Rank. During the whole time of the Saxon Government, we find but one Queen invested with the Sovereignty; I mean, Sexburga, Queen of Wessex. However some Historians assure us, she was deposed by the West-Saxons purely because she was a Woman. Nay, we have seen that on occasion of Brithric's death, Egbert's immediate Predecessor, the West-Saxons deprived their Queens of the Prerogatives they had till then enjoyed. The Title of Queen, which was, and still is, given to the King's Wife, means no more, originally, than a Companion, in Latin, Comes. In process of Time, this Term was made use of to denote more particularly those who were nearest the King's Person; from whence it came to have a more general signification, and to mean the great Lords. Thus we find in the old French Romances, and Poets, Li Queen de Flandre, Li Queen de Leicester, instead of, the Earls of Flanders and Leicester. The word Queen then was common to Men and Women, just as Comes in Latin. At length, the Term Count or Earl being substituted in its room, when applied to Men, Queen was appropriated to Remarks on the Word Queen.

(1) It is observable, that in France, Spain, and Italy, they have no Word that signifies King, but what is borrowed from the Latin, a Language these Invaders were Strangers to, when they settled in their Conquests.

(2) In like manner our Parliament is sometimes stiled, The Wisdom of the Nation.

(3) This General was chosen out of the Twelve Governors.

(4) In order to have a clear Notion of the Gothick Model of Government established in the several Kingdoms of Europe, it will be necessary to consider the Nature of their Armies that were sent out in quest of new Habitations. As their whole Nation was divided, like the Israelites, into so many distinct Tribes with each its own Judges, without any common Superior, unless in time of War, like the Roman Dictator: So in like manner the Armies or Colonies sent out, upon their Countries being overstocked with Inhabitants, were not Armies of Hirelings, who conquered for the Benefit of their Paymasters, but voluntary Societies or Partners in the Expedition, consisting of so many distinct Armies, out of every Tribe, conducted each by their own Leaders, and united under one common General or Superior chosen by consent, who was also Head or Captain of his own Tribe. This then being the Nature of the confederate Army, it is evident that upon their conquering a Country, the Property of the Land was in the whole Collective Body, and that every Individual had a Right to share in what he had helped to conquer. Accordingly to fix this undetermined Right, the conquered Country was divided into as many Shares (called afterwards Shires, Counties, &c.) as the General or King had Companions, or as the Army was composed of Tribes, that each Tribe, as they had lived together in their own Country, might do the same in their new Settlement. After this general Division, the Lands were portioned out among the Leaders and Officers, who subdivided them among their Followers. These Allotments, while annual, or for life, were called in Latin, Beneficia (a Word appropriated since to Church Preferments) and afterwards Feoda, that is, a Gift of Possessions; from the Teutonick, Fee a Gift, and Od a Possession; in our Language they are still called Fees. As it was necessary upon their settling in a newly subdued Country, to continue their General, he may be considered in two respects; first, as Lord of a private District divided among his own particular Followers, and as Lord or Head of the great Seigniory of the Kingdom. Thus we may frame an Idea of the Nature of the Governments settled in Europe by the Northern Nations. Over each District or Country presided an Ealdorman or Earl, who with an Assembly of the Landholders or Vassals, (so called from Gesell, the Name they went by in their own Country) regulated all Affairs relating to the Country. And over the great Seigniory of the Kingdom presided the General or King, who with a General Assembly of the Wites or Vassals of the Crown, regulated the Affairs relating to the whole Community. How this was done in England, and who were the Members of the Country-Courts or Assemblies, as well as of the Great Court of the Kingdom, will be shown under the next Head of the Courts of Justice. From what has been said, many useful Remarks may be made. Hence we see the Origine of the Principalities, Dukedoms, Counties, and the like, that the several European Kingdoms are divided into. From hence we may also observe that the Property or directum Dominium of the Land was in the Collective Body of the Publick, and that the Tenants in Fee were only invested with the Dominium utile; and therefore that the Great Lords held their Seigniories of the Publick or Kingdom, and not of the King. Thus the German Princes hold of the Empire, not of the Emperor; and this is the Reason of the English Lords being called Peers of the Realm, though they are now commonly thought to have held of the King. After the Fees from being annual became Estates of Inheritance, many Differences arose between the two Superiors and the Vassals, and between the Vassals themselves, upon which their reciprocal Rights and Duties were inquired into and settled. The Rules collected from such Decisions by Degrees, were termed the Feudal Law, and prevailed over Europe for many Ages. This Law is distinguished by Bishop Nicolson into these Periods: its Birth from the Irruption of the Northern Nations to 650; its Infancy, from thence to 800; its Youth, from thence to 1027; And lastly, its State of Perfection soon after that Time. The Princes of Europe and their People being linked together by Feudal Tenures (which if duly considered will effectually show the true Nature of the Royal Power, and the Measures of the Peoples Obedience) remained for a long Time in a happy State, there having been no Prince in Europe that ever imagined he had a Title to arbitrary Power, till the Civil Law, which had been buried in oblivion for some Time after the settling of the Northern Nations in the western Empire, was brought to Light. Then some Princes made Lex Regia a handle to assume a despotick Power, and introduced the Civil Law purely upon that Account into their Kingdoms. This was unsuccessfully attempted in England; but it prevails in other Parts of Europe, even in Spain itself, where the Reading it purely for this Cause, was once forbid on Pain of Death. See St. Amand's Essay on the Legislative Power of England, p. 46.

the Women only. Afterwards coming to have a more restrain'd signification, it was used only to denote the Companion of the King, or the Queen. But it must be observed, this appellation is common to all Queens, whether they hold their Dignity of their Husbands, or of their own Right.

The Princes. The King's Sons and the Princes of the Royal Family held the third rank. They were distinguished by the Title of Clyto, taken from a Greek word, signifying, Illustrious. 'Tis something difficult to know the reason why the Saxon Princes affected a Greek Title. One would be apt to think the word Clyto came from some old Saxon term, if Edgar's Title of Totius Angliæ Basileus (1), were not a demonstration that they had a view to the Greek. As this Title was peculiar to the Princes, the word Clyto alone came by degrees to denote a Prince of the Royal Blood. Accordingly nothing is more common with the ancient English Historians than to use the Terms Clytones, Clytonculi, for the King's Sons. In process of time, the Saxon Term Atheling, from Athel, that is, Noble, was substituted in its place. As for the termination Ing, it denotes the extraction or descent, as Malmsbury informs us. The Sons of the Kings of England, says he, were wont to assume Names which shew'd their Extraction. Thus, the Son of Edgar named himself Edgaring, the Son of Edmund, Edmunding, and so of the others. But they had all one common Title, namely, that of Atheling. As the French, which settled in Gaul, came from Germany, probably the termination Ing, in the words, Merovingians, and Carlovingians, that is, the descendants of Merovius and Charles is derived from the same original.

Remark on the Titles of Clyto. Selden, Titles of Honour. Malmsb. de Reg. l. 1. c. 3.

Ealdorman. Next to the Princes, the first degree of the Nobility was that of Ealdorman (2). This word, which in its primary Signification means only an aged Man, came by degrees to stand for Persons of the greatest Distinction; apparently because such were chosen to discharge the highest Offices, whose long experience had rendered them most capable. 'Tis not only among the Saxons that this word is used in these two different Senses. We find in Scripture, that the Elders of Israel, of Moab, and of Midian were taken for the chief Men of their respective Nations. The word, Senator, Senor, Signor, Seigneur, in Latin, Spanish, Italian and French, signify the same thing. The Ealdormen therefore in England were the most considerable of the Nobility, discharged the highest Offices, and consequently had the largest Estates. As they were generally intrusted with the Government of the Counties, instead of saying the Governor, it was said, the Ealdorman, of such a County. Hence by degrees this word came to signify the Governor of a County, or even a single City. Whilst the Heptarchy lasted, these Officers were only during the King's Pleasure, who turn'd out the Ealdormen when he thought proper, and placed others in their room. At length, they became during Life, at least for the most part. But however, this did not hinder the Ealdormen from being displaced upon several accounts. We have seen Instances of this in the Reigns of Canute the Great, and Edward the Confessor. After the Danes were settled in England, the Title of Ealdorman was by degrees changed into that of Earl, a Danish word of the same import (3). Afterwards, the Normans introduced that of Count, which, though different in its original Signification, meant however the same Dignity. But for reasons too long to be explained, the Danish Term Earl is still used to denote the same Person, expressed by the word Count in other Countries.

Several sorts of Ealdormen. There were several sorts of Ealdormen. Some were properly only Governors of a Province or County. Others were Owners of their Province, holding it as a Fee of the Crown, so that it was always considered as Parcel of the State. The History of Alfred the Great, affords an Instance of this last sort of Ealdormen, which were very rare in England. We find this Prince gave the Property of Mercia to Earl Ethelred, and that Elfleda his Widow kept possession in the reign of Edward the Elder. Nay, it was by force that Edward dispossessed his Niece Alfwina after the death of Elfleda. Malmsbury, speaking of Edward the Elder, expresses himself thus: He united the two Kingdoms of Mercia and Wessex; but as to the first, he was only titular King, because it was given to a Lord named Ethelred. And to shew in what manner this Lord held Mercia, the same Historian speaking of Alfred the Great, says, He gave London, the Capital of Mercia, to a Lord, called Ethelred, who had married Elfleda his Daughter, to hold it of him by Fealty and Homage. Hence, 'tis plain, Ethelred held Mercia as a Fee, in the same manner that Octa and Ebusa had formerly held Northumberland of the Crown of Kent, as this Historian assures us. Thus also in France, about the beginning of the third Race of their Kings, the Dukedoms, and Earldoms, which before were only bare Governments, were made hereditary, on condition of Homage. These Ealdormen or Earls were honoured with the Titles of Reguli, Subreguli, Principes, Patricii. Nay, there are Instances of their having the Title of Rex (4). As for the others, who were only Governors, they had the Title of Ealdorman of such a County, expressed sometimes in Latin by the Term Consul. The first administred Justice in their own name, and appropriated to their own use all the Profits and Revenues of their respective Counties. The last administred Justice in the King's name, and had only a certain share of the Profits assigned them. Earl Goodwin, how great a Lord soever he might be in other respects, was of this rank. To these may be added a third order of Ealdormen, who had the Title, though without a Government, on account of their high Birth, and out of these the Governors were usually chosen. Thus the Title of Ealdorman denoted sometimes only a Person of Quality.

Dufresne voce Par.

Inferior Ealdormen. There were also inferior Ealdormen in Cities and Burroughs. But these were only subordinate Magistrates, who administred Justice in the King's name, and were dependent on the great Ealdormen or Earls. The name of Ealdorman or Alderman is still given to these inferior Offices, whilst the others have the Title of Earl or Count.

Dukes or Heretogan. The Office of an Ealdorman was wholly Civil, and had nothing to do with Military Affairs. There was in each Province a Duke, who commanded the Militia. The name of Duke, taken from the Latin Dux, is a modern Term. The Saxons called this Officer Heretog (5). He had no right to meddle with civil Matters. His business was of a quite different nature from that of an Earl, as he was also independent of him. Hengist and Horsa are called in the Saxon Annals, Heretogan, or Dukes, because they were sent into Great-Britain, not to govern the Country, but to command in the War. On the contrary, Octa and Ebusa have always in the same Annals the title of Ealdormen, because they were Governors of Northumberland, under the Kings of Kent. It is true, they might also be stiled Dukes, as they had the command of the Army. Accordingly we find in our Histories, sometimes the title of Duke, sometimes of Earl, given to the same Person, when these two Offices were united into one, as they frequently were about the end of the Heptarchy. Thus the Governors of Wessex, Mercia, and East-Anglia, are indifferently called Dukes or Earls. But I don't know the reason why Historians never give the title of Duke to the Governor of Northumberland. And yet some of these Governors had the command of the Armies, as is plain from the example of Siward, to whom Edward the Confessor committed the management of the War with Cumberland. (6)

Ealdorman of all England. There was moreover among the Saxons three very considerable Offices, two whereof were Civil, and the third Military. The first, which very few Subjects were ever invested with, was that of Ealdorman of all England. This Office answers to that of Chief Justiciary of England, the King's Lieutenant, Viceroy or Guardian of the Realm. This was so high a Dignity, that the Person invested with it was honoured with the Title of Half-Kyning, or Demi-King. We find in the History of the Anglo-Saxons, but two Lords who were raised to this Post, namely Athelstan Earl of East-Anglia, and Alwin his Son, who were stiled Totius Angliæ Aldermannus (7).

Chancellor. The second great Office was that of Chancellor (8). He finally determined all Causes that were brought to the King's Court, and from him lay no Appeal. It was his business also to draw up, and sign all the King's Charters, Selden, Titles of Honour.

(1) King Edgar stiles himself thus in his Charter to Glassenbury-Abbey, as it stands in Malmsbury's Antiquities of that Monastery.

(2) Our Author calls them Earlderman; but I cannot find the Word is so spelt in any Writer. The Saxon Annals, &c. style them Ealderman.

(3) For ar or ear, i. e. Honour, and arlic, or earlic, Honourable. In the Danish Language to this Day, erligis signifies Noble, or Honourable, as Erlig radman for Nobilis Decurio in St. Mark, cap. 15, v. 43. Selden, Titles of Honour, p. 638.

(4) Ethelred, Ealdorman of Mercia under King Alfred, is so called by Ethelward, and his Earldom is, in Florence of Worcester, called Regnum and Rit, (which is the same) in the Saxon Annals. See Ethelw. l. 4. c. 3.

(5) That is, publick Leader, or Captain. In the Saxon Psalms, both Ealderman and Heretoga thus occur, Aldermannum Juda, Heretogan Heara, i. e. the Princes of Juda, their Captains. Psalm lxvii. 27.

(6) The Union of these two Offices in one Person was no more than what was practised among the Romans in the Person of their Consul. The Art of War in the Saxons Time was not arrived to that Degree of Nicety as it is at present. You have at large the Duty of the Heretog, and the manner of his being elected by the County-Assembly at a full Folc-mote, in the Laws of Edward the Confessor. See Dr. Wilkins, p. 205. De Heretochiis.

(7) Selden thinks this Alwin to be the same that subscribes a Charter of Edgar's in Ingulphus, with Ego Alwinus Dux consensi. At Ramsey Abbey was formerly this old Inscription:

HIC REQUIESCIT AILWINUS INCLYTI REGIS ÆDGARI COGNATUS, TOTIUS ANGLIÆ ALDERMANNUS, ET HUJUS SACRI COENOBII MIRACULOSUS FUNDATOR. He died in the Year 992. Cod. Remsciensis in Arch. Scaccarii.

(8) So called from the barbarous Latin Word Cancellare, from his Cancelling or Striking out what he pleased in Men's Grants and Petitions. Tyrrel, Introd. p. 73.

otherwiſe they would have wanted a neceſſary Formality. The firſt Chancellor, mentioned in the Saxon Hiſtory, was Turketule, Couſin to Edward the Elder, who was afterwards Abbot of Croyland. However, I am apt to think this Office was of a more modern Inſtitution (1).

Kyning's-Hold, Or Generaliſſimo.

The third conſiderable Officer was the General of the Army, in Saxon Kyning's Hold, that is, the King's General. He was chief of the Dukes, or the Generaliſſimo, like the High-Conſtable of France. This Office laſted only during war. In time of peace, or when the King did not think fit to have a Generaliſſimo, the Holds or Dukes of each County had the Care of the Militia.

High-Sheriffs or Viſcounts.

Next to the Earls and Dukes were the High-Sheriffs of the Counties. Theſe were Officers ſent by the King into ſuch Counties as had no Earls, to adminiſter Juſtice in his name and ſtead. They were called in Latin, Summi Præpoſiti, Cuſtodes Provinciarum, and afterwards, Vicecomites (2), not that they were under the Earls or Counts, but becauſe they performed the Office of Earl in the Counties where there was no Earl. It is very true, there were ſometimes High-Sheriffs in thoſe Counties, where there was alſo Earls; but Selden ſuppoſes it was becauſe ſuch Counties were by ſome peculiar Privilege under the immediate Juriſdiction of the King. But however this be, hence came the title of Viſcount, the next in order to that of Earl or Count. As for the name of Sheriff (3), it is continued to inferior Officers, who, in each County, perform the Office of the antient Viſcounts: Theſe laſt having been long ſince ranked among the Peers of the Realm.

Thanes.

After the High-Sheriffs came the Thanes, a name in Saxon ſignifying Miniſter or Servant. There were two ſorts: Maſs-Thanes, that is, Eccleſiaſtical Thanes; and Werold-Thanes, that is, Lay-Thanes. The Thanes in general were divided into three Claſſes. The firſt were the King's Thanes, the immediate Tenants of the Crown, who did Homage to the King only. Theſe were properly what were afterwards called Peers of the Realm, and made the Body of the greater Nobility. Conſequently, Dukes, Ealdormen, and Viſcounts, were ranked among the Thanes of the firſt Claſs, as well as they who, having no Offices, were the immediate Tenants of the Crown. The Normans changed the Term Thane into Baron, and ſtiled the Lands Baronies, which the Saxons called Thane-lands. Hence it has been the cuſtom for a long while in England, to rank all the greater Nobility under the general title of Barons, becauſe all the great Men were Thanes (4). The ſecond Claſs of Thanes were what they called Middle-Thanes, becauſe there being others of an inferior degree, theſe were in the middle Claſs. If they held Lands of the King himſelf, they were inconſiderable, and generally what they poſſeſſed was held of the Earls or Barons. The Normans gave them the name of Vavaſors, and their Lands Vavaſories. The Signification of this word may, I think, be expreſſed by that of Under-Tenants (5). The third Claſs of Thanes were ſuch as held their Lands of the Middle-Thanes, or Vavaſors. Theſe were not ranked among the leſſer Nobility. They were properly ſuch as lived upon their own Eſtates, and being of no profeſſion, were diſtinguiſhed from the meaner ſort of People. If I am not miſtaken, to theſe belonged particularly the title of Gentlemen; whereas the Middle-Thanes were in the ſame rank with the preſent Knights and Squires. I am very ſenſible, ſeveral are of opinion, the title of Gentleman is equivalent to that of Nobilis, and conſequently, they were a part of the Nobility. The affinity between the words Gentleman and Gentilhomme ſeems to countenance this Opinion. I intend not to diſpute this pretenſion with them. I ſhall only obſerve a remarkable difference between a Gentilhomme of France, and a Gentleman of England. In France there being but one body of Nobility, every Gentilhomme is a member of that Body, and no leſs noble than a Duke. But a Gentleman in England can at beſt be ranked but in the ſecond order of Nobles, that is, among the leſſer Nobility or Gentry. Beſides, in England abundance of People of very mean Birth are called Gentlemen, who moſt certainly in France would have no right to be ſtiled Gentilhommes.

Selden.

The Ceorles.

The loweſt order among the Saxons, I mean of Freemen, was that of the Ceorles, that is, Merchants, Artificers, Countrymen and others. Hence no doubt is derived the word Churle or Carle, a name given by way of contempt to People of mean condition. The Ceorles were equally free, as to their Perſons, with the Thanes of the third Claſs; however with this difference; the Thanes held ſuch Eſtates as were called Boc-Land, conveyable by Deed or otherwiſe, upon paying a certain Sum to the Lord: But the Ceorles were poſſeſſed only of what they called Soclands, or Lands of the Plow, which they could not alienate, becauſe they were properly but Farmers. Among the Ceorles, thoſe that held this ſort of Lands were diſtinguiſhed from the reſt that were poor, and had none of theſe poſſeſſions, or exerciſed ſome Trade for their livelihood, by the honourable name of Socmen. In general, all under Thanes and above Slaves were in the rank of Ceorles, who [as to their Perſons, though not Lands] were as free as the Ealdormen and Thanes themſelves. They might even arrive at the Dignity of a Thane of the third Claſs, if they ſo thrived as to be in poſſeſſion of five Hydes of Land, a Houſe with an enclos'd Court, a Kitchen, a Hall, and a Bell to call their domeſticks together (6). Selden thinks a Hyde of Land was ſuch a quantity as could be managed with one Plow (7).

Of Bondmen two Sorts.

The loweſt order of Men were the Slaves or Bond-men, of whom there were two ſorts; ſuch as were really Slaves, who, poſſeſſing nothing of their own, worked only for their Lords, by whom for that reaſon they were maintained. The others, who were properly Servants, had ſmall Holdings at the Will of their Lords, for which they did all the ſervile Country Works that were ſet them. As for the Original of theſe Slaves, ſome think they were the deſcendants of the meaner ſort of Britons, who ſubmitted to become Slaves, to ſave their lives during the fury of the firſt Saxons in England. Others are of opinion, they came from the Slaves brought into the Iſland by the Saxons. However this be, theſe [Prædial] Bondmen, not quite ſo much Slaves as the others, managed their Lords Lands, from whence they reaped ſome advantage themſelves, without having the Liberty of quitting the Place of their abode, and ſettling elſewhere, unleſs with their Lord's Conſent. They were afterwards called Villains, that is, Villagers, from the Villages where they lived and worked. We ſtill meet in ſeveral parts of Germany with ſuch ſorts of Peaſants, who are ſubject to great Drudgery, and generally are treated very harſhly by their Lords. When a Slave had his freedom, he was immediately rank'd among the Ceorles, the freedmen, not conſtituting, as ſome pretend, a new order of Men. 'Tis

(1) Lombard affirms the uſe of the Great Seal, and with it the name of Chancellor was brought out of Normandy by Edward the Confeſſor. See his Archaionom.

(2) Vice does not denote here a Subordination to any Comes. As in that of Horace, utar vice cotis, and as in Vice-Cancellarius in the Court of Rome, where there is no Chancellor. Vicecomes therefore means here, one appointed Supplere Vicem Comitis. See Selden Tit. of Hon. p. 646.

(3) Sheriff, as if Shire-Reve (i. e.) Præfect of the Shire, from the Saxon, Gerefa contracted into Grefa, and Greve, and by the Normans, into Reve; thus Portgreve is Præfectus Portus, from the German Word Grave, which ſignifies a Judge. Whence the old Words Gent-Grave, Tun-grave, &c. for the chief Magiſtrates in the Hundreds and Tythings. Thus in Germany the Judges of the Boroughs and Marches were called Bur-Graves and Mark-Graves, and Grave is ſtill uſed there to ſignify the Sovereign Princes of the Territories it is applied to. The Saxon Sheriffs were choſen by the Aſſembly of the County. See Dr. Wilkins, p. 205.

(4) It is the common Opinion that the Barons after the Conqueſt, were the ſame with the Thanes in the Saxon Times; but upon Examination it will appear otherwiſe. The Word Thane occurs not in the oldeſt Saxon Monuments, and their Original ſeems to be this. When time had poliſh'd the Anglo-Saxons, many Offices that the great Men diſcharged at firſt in their own Perſons, were for Eaſe and Grandeur by them devolved on others. And, as in thoſe Days there was but little Money, ſuch Perſons were rewarded for their Services, by having Land given them. Such Lands were called Train-Land, which paid no Rent, the Superior having the Tenant's Service in lieu of it. Thus a great Lord's Chamberlain, Hawker, Hunter, were called the Thanes. Theſe Thanes were divided into greater or leſſer, only differing in this, that the greater held of the King, and the leſſer of ſome Subject. Hence it appears that the Thanes were no other Perſons than thoſe the Normans called Tenants by Serjeanty; when the Service was of a publick Nature, that is, Steward of the Houſhold, Maſter of the Horſe, theſe reſpecting only the Perſon of the King, ſuch Services made only a Tenure of Petit-Serjeanty. Now the firſt of theſe only, as holding on the Publick, were ranked among the Barons. Serjeanty is French for Servitium, ſo that Thanes and Serjeants mean the ſame thing, viz. Miniſters or Servants. See St. Amand. p. 112.

(5) The Vavaſors in Lombardy, from whence they ſeem originally to come, were inferior to the Capitanei, theſe laſt comprehended Dukes, Marqueſſes, Counts, and other great Titles; but the Vavaſors were ſuch as were inveſted, either by the Sovereign or ſome Duke, Count, &c. with ſome Territory of feudal Command, without any of thoſe Titles. So that Vavaſor means as if, Validus Vaſſallus or powerful ſort of Vaſſals. See Selden Tit. of Hon. p. 488.

(6) The Lands among the Saxons were diſtinguiſh'd into Bocland and Folcland, (and not Soc-land, as Rapin ſays.) The Bocland, or Hereditary Lands, were poſſeſſed by the nobler Sort, free of all Service. Theſe were divided into two ſorts, Inland and Outland. The Inland was that which lay next or moſt convenient for the Lord's Manſion Houſe, and therefore was kept in their Hands for ſupport of their Family. This was managed by the Bondmen and Slaves, and was afterwards called by the Normans, Terras Dominicales, the Demeans, or Lord's Land. Outland was that which lay beyond the Inlands or Demeans, and was granted out to any Tenant Hereditarily, but at the Pleaſure of the Lord. Part was diſpoſed among ſuch as attended their Lords either in War or Peace, (called Theodens, or Leſſer Thanes,) after the manner of Knights-Fees. The other Part was allotted to Huſbandmen, who were termed Ceorles, and were to pay their Lord a certain Portion of Victuals and things neceſſary for Hoſpitality. This Rent was called Feorm or Farm, (a Saxon word ſignifying Meat or Victuals) which ever ſince Henry IId's Time, has been changed into Money, though we ſtill retain the word Farmers. Theſe Outlands were what they called Folcland. The word Lord is a Contraction of the Saxon Hlaford, i. e. a Giver of Bread, a Maintenance, becauſe they granted to their Ceorles or Socmen, Land ſufficient to ſupply themſelves and Families with Bread and Neceſſaries. Soc ſignifies in Saxon a Liberty of judging and determining Cauſes within the Precinct of the Soc or Manor. Hence Socman were thoſe that owed ſuit to the Lord's Court, or Mallemote, where the Lord determined all differences between his Men in their Civil Rights, and alſo puniſhed Criminals with the Advice and Conſent of his Freemen. Life and Death were at firſt within the Juriſdiction of the Hall-mote. (7) See p. 129. Not. (3).

true they were called Freolætan, that is, Freedmen; but it was only to diſtinguiſh them from thoſe that were Free-born, who however had no peculiar Privilege. Among the Anglo-Saxons, the Lords had not the power of Life and Death over their Slaves. Nay, the Laws provided they ſhould not cripple or maim them without incurring a Penalty. They who made ſuch Laws, imitated in ſome meaſure the Law of God, without knowing it (1).

Freeholders. All the King's Subjects, except Slaves and Villains, were Freedmen and Freeholders. But though Earls and Barons, or Thanes might be included under this general Appellation, yet by Freeholders is commonly meant the Thanes of the ſecond and third Claſſes, with the Ceorles.

Burghers and Aldermen. The Inhabitants of Towns, who were call'd Burghwitan or Burghers, had the Privilege of being governed by Magiſtrates choſen out of their own Body, to whom was given the Title of Aldermen; and of forming a Society, from whence is derived what is called in England a Corporation (2). This Privilege was granted them for the Encouragement of Arts, and eſpecially of Trade and Commerce, which was juſtly deem'd of very great advantage to the State. For the farther encouragement of Trade, it was alſo enacted by Law, that if a Merchant croſs'd the wide Sea three times, he ſhould be honoured with the Title of Thane, and admitted to all the Privileges of that Order. I don't know what is meant here by the wide Sea, unleſs it be the German Ocean, ſince in thoſe days, America was not diſcovered. From the time of the Saxons, Merchants have been in great repute in England, ſince we find ſuch as diſtinguiſh themſelves in Trade, are frequently honoured with Knighthood by the King.

Having now gone through the ſeveral Orders and Degrees of Men among the Anglo-Saxons, I ſhall in the next place, conſider how they were governed, and chiefly the method of adminiſtring Juſtice. To this end, it will be neceſſary to ſpeak of the different Courts they erected in England, whereby will be ſeen the Origin of the ſeveral Courts of Juſtice now in that Kingdom.

The Courts of Justice.

I Have already obſerved in the Life of Alfred the Great, that this Prince divided England into Shires, the Shires into Trythings, Laths, or Wapentakes, theſe into Hundreds, and the Hundreds into Tythings. However it muſt not be imagined that in this diviſion, he introduced ſomething entirely new to the Engliſh. He only ſettled the bounds of the former diviſions, making ſome alterations for conveniency's ſake. At leaſt, as to the Diviſion of the Kingdom into Shires, 'tis certain he only proportioned it in a better manner than before. This is evident from there being Earls of Somerſetſhire and Devonſhire in the reign of Ethelwulph, as Aſſer relates, who lived about that time. But Alfred uniting all England into one Monarchy, made a more exact and extenſive diviſion of his dominions. The Shires contained a whole Province ſubject to the Juriſdiction of an Earl or Count, and therefore were alſo called Counties. Some of theſe Shires being divided into Trythings, others into Laths, and others into Wapentakes, each of theſe diviſions, which were the ſame thing under different names (3), conſiſted of three or four hundreds of Families, and each Hundred was ſubdivided into Tythings. The Courts of Juſtice were formed with reſpect to theſe ſeveral diviſions, that is, there was a Court for each Tything, Hundred, &c. to the end Juſtice might be adminiſtred with leſs charge, greater diſpatch, and more exactneſs.

The Tything Court. The loweſt of theſe Courts was the Tything Court. It conſiſted of ten heads of Families, who were mutual Sureties for one another, as each of them in particular was for all that were under him (4). Every Subject in the Kingdom was regiſtred in ſome Tything. Only Perſons of the firſt rank had the Privilege that their ſingle Family ſhould compoſe a Tything, for which they were reſponſible. Each Tything had a Preſident, ſtil'd Tything-Man, or Burg-holder, who took care to hold a Court, when occaſion required. The method of proceeding was as follows.

If any Perſon accuſed of a Crime, refuſed to appear, the other nine Sureties were bound to ſee him forth-coming to Juſtice. If he ran away, he was not ſuffered to ſettle in any other Town, Borough or Village; becauſe no one could change Habitation, without a Teſtimonial from his Tything, for want of which they that received him were puniſhed. By the Laws of King Edward, the Tything had thirty Days (5) allowed them to ſearch for the Criminal. If he was not to be found, the Tything-Man, taking with him two of his own, and nine of the three next Tythings (6), theſe twelve purged themſelves by Oath of the offence and flight of the Malefactor. If they refuſed to ſwear, the Tything the offender belonged to, was obliged to make ſatisfaction in his ſtead.

This Court frequently met, as well to decide the Differences among the Members of the Tything, as to concert meaſures againſt ſuch, whoſe behaviour created a ſuſpicion of their committing ſome crime, for which the reſt might be in danger of incurring the Penalty. In this caſe, the ſuſpected Perſon was obliged to find particular ſecurity for his good Behaviour, without which he was confined. This Court was a terror to People of mean Condition, as they ſaw they could not commit any offence with impunity. Before this Order was eſtabliſhed, the meaner ſort of People might eaſily ſhift their quarters by reaſon of their obſcurity, which prevented them from being taken notice of. But it was impoſſible for them to change their Habitation, after they were obliged to bring a Teſtimonial from their Tything, to enable them to ſettle or be regiſtered in another.

Theſe ten heads of Families, of whom the Tything conſiſted, were called Free-Burghs, that is, Free-Pledges, Burgh ſignifying Surety or Pledge. Hence the word Neighbour, which originally ſignifies a near Pledge. In all appearance Barman, which ſignifies a Neighbour among the Dutch, is derived from the ſame ſource, I mean, from the ſame cuſtom which was obſerved in Germany, and ſerved for a model to King Alfred. We find in the Hiſtory of the Cuſtoms of China, written in Spaniſh by John Gonçalez de Mendoſa, an Auguſtin Monk, that the like Cuſtom is now in uſe in that Empire. The likeneſs is ſo perfect between what is practiſed by the Chineſe and the Anglo-Saxons, with reſpect to theſe Tythings or mutual Pledges, that it is wonderful, how two Nations ſo remote from each other, and between whom there was never any communication, could thus have the ſame Thoughts. Hiſt. de los Ritos y Coſtumbres de la China. l. 3. c. 16.

The Hundred Court. The next Court was that of the Hundred. It was held once a Month, and had for Preſident one of the moſt noted Aldermen of the Hundred. The Biſhop or Archdeacon was obliged to ſit with him, to determine with the other Judges, all matters Eccleſiaſtical and Civil relating to the Hundred.

Trything-Court. The third Court was that of the Trythings (7), Laths, or Wapentakes, according to the Name given theſe diviſions in the ſeveral Counties. Here were decided the Cauſes between private Perſons, belonging to different Hundreds of the ſame Trything or Lath. Beſides this Court, each Thane of the firſt rank, or Baron, held one like it, wherein he determined the Controverſies between his Vaſſals. From whence the preſent Court-Baron takes its Original. Lambard. Dugdale.

The Shire-gemot or Folcmote. But when a Suit commenced between Perſons of different Trythings, it was brought to the County-Court, called in Saxon, Shire-gemot, or Folcmote, which was held twice a year, or oftner, upon occaſion. Herein preſided

(1) There were in England two Sorts of Villains, a Villain in Groſs, who was immediately bound to the Perſon of his Lord, and his Heirs. The other, a Villain regardant to a Manor, that is, belonging and being annexed to a Manor. There are not truly any Villains now; though the Law concerning them ſtands unrepealed. The Succeſſors of the Bond-Men or Villains are the Copy-holders, who, though Time has dealt favourably with them in other reſpects, yet they ſtill retain one Mark of their original Servitude. For as of old Villains were not reckoned as Members of the Commonwealth, but Part and Parcel of the Owner's Subſtance, ſo were they therefore excluded from any ſhare in the Legiſlature, and their Succeſſors ſtill continue without any Right to vote at Elections, by vertue of their Copy-holds.

(2) After Lands were appropriated and become Eſtates of Inheritance, Neceſſity obliged many People to deviſe Ways and Means for miniſtring to the Occaſions, Eaſe and Pleaſures of the Rich, to obtain by ſuch Services a Maintenance to themſelves. Hence aroſe the Invention and Encouragement of Arts and Sciences. This laid the Foundation of the many Cities or Burroughs which were formed throughout Europe, which formerly in other Kingdoms, as well as in England, by being neceſſary and uſeful became conſiderable. S. Amand. p. 132.

(3) The Wapentakes are the ſame as the Hundreds, and not as the Laths, or Trythings, as Mr. Rapin ſeems to think here and elſewhere. This word is ſtill in uſe North of the Trent.

(4) By Ten Families we are not to underſtand Ten Houſe-keepers, but Ten Lords of Manors, with all their Vaſſals, Tenants, Labourers, and Slaves, who, though they did not all live under their Lord's Roof, were all counted part of his Family. As there were no little Free-holders in thoſe early Times, nor for long after, Ten ſuch Families muſt occupy a large Space of Ground, and might well conſtitute a rural Tything. In like manner the Town Tythings or Burroughs conſiſted not of Ten Shop-keepers or Traders, but of Ten Companies or Fraternities, called in Saxon, Guilds: Perhaps ſome more eminent than the reſt might employ great Numbers of Artificers, Hirelings or Slaves; and if we underſtand by Ten Families, Ten ſuch, we may well conceive they conſtituted Towns and Burroughs. Every Tything was as it were a little Republick which exerciſed a judicial Power within the Precincts of its own Territories, and different from a Shire in nothing but extent of Ground and Number of Inhabitants. For as the Earl preſided in the general Aſſembly of every County, ſo there was one choſen annually out of the Ten to preſide in the Tything-Court. Theſe Preſidents were called Sapientes, and by the Saxons, Witan. After the Conqueſt, theſe preſiding Officers were made for Life, for the ſake of the Normans, who would not otherwiſe be choſen, and inſtead of Wites were called Barons, and the Ten Manors, or Tything they preſided over, an Honour or Barony. But the Town-Tythings or Burroughs remained on their ancient foot, and choſe their Preſident yearly. Vide St. Amand. Eſſay on Legiſlative Power of England.

(5) One and Thirty Days. (6) That is, of each the chief Tything-Man and two others.

(7) The Trything was a third Part of the County, ſome Footſteps of which ancient Diviſion ſtill remain in the Ridings of Yorkſhire: For Eaſt-Riding, Weſt-Riding, and North-Riding, are manifeſt Corruptions of Eaſt-Trything, Weſt-Trything, and North-Trything.

the Biſhop and the Earl or Ealdorman; but in the abſence of the Earl, the High-Sheriff or Viſcount ſupplied his place. In this Court were regiſtred all the Tythings of the County, with the Names of the Members. Eccleſiaſtical Cauſes were tried generally in the firſt place; next thoſe the King was concerned in; and laſtly, ſuch as related to private Perſons. William the Conqueror diſpenſed with the Biſhops ſitting in this Court, and granted them the Privilege of holding Courts of their own for the determining Eccleſiaſtical Matters. Appeals lay from the Tything, Hundred, or Trything Courts, to the Shire-gemot. Here alſo all Perſons of what rank ſoever were to take the Oath of Allegiance to the King.

The King's Court.

How great ſoever the Power of this Court was, there was one above it, which they called the King's-Court, becauſe the King himſelf preſided there in perſon, or in his abſence, the High-Chancellor. In this Court were examined the Judgments of the inferior Courts; and it was apparently this Court that condemned the four and forty Judges put to death by Alfred's order, as has been related in his Life. From this Court the Common-Pleas and King's-Bench derive their Original.

The Wittena-Gemot.

I come now to the Great Court, or Aſſembly General of the Kingdom, called in Saxon, Wittena-Gemot, or Mycel Synod. As there are great diſputes about the Exiſtence, Origin, Nature, and Authority of this Aſſembly General, it will be proper in this place, to ſet forth the various Sentiments concerning theſe Matters, with the Reaſons and Anſwers of ſuch as maintain the contrary Opinions. For my part, as I am wholly unconcerned in the deciſion of the Queſtions formed upon this Subject, I ſhall content my ſelf with ſtating fairly and impartially the reaſons alledged on both Sides. To proceed regularly, I ſhall divide this matter into four heads, which will comprize whatever has been ſaid of moment on this point. Firſt, The Origin of the Wittena-Gemot. Secondly, Who were the Members of this great Council. Thirdly, Their Authority, and the Affairs there debated and concluded. Fourthly, Their Power in Eccleſiaſtical Matters.

I. The ORIGIN of the WITTENA-GEMOT.

I. Opinion that the Wittena-Gemot is owing to the Conceſſion of our Kings.

THERE are who believe, the Wittena-Gemot or Parliament, to be of later date in England than the Royal Power, and to owe its original to the condeſcenſion of the Kings. They pretend, the Sovereign having from time to time, freely ſummoned the chief Men of the Nation, to conſult with them about important Affairs, this at laſt was turned into Cuſtom: That in proceſs of time, the People improving ſome favourable Junctures, claimed, as their Privilege, the right of having a Parliament; though at firſt it depended entirely on the King's Pleaſure, whether he would conſult it or not. The main reaſon they ground their Aſſertion upon, is, that till Edward the Confeſſor, England was hardly ever, or but for a little while, united into one State. During the Heptarchy, it was divided into ſeveral Kingdoms, which made ſo many diſtinct States. Of theſe Kingdoms, Egbert united but four, whilſt the other three remained ſeparate. Afterwards, the Danes became Maſters of Northumberland, Mercia, and Eaſt-Anglia, and ſhared the Lands among them. So that from the Saxon Conqueſt to the ſecond Daniſh Invaſion, we do not find England was united into one Body, but during the ſhort Reigns of Edwy, Edgar, and Edward the Martyr. However, the Government did not long continue in this poſture. The Danes renewing their ravages in the Reign of Ethelred II, England was quickly divided into two Parts, whereof one was ſubject to the Danes, the other to the Engliſh. It is true indeed, after the Death of Edmund Ironſide, the Kingdom was re-united under Canute the Great; but this Union ended with his Reign, and the Kingdom was once more divided amongſt his Sons. In a word, it is maintained that England was never thoroughly united into one Kingdom till the time of Edward the Confeſſor. It is moreover pretended to be ſhewn, from the ſeveral ſorts of Laws, namely, the Weſt-Saxon, Mercian, and Daniſh, that this Heptarchial Government is all a Chimæra, and conſequently the preſent Parliament cannot take its riſe from an Aſſembly-General of all England, which never had a being during the dominion of the Saxon Kings.

To this it is anſwered, they who talk thus confound two things which ought carefully to be diſtinguiſhed, namely, the Wittena-Gemot or particular Parliament of each of the Kingdoms of the Heptarchy, and that of the ſeven Kingdoms together, as making but one Body and one State. Though this laſt never exiſted, yet might the preſent Parliament derive its Original from the other. On ſuppoſition that each Kingdom had its own Wittena-Gemot, thoſe of Suſſex and Weſſex became one, when theſe two Kingdoms were united under Ina. Afterwards, when Egbert annexed to his own Kingdom thoſe of Kent and Eſſex, the four Kingdoms of Weſſex, Suſſex, Kent and Eſſex, made but one State, and conſequently had but one Parliament. In proportion as this Kingdom was enlarged by the Conqueſts of Alfred the Great, Edward and Athelſtan, the Wittena-Gemot increaſed in its Members, and at length compriſed all England in the Reigns of Edwy, Edgar, and Edward the Martyr. Indeed, in the Reign of Ethelred II, the Wars with the Danes broke in upon this Regulation, and England was divided into two Parts. But under Canute the Great the Kingdom was once more united, and conſequently there was but one and the ſame Wittena-Gemot, which was again divided into two, though but for a ſhort ſpace, under Harold and Hardicanute. In fine, after Harold, by the intereſt of Earl Goodwin, was put in poſſeſſion of the Kingdom of Weſſex, there was but one Wittena-Gemot in all England, till the Norman Conqueſt.

Proofs for a Wittena-Gemot in each Kingdom.

To prove therefore that the preſent Parliament derives not its Origin from the Wittena-Gemot of the Saxons, either the time muſt be aſſigned when Parliaments firſt began after the Conqueſt, or it muſt be denied, there was ever any ſuch thing as a Wittena-Gemot in each of the ſeven Kingdoms of the Heptarchy. The former of theſe is hardly poſſible, unleſs bare Conjectures are allowed inſtead of ſolid Arguments. As for the latter, the Aſſertors of the antiquity of Parliaments produce, againſt ſuch as deny the being of the Saxon Wittena-Gemot, ſeveral proofs which they look upon as demonſtrative. The firſt is taken from the Title of the Laws of Ina King of Weſſex, wherein are theſe Words: I Ina, by the Grace of God, King of the Weſt-Saxons, with the Advice of Cenred, my Father, Hedda, my Biſhop, with all my Ealdormen, Seniors, and wiſe Men of my Nation, willing to eſtabliſh good order in the State, have ordained, &c. Hence it is plain, that Ina in making his Laws had the advice of the Aſſembly-General of Weſſex. That the ſame method was eſtabliſhed in Mercia, is ſhewn from Bertulph's Charter to the Abbey of Croyland, wherein are theſe Words, with the unanimous Conſent of the preſent Council aſſembled at Kingsbury, to debate on the Affairs of the Nation.

In this Charter, after the Biſhops and Lords had ſet their Hands, the King ſubſcribed in this Manner: I Bertulph, in the Preſence of all the Biſhops and great Men of my Kingdom. This is a clear Evidence that the Charter was granted in the Aſſembly-General or Wittena-Gemot of Mercia. The ſame might be ſhewn, with regard to each of the other Kingdoms; but, ſay they, the Caſe is ſo evident, as not to admit of diſpute.

The Proofs of a general Wittena-Gemot of the ſeven Kingdoms.

They pretend likewiſe to prove, there was a general Wittena-Gemot of the ſeven Kingdoms, from the very name of Heptarchy, which implies that the ſeven Kingdoms had ſomething in common, and conſequently, there was an Aſſembly, where their common Affairs were conſidered. For inſtance, how could the Monarchs or Generals for the ſeven Kingdoms be elected, if there was not an Aſſembly for that purpoſe? Moreover, they pretend to have more direct proofs, of the holding from time to time ſuch Aſſemblies for the common affairs of the ſeven Kingdoms. Several Hiſtorians aſſure us, there was a general Aſſembly held in Glouceſterſhire, where Ina King of Weſſex was choſen Monarch of the Anglo-Saxons, by the Intereſt of Sebba King of Eſſex, who was preſent with all the other Kings. They produce alſo from Ingulphus, Witglaph King of Mercia's Charter, where are theſe Words: In the preſence of Egbert King of the Weſt-Saxons, of Ethelwulph his Son, and of the Biſhops and great Lords of England, aſſembled at London. Hence it is plain, this Aſſembly convened at London, and compoſed of all the Biſhops and great Men of England, was a general Wittena-Gemot of the Nation.

The Anſwer to the Objection from the Diverſity of the Laws.

In anſwer to the objection taken from the diverſity of the Laws then in England, it is ſaid, It is not at all ſtrange, that Mercia and Weſſex, being two diſtinct States, ſhould have different Laws; much leſs, that the Danes ſhould eſtabliſh their own Laws in their Conqueſts (1). But it is maintained, it cannot be reaſonably inferred, from this Diverſity, that there was no ſuch thing as a Wittena-Gemot in each Kingdom, or a general one for all the Seven. This Inference would be as abſurd, as if a Man, from the different Laws and Cuſtoms in the United Provinces of the Low-Countries, ſhould conclude there was neither a Convention of the States in each Province, nor an Aſſembly of the States-General.

(1) See Note in the Reign of Canute the Great concerning this threefold Diſtinction of the Laws.

To

To ſtrengthen all theſe Proofs, moreover is urged the Conformity in this reſpect between England and the other European Kingdoms. The Saxons had the like Aſſemblies in Germany; the Oſtrogoths, and after them, the Lombards in Italy: The Francs had their Fields of Mars or of May (1), their Sanes, their Parliaments, and the Spaniards their Cortez.

This Conformity plainly ſhews, there was no other form of Government then in Europe. It is further added, that to deny with any foundation theſe Aſſemblies to be as ancient as kingly Power, it muſt be ſhown who are the Sovereigns that firſt eſtabliſhed them in each Kingdom. But how came it to paſs, that all the Kings in Europe ſhould agree together at the ſame time, to become ſo very gracious and condeſcending to their Subjects? There is doubtleſs more reaſon to ſuppoſe they would have all joined in aboliſhing, rather than in granting a Privilege of this Nature.

II. The Conſtituent Parts or Members of the Wittena-Gemot.

ALL agree, the greater Nobility were Members of the Wittena-Gemot. By the greater Nobility I mean the Ealdormen and Thanes of the firſt Rank, afterwards ſtiled Earls and Barons. But the difficulty is to know, whether the Thanes of the ſecond and third Claſs, and the Ceorles, of whom the Houſe of Commons at preſent conſiſts, had a Right to ſit there by their Repreſentatives or not. Tho' this Inquiry ſeems to be of little moment, at a time when the Commons inconteſtably enjoy this Privilege, yet it is not entirely needleſs to know, whether they uſurp'd it; whether it was given them by the conceſſion of the Kings; or whether it is of the ſame ſtanding with the Monarchy. How undeniable ſoever the Right of the Commons may be at preſent, there are ſome who are perſuaded 'twould be of dangerous conſequence to ackowledge it to flow from the Condeſcenſion of the Sovereigns, leſt the ſame Power that is ſuppoſed to have granted it, ſhould think of revoking it when a favourable opportunity offered (2). And indeed this is the true motive of all the attempts to prove, the Commons have not been all along in poſſeſſion of this Privilege. 'Tis but too apparent, this queſtion has been ſtarted only to gratify ſuch of the Kings as have endeavoured to ſtretch the Royal Prerogative beyond its due bounds.

Firſt Argument againſt the Commons.

Be this as it will, they who maintain the Commons had no right to ſit in the Wittena-Gemot, in the time of the Saxon Kings, alledge for their firſt reaſon, that the under Thanes and Ceorles were not Proprietors of Land. From whence they infer, it would have been of no uſe to the Commons to have a place in theſe Aſſemblies, whoſe ſole Buſineſs was to regulate the Affairs of a Country which properly belonged to the King and the Nobility. They add, 'tis incredible that the Nobles of the firſt rank, ſhould agree to make their Vaſſals their Companions: That ſince in the diſtribution of their Lands they were at liberty to give them on what Conditions they pleaſed, 'tis not at all probable they ſhould place the Tenants in the ſame Rank with the Lords. To render this opinion more probable, they ſay further, it is not to be imagined, that in thoſe days the People were upon the ſame foot as at preſent; that although they were free, their Freedom was confin'd within narrow bounds; that the Superiority of the Nobles over them was vaſtly greater than at this day, and for that reaſon the People were little regarded: They ſerved in the Wars for foot Soldiers, who were looked upon as Servants. Accordingly they had the name of Knechten [that is, Servants] given them.

Anſwer to the firſt Argument.

To this the Aſſertors of the Rights of the Commons reply, That ſince the Nobles, who held their Lands of the King, had a right to a place in the Wittena-Gemot, the Commons, who held their Lands of the Nobles, might very well have the ſame Privilege too. The reaſon alledged in the Objection not holding good againſt the Lords, ought not to be of more force againſt the Commons. They add, that the main Buſineſs of the general Council was the making Laws as well for the People as for the Nobility; the ſettling the Rights of the Subjects; the preſerving Peace in the State; and the raiſing Taxes, whereof the People paid the largeſt ſhare. Hence they infer, it was very natural, and extremely conſonant to the Cuſtom of the Saxons, that the People ſhould give their conſent to all thoſe things that concerned them no leſs than the Nobles. In a word, they ſay, if the People aſſiſted not at the Debates of the great Council, 'tis not to be conceived whence ſhould proceed the great care of ſecuring their Rights and Liberties, and preventing their being oppreſſed by the Great. 'Tis well known that Men, eſpecially the Great, are not wont to labour ſo heartily to leſſen their Power, but rather endeavour to increaſe their Authority as much as poſſible.

But as this point, being a matter of Fact and not of Right, can't be decided by bare Reaſonings, both Parties endeavour to ſupport their Opinions with more ſuitable Proofs, namely, Authorities. To this end, each Side lays great ſtreſs upon certain Terms in the Charters of the Anglo-Saxon Kings, and upon certain Expreſſions in the Hiſtorians who ſpeak of the Government of thoſe days. 'Twill be neceſſary therefore to produce ſome of theſe Proofs, for the Reader's better underſtanding the Queſtion, and to enable him the better to judge of the Reaſons alledged on both Sides. I ſhall begin with what is urged againſt the Commons, or their Repreſentatives, being Members of the General Aſſembly.

In the firſt place it is ſaid, the very name of Wittena-Gemot plainly implies, that the great Council conſiſted only of ſuch as were ſtiled Witten. Now 'tis pretended, the preciſe meaning of that Word is Majores Natu, Seniores, Ealdormen, by which are underſtood only the Earls and Barons, or in the Language of the Saxons, the Ealdormen and King's Thanes, Spiritual and Temporal. To make this appear, a Paſſage is cited out of Bede's Eccleſiaſtical Hiſtory as tranſlated by King Alfred. Bede ſays, King Oſwald applied to the Majores Natu of Scotland for a Biſhop; and Alfred has rendered the Terms, Majores Natu by Ealdormen. The ſame Hiſtorian ſaying in the ſame place, that Oſwald made uſe of Suis Ducibus & Miniſtris for Interpreters, Alfred has tranſlated theſe Words by, his Ealdormen and Thanes. Hence it is inferred, that the Term Wittan is to be underſtood only of Ealdormen and Barons, or in general, of the chief Men of the Nation. And accordingly it is concluded, the Wittena-Gemot, or Aſſembly of wiſe Men, conſiſted only of ſuch. This Explanation of the Word Wittan is farther confirmed, by the Hiſtorians rendering it in Latin by Principes, Optimates, Proceres, Magnates, Duces, Comites, Præpoſiti, Miniſtri Regis, Nobiles, Milites, which can by no means be underſtood of the People, or their Repreſentatives.

Bede, l. 3. c. 3.

Anſwer to this Proof.

They who are of the contrary Opinion, alledge, in their turn, the ſame Authorities to prove the greater Nobility were not alone ſummoned to the national Council. They pretend, theſe very Expreſſions, on which their Adverſaries ground their Opinion, are not to be ſo reſtrained to the Nobility, as to be unapplicable to the Magiſtrates and chief Men among the People. To prove what they advance, they cite numberleſs Paſſages from the Latin Authors, where the Words Principes, Nobiles, Milites, are to be taken in that Senſe.

Reply of the Firſt.

To this the others reply, the Word People may be underſtood in two different Senſes; firſt, as it ſignifies a Nation in general, in which ſenſe they own that by Magnates, Proceres, Nobiles, &c. may be meant the chief Men of the People, or of the whole Nation. The other ſenſe of the Word People is more reſtrained, and ſignifies only a part of the People, as ſeparate or different from the Nobility, as when one ſays, the Nobles and People. This is the meaning in queſtion, to which it ſhall be proved that the cited Paſſage can be applied. Now this is what they think impoſſible, affirming, there is no ſuch thing to be met with in the Latin Authors, as Optimates Plebis, but always Populi, that is, of the People in general. But ſuppoſing it were true, that the Expreſſions did ſometimes denote the chief Men among the People, as diſtinguiſhed from the Nobles, it would ſtill remain to prove, that, in the alledged Paſſages, the Word People muſt be taken in that Senſe, unleſs the very thing in diſpute be ſuppoſed.

But to this the Aſſertors of the Rights of the Commons anſwer, They readily agree theſe Expreſſions are principally to be underſtood of Noble Perſons; but affirm withal, their meaning is not to be confined to the Nobles of the firſt rank. They ſay, that although in England, the greater Nobility, or Peers of the Realm, are a diſtinct Order from the leſſer, who are rank'd with the Commons, it does not follow that the Latin Terms are to be explained by a diſtinction no where elſe to be found. For inſtance, in France, the loweſt Gentilhomme belongs as much to the Nobility, as to the higheſt Lord; the greater and leſſer Nobility making but one and the ſame Body.

Remark on the foregoing Proofs.

It is a ſad thing to ſee an Inquiry of this Nature reduced to a Grammatical Diſpute. But ſince I have undertaken to relate the Arguments of both Sides, I thought my ſelf obliged not to paſs over in ſilence thoſe taken from the fore-mentioned Terms. However, in what has been ſaid, the one Side ſeems to me plainly to prove that the great Lords had a right to ſit in the Wittena-Gemot, which no body ever denied. But I can't ſay it neceſſarily follows from what they alledge, that the Commons were excluded, which is the point in queſtion. On the other hand, what is urged on the other ſide tends rather to ſhow, that the Reaſons for the Excluſion of the Commons are not ſatisfactory, than to prove directly, they had a Place in the Wittena-Gemot. Let us therefore proceed to another ſort of Arguments, alledg'd in favour of the Commons.

Another Argument for the Commons.

The firſt is taken from Henry of Huntingdon the Hiſtorian, who, ſpeaking of the depoſing of Sigebert King of Weſſex, expreſſes himſelf thus: King Sigebert growing incorrigible, the great Men and People of Weſſex aſſembled together in the beginning of the ſecond Year of his Reign, and depos'd him with unanimous Conſent. In this Paſſage it is pretended, the People being put in oppoſition to the great Men, can mean only the Commons, and conſequently they gave their Votes in the General Aſſembly.

This Explanation is ſupported by a Paſſage of another Hiſtorian, who ſays: In the Reign of Edward the Elder, were aſſembled the Biſhops, Abbots, the faithful Subjects or Vaſſals, the great Men and the People, in the Kingdom of Weſſex. It is maintained, that by the Fideles, or faithful Subjects, which may be explained by Vaſſals or Liege-Men, are to be underſtood the People, as diſtinct from the Nobles, ſince in this place the Fideles and the People are diſtinguiſhed from the great Men.

To theſe Authorities they add another from Ethelwulph's Charter of Tythes, where it is ſaid, Theſe things were granted by the King, Barons, and People.

Theſe Proofs are confirmed by two Charters; the firſt whereof is King Ethelred's, in favour of the Abbey of Wolverhampton, which concludes with theſe Words: Theſe are the Decrees of Sigeric Archbiſhop of Canterbury, in the Court held before King Ethelred, the Archbiſhop of York, the Biſhops, Abbots, Senators, the Chiefs and People of the whole Country.

The other granted by Edward the Confeſſor to the Abbot of Weſtminſter, runs thus: I have ordered therefore this Charter of my Donation to be read on the day of the Dedication of the ſaid Church, in the preſence of the Biſhops, Abbots, Earls and great Men of England, and in the Sight and Hearing of all the People.

Anſwer againſt the Commons.

But the Oppoſers of the Commons pretend to invalidate the force of all the Arguments drawn from Paſſages of Hiſtorians and Charters ſeveral ways. In the firſt place, they obſerve, the greateſt part of theſe Hiſtorians lived when the Commons ſat in Parliament, and therefore it is no wonder when they ſpeak of the Anglo-Saxon Affairs, they ſhould repreſent things as they were in their own Times. In the ſecond place, they ſay, nothing can be inferred from any Expreſſions in theſe Charters, becauſe they were not originally writ in Latin, but in Saxon. Conſequently, the Latin Quotations from thence are only Tranſlations, the faithfulneſs whereof cannot be judged of, without confronting them with the Originals, which is impoſſible, ſeeing they are all loſt. For inſtance, it is certain, the Saxons never made uſe of the term Baron, which was brought in by the Normans, and yet we find it in one of the above-mentioned Charters. In the third place, they ſay, ſome of the Paſſages alledged do but ſhow at moſt, that the Reſolutions of the Wittena-Gemot were taken in the ſight of the People, who perhaps expreſſed their ſatisfaction by Shouts and Acclamations. But they maintain this to be no proof of the People's giving their Votes, or that their Conſent was neceſſary, ſince they were preſent only as Witneſſes. This manifeſtly appears, ſay they, in the forementioned Charter of Ethelwulph, which runs thus: There were preſent the Archbiſhops and Biſhops of England, Buthred King of Mercia, Edmund King of Eaſt-Anglia, and of Abbots, Abbeſſes, Dukes, Earls, and great Men of the whole Kingdom, and other faithful Subjects, a great Multitude, who all approved of this royal Act, to which the dignified Perſons ſubſcribed their Names. It is pretended, ſince the great Men only ſigned the Charter, their approbation alone was neceſſary. Beſides, what can be the meaning of a great Multitude of faithful Subjects? Was it the whole Body of the People? This they won't ſay, who maintain that the Commons ſat in the Wittena-Gemot by their Repreſentatives, as they do at this day. And indeed, this great Multitude cannot well be applied to a very limited number of Repreſentatives, but may very aptly be uſed to denote Crowds of People, got together to make Acclamations. In fine, it is obſerved, that in all the forecited Paſſages, a forced meaning is given to the Term, Fideles, to make it ſignify the Repreſentatives of the Commons, ſince that Word is applicable to all Subjects in general, as well to the Body of the Nobles as of the People.

Another Argument for the Commons.

To come therefore to more direct Proofs, the favourers of the Commons alledge other Paſſages, where they pretend the meaning of theſe Terms is fixed to the Repreſentatives of the People, by the Word Procuratores. In a Charter (1) dated 811, it is ſaid, Cenulph King of Mercia aſſembled, for the Dedication of the Monaſtery of Winchelcomb, the great Men of the Kingdom, the Biſhops, Procurators, &c.

Anſwer.

To this it is anſwered, That the dedication of a Church and Monaſtery was the only Buſineſs in hand, for which purpoſe Cenulph had aſſembled a multitude of People, and particularly ſuch as were diſtinguiſhed by their Birth or Offices. But ſuppoſing it to have been a real Wittena-Gemot, the Term, Procuratores, is too undeterminate to denote the Repreſentatives of the Commons, unleſs it be joined with ſome other Word that fixes its ſignification.

Reply for the Commons.

To refute this Objection, a Charter is produced by the other Side, where they maintain, The Term Procuratores, muſt be underſtood of the Repreſentatives of the People. This Charter, granted by King Athelſtan (2), concludes thus: Granted at the Royal Vill Ætwelope, in the Preſence of the Biſhops, Abbots, Dukes, Earls, and Patriæ Procuratoribus. Now, ſay they, who can theſe Patriæ Procuratores be, but the Repreſentatives of the People? But they who are of the contrary Opinion, ſay, this is only a bare conjecture, which can be of no force, unleſs this Expreſſion be ſhown to be common at that time.

The Anſwer.

The laſt Argument for the Commons.

Laſtly, a Proof is alledged in Favour of the Commons, that ſeems to be ſtronger than any of the former. It is ſaid, there are now ſeveral Hamlets (3), that ſend Repreſentatives to Parliament, which Right muſt have been received in the time of the Saxon Kings, when they were conſiderable Cities or Burroughs. Indeed, it is very improbable this Privilege ſhould be granted them after they made ſo deſpicable a figure in the Kingdom.

The Anſwer.

To evade this Argument, it is replied, It cannot take place, unleſs it be proved that theſe Burroughs, now become Hamlets, were gone to decay before the Conqueſt. They add, that even this would not be ſufficient, becauſe very poſſibly they might have been rebuilt and deſtroyed again during the Civil Wars England was ſo often troubled with, after the Commons were in poſſeſſion of the right of ſending Repreſentatives to Parliament.

To all theſe Arguments alledged in behalf of the Commons, it is added as a favourable Precedent, that in all the other States in Europe, the People were ſummoned to the General Aſſemblies. Though hitherto I have only related the Reaſons of both Parties, I can't help remarking upon this laſt, that it is groundleſsly alledged, without pretending however thereby to weaken the reſt. And this I ſhall plainly ſhow, at leaſt with regard to France, by the Authority of three Writers, who are looked upon as thoroughly verſed in the cuſtoms of that Kingdom.

Mezerai Abſtract, &c. of the Cuſtoms of the VIIIth Century.

The firſt is Mezerai, who diſcourſing of this Subject, ſays, "I meet with three ſorts of Aſſemblies in thoſe "Days; the General Courts of the Provinces; the Champs "de Mai, at which were preſent the Seniores and Ma- "jores Natu of the People, where military Affairs were "chiefly debated; and the Conventus, Colloquia, Par- "liaments, where the Biſhops, Abbots, and other great "Men met to make Laws, and regulate matters relating "to the adminiſtration of Juſtice, the Civil Government, "and the Publick Revenues, &c. Theſe two laſt Aſ- "ſemblies were confounded in one." In the Opinion therefore of this Hiſtorian, none but the great Men were Members of the Parliaments. But ſince it may be objected, that by the Seniores and Majores Natu that aſſiſted at the Champs de Mai, are to be underſtood the Repreſentatives of the People, let us ſee what Preſident Fauchet ſays upon this head.

Fauchet's Antiquities of France, l. vi.

This learned Hiſtorian mentions a certain Speech, ſhown him as made by Boniface Archbiſhop of Mentz, where that Prelate told Pepin, that the Gauls, omnium Ordinum, of all Orders and Degrees, had given him the Crown. "This Speech, ſays the Author, is moſt cer- "tainly ſpurious. Firſt, becauſe the Francs never called "themſelves Gauls. Secondly and principally, becauſe "of the Words omnium Ordinum; for at that time there "was no talk either of Orders or Degrees, none but "Biſhops, Abbots, Earls, Nobles having a place in the "Sanes, General Courts, or Parliaments, and the Earls, "Commiſſioners or Church-advocates, to report the Com- "plaints of the People of their reſpective Territories."

Paſquier, Recherches, &c. l. 2. c. 7.

Paſquier, the third Writer, whoſe Authority I would alledge, expreſſes himſelf ſtill more plainly and fully in this matter. His Words are: Although ſome, who

" lieve the Aſſembly of the States-General is of a very " long ſtanding, nay found the Liberties of the People
" upon it, yet is neither the one nor the other true.
" I am ſenſible, and ready to own, that formerly in Gaul,
" before the Conqueſt of Julius Cæſar, there were Ge-
" ral Aſſemblies, which were continued by him under " a pretence, familiar to the Romans, of leaving us in " poſſeſſion of our antient Rights and Liberties. But in " all theſe Aſſemblies you'll find none of the common " People, whom they looked upon as ſo many Cyphers.
" In like manner, you'll find, under the firſt and ſecond
" Race of our Kings, ſolemn Conventions, which were " called Parliaments, the principal Sinew of our Mo-
" narchy. But to theſe were ſummoned only the Princes,
" Great Lords, Nobles and Dignified Churchmen. Now
" in our Aſſemblies of the three Eſtates, not only the " common People have a place with the Clergy and No-
" bility, but what is more, make the greateſt and beſt
" Part. Whence it is then that within ſome Centuries
" of Years the Commons have had a Right to ſit in our " Conventions, where are debated the Affairs relating to " the good of the Nation in general: This is what I
" ſhall account for." Then he ſhows the Reaſons of the Common People, or Third Eſtate, being firſt called to the Parliaments, and fixes the Original of it to the time of Philip le Bel, who began his Reign in 1286. Theſe are the Teſtimonies of three very judicious Writers, thoroughly vers'd in the Hiſtory of France. So far therefore is the antient practice of France from being a proof of the Antiquity of the right of the Commons of England, that it rather ſerves to weaken the ſame.

Remarks on this Diſpute.

After ſeeing the Arguments made uſe of For and Againſt the Antiquity of the Commons Right to ſit in Parliament, it is doubtleſs very ſurprizing that both Sides ſhould be forc'd to diſpute upon bare Conjectures, and the meaning of certain Terms in the Tranſlations of Charters. One would think, in a matter of this nature, each Side ſhould produce more ſubſtantial Arguments. However this be, the Reader may now form his Judgment upon what has been ſaid, wherein I believe nothing material is omitted, of what has been alledged Pro and Con, tho' I have done it very compendiouſly.

Obſervation concerning the Charters.

But as the greateſt part of the Arguments uſed by both Parties, are taken from the Charters of the Anglo-Saxon Kings, I ſhall make one remark, which ought to be conſidered before Judgment is given upon this diſpute. And that is, the Authority of all theſe Charters is queſtioned by ſuch as are moſt verſed in the Engliſh Hiſtory. The reaſon they alledge for it, is, that in the time of the Anglo-Saxons, the uſe of Charters was unknown in England. When the King made a Grant to the Church, or to any private Perſon, he put them in poſſeſſion by the delivery of a Green Turf, Bough, or the like. Formerly, ſays Ingulphus, Poſſeſſion of Lands was given by bare Words without any Charters or other Writings. They only delivered to the Donee or Purchaſer, a Helmet, Sword, Horn, Cup, ſometimes a Spur, Bow, Arrow, &c. From this Cuſtom it is inferred, that the Charters alledged as granted by the Anglo-Saxon Kings, were all forg'd long after their Time. But as it may ſeem ſtrange, there ſhould be now ſo many Charters bearing date before there was any ſuch thing in uſe, a matter of Fact is advanc'd, which, if true, ſhows the reaſon of ſuch numbers being forged. 'Tis affirm'd, William the Conqueror finding great part of the Crown Lands to be alienated, particularly to the Monaſteries, ſummoned the Abbots to appear at his Court, and produce the Titles by which they held their Eſtates. Some, who had nothing to plead but long poſſeſſion, being diſpoſſeſſed, becauſe the King would allow no Title good, but what was in form, great numbers of Monks ſet about forging Charters, to which they gave all the appearance of Truth that was poſſible. In this manner they deceived that Prince, and his Norman Council, who were unacquainted with the Hiſtory, Language, and Cuſtoms of the Saxons. Some produced their Charters in Latin, but theſe were rejected, on account of the Improbability the Saxon Kings ſhould make uſe of a Language, little underſtood, and ſtill much leſs uſed in their Time. But whether this be true or not, 'tis however certain, ſeveral of thoſe Charters, which are by ſome thought authentick, were forg'd, and that long after their date. At leaſt it was very difficult to be convinc'd by good Arguments, that thoſe from whence the Teſtimonies to decide the preſent queſtion are taken, are ſo antient as the time of the Anglo-Saxons.

Hiſtory of Croyland, p. 70.

From what has been ſaid, this appears to be a very intricate Caſe. Neither is there any likelihood of its being ever ſet in a clearer light. Almoſt all the antient Monuments which might ſerve to unfold the Difficulties were buried in the Ruins of the Monaſteries, either before, or after the Norman Conqueſt (1).

(1) As there are no Saxon Monuments older than the Eſtabliſhment of Chriſtianity, and but little Light to be had from thoſe that are after, recourſe muſt be had to Inference from thoſe few Truths that are known, in order to diſcover who were the Members of the Saxon Legiſlature. Now the moſt probable Hypotheſis ſeems to be this. Power reſults from and is the natural Conſequence of Property or Eſtates, and in all Places where Tyranny does not prevail, the Perſons who compoſe the Legiſlature, derive that Power from the Intereſt they have in ſome Lands, or elſe from ſome Diſtinction of Rank and Order, which diſcriminate the Members of a Society. As therefore our Saxon Anceſtors in their own Country, did all perſonally meet for the enacting Laws; ſo after their coming into England all to whom the Land was apportioned perſonally aſſiſted in the Saxon Parliaments, which were held at firſt, during the Heptarchy, in open Places capable of receiving all that had a Right to be there, becauſe there were no Minute Freeholders in thoſe early Days. By the Feudal Law all Land-holders were obliged to attend at the Feudal Courts, and had a Right to give their Aſſent or Diſſent to any Laws or Orders there propoſed: Whence we yet retain the Expreſſion of the Convention of the Eſtates. After the Union of the ſeven Kingdoms, when the Exerciſe of the Legiſlative Power in the Perſon of every Individual became impracticable by reaſon of their Remoteneſs and Number, ſome Change in the outward form was neceſſary in order to preſerve the Commonwealth on the ſame Principles it was at firſt eſtabliſhed; and as the whole Kingdom was divided into ſo many little Republicks or Tythings, ſome Perſon out of every Tything or Burrough came to the Wittena-Gemot, to take care of the Concerns of the Society he belonged to: Theſe were called Witen or Wiſemen, and were no other than the preſiding Judge or Gereſa of every Tything, who was annually choſen, both in the Rural and Town Tythings. As therefore the Earls, Biſhops, and Abbots (who were the preſiding Judges in the Communities both Eccleſiaſtical and Civil, that the People were originally divided into) were undoubtedly Members of the Wittena-Gemot, ſo it is reaſonable to think that the Witan (who were the preſiding Judges in the leſſer Communities that were afterwards made) were ſo too. For it was but natural when every Individual could not appear in Perſon, that the Delegates or Repreſentative of each Community ſhould be the Perſon, to whom they had by their own free Choice given the Precedency amongſt themſelves. Hence it is plain that the Commons or Land-holders were ever a Part of the Legiſlature; becauſe though the Earls perhaps might not be Elective or annual Officers, after the Diſſolution of the Heptarchy, as they were before, yet the Graves of the Tythings, who were Elective, being Members of the Saxon Wittena-Gemot, the Commons remained a conſtituent Part of the Saxon Legiſlature. Hence the Ceorles (who were the ſame as our Farmers, only paying their Rent in Corn, Hay, &c. inſtead of Money) and alſo the Thanes (who had Lands aſſigned them by the King or great Men in recompence for their Service, and in lieu of Wages, and conſequently were no more than Part of the Family of him they had their Lands of) were not Members of the Wittena-Gemot, except ſuch Thanes who held their Lands of the Crown for their Service which related to the Publick. (See p. 150, 151. note 4.) A Wittena-Gemot then was no other than an Aſſembly of all the preſiding Judges of the Nation, Earls, Biſhops and Wites, or the annual Magiſtrates of the Tythings and Burroughs, who repreſented all the Proprietors of Land in their reſpective Tythings. Thus Matters ſtood till the Conqueſt. King William I, having aſſumed the regal State as his own by Right, treated all that had oppoſed him as Rebels, and diſpoſſeſſing them of their Lands, diſtributed them amongſt his own Confederates, who held them of the Crown by a Service of a determined Number of Soldiers, in caſe of an Invaſion or a Rebellion, and they enfeoffed their own immediate Followers with ſome Portions of what was aſſigned to them under reſervation of ſuch Service. Theſe Lands were called Knights Fees, (each Fee was about twenty Pounds a Year then, which is equal to four or five hundred Pounds now.) As the Normans were much inferior to the Engliſh in Numbers, their Buſineſs was to ſecure all the Power they could in their own hands. Accordingly, over moſt of the Tythings was placed a Norman Chief, whoſe Power was to be the ſame as the Saxon Gereſa, with this Difference, that it was to be Hereditary. Theſe Chiefs were called Barons, and their Eſtates Baronies or Honours. The Conqueror to undermine the Power of the Saxon Earls, which he could not ſafely deſtroy, diſmembered the Barons Eſtates in a manner from the Counties, and made them recognize no Superior but the Crown. By which means there was no difference between an Earl and a Baron, but only in Extent, the Power of both (which was exceeding great) being the ſame over their Vaſſals. As for the Burroughs they were left in the ſame Condition as in the Saxon Times, and governed by annual Magiſtrates of their own chuſing. The Conformity then between the Saxon Wittena-Gemot and Norman Parliaments ſtood thus: The Eccleſiaſticks and Earls were the ſame in both; the Burroughs were repreſented in both by one of their own chuſing, who was ſtiled Burgeſs, inſtead of Wite, probably becauſe the Magiſtrate was not always choſen Repreſentative; and as the Saxon Wites or preſiding Judges of the Tythings, were Members of the Legiſlature, ſo were the Norman Chiefs or Barons, with this Difference only, that as the firſt had their Right by Election and for a Time, the others had theirs in Succeſſion. And as the Saxon Wites ſerved for their Tythings, ſo the Barons were intended by Law to ſerve for the Tenants of their Baronies, which is the Reaſon why they were exempted from contributing to the Wages of the Knights of the Shire. Thus every Spot of Land was ſtill repreſented; for as every Part was within ſome Tything in the Saxon Time, ſo in the Norman every Part of the whole Kingdom was within ſome Barony or ſome Burrough. Things continued upon this ſolid Foundation during the Reigns of William Rufus and Henry I. But the Barons, who were ſo many petty Princes, being divided in the Civil War betwixt Stephen, Maud and Henry II, each Party treated thoſe of the other Side as Rebels, which brought the Poſſeſſion of much Land to the contending Parties. And as each Side had experienced the Power of the Barons over their Vaſſals, and having beſides many Friends to remunerate, they ſplit the Baronies into ſmaller Tenancies in Chief, who all held immediately of the Crown. Hence aroſe the Diſtinction of Fees of the old Feoffments and Fees of the New, and alſo of the greater and leſſer Barons. By granting thus ſmall Fees in the Reigns of Stephen, Henry II, and King John, Tenants in Capite or Barons, were ſo multiplied, that a very unequal Repreſentation of the Kingdom aroſe, theſe leſſer Barons having an equal Share in the Legiſlature with the moſt Potent. This Grievance being grown to the greateſt Height, when King John was reduced to Reaſon, there was a Clauſe inſerted in his Magna Charta, whereby all the greater Barons were to be ſeverally ſummoned to Parliament, and the leſſer in general, by which means theſe laſt were excluded from ſitting in Parliament ſingly and in Perſon; but however the being ſummoned in General, gave them a Right to do this as a Community, and by Repreſentation; and as theſe leſſer Barons were co-ordinate in Rank, the Right of repreſenting them naturally devolved on ſuch of their Body as the reſt conferred it on. The Perſons ſo choſen, were called from the Tenure of their Lands, and from their repreſenting the reſpective Counties for which they ſerved, Knights of the Shire. Theſe were to be choſen at the County Courts, where none but the immediate Tenants of the Crown (the leſſer Barons) came, and none other had Votes till by the eighth of Henry VI, all Free-holders of forty Shillings per Annum had a Right to Vote at the Election of Knight of the Shire. Thus we find both before and after the Conqueſt all Proprietors of Land had a Share in the Legiſlature. The Reader may ſee theſe Things more at large in St. Amand's Eſſay on the Legiſlative Power, &c.

III. The Authority of the WITTENA-GEMOT, and the Affairs there debated.

THERE is no treating this Subject with any clearneſs, without examining three Queſtions, which are as warmly controverted as the former.

I. In whom was lodged the Legiſlative Power? Whether in the King, in the great Council, or in both together?

II. Whether the King had a Power to tax the People without the Conſent of the Wittena-Gemot?

III. Whether the General Aſſembly had a Right to elect and depoſe the Kings?

I. In whom was lodged the Legiſlative Power.

They who moſt ſtretch the Prerogative Royal, pretend, the Legiſlative Power was wholly lodg'd in the King. In proof whereof, they urge the Terms made uſe of by the Saxon Kings in their Laws, by which they ſeem to declare themſelves the ſole Enactors, without giving room to believe the General Aſſembly had any hand in the matter. To this it is anſwered, Though there is no mention in theſe Laws of the Conſent of the great Council, it does not follow, that their Concurrence was not neceſſary; no more than it can be inferred at this day from our ſaying the Statutes of King Charles I, or of King Charles II, that theſe Statutes were enacted without the Conſent and Authority of Parliament. If we were literally to underſtand all the Expreſſions uſed in ſpeaking of, and to the King, we ſhould doubtleſs aſcribe greater Power to him than he is actually inveſted with. But to give more direct Proofs, that the Authority of the Wittena-Gemot was neceſſary in making new Laws, ſeveral Teſtimonies are produced, ſhewing that the Kings acted nothing in this reſpect without the Conſent of the Eſtates. Among the many that are alledged, I ſhall only chuſe a few, and inſert the ſubſtance of them.

In the title of the Weſt-Saxon Laws publiſhed by King Ina, it is ſaid, They were made with the Advice and Conſent of the Biſhops, Great Men, Earls, Wiſe-men, Seniors, and People of the whole Kingdom.

Egbert ſays in one of his Charters; I Egbert, King of the Weſt-Saxons, with the Permiſſion and Conſent (1) of our whle Nation, and unanimous Advice of all the Great Men, &c.

But ſeeing it may be objected, that this is a Charter and not a Law, the teſtimony of King Alfred is alledged, who, in the Title of his Laws, ſpeaking as if he acted by his ſole Authority, concludes with theſe Words; I Alfred, King of the Weſt Saxons, ſhewed theſe Laws to my Wiſe-men, and They ſaid, they all lik'd, or, were pleas'd, they ſhould be obſerved.

At the end of Athelſtan's Laws we have theſe Words: All theſe things were confirmed and ordained by a General-Aſſembly, or Synod, held at Graetly, at which was preſent Archbiſhop Elfin, with all the great Men King Athelſtan could aſſemble.

The Title of ſome other Laws made by this King runs in this manner: Theſe are the Laws that were inſtituted by the Wiſe-men at Exeter.

Much the ſame Expreſſion is prefixed before the Laws of Edgar, and Ethelred II.

In a Charter of Canute the Great, we have theſe Words: I Canute, King of the whole Iſland of Albion, and many other Nations, by the Advice and Decree of the Archbiſhops, Biſhops, Abbots, Earls, and all my other faithful Subjects, have ordain'd, &c. This Authority is of the greater force, as Canute, aſcending the Throne by right of Conqueſt, would not probably have ſought the Concurrence of the Eſtates, had he not found it cuſtomary ſo to do.

In a word, it is pretended, if ſome of the Kings expreſs themſelves in ſuch a manner, as would induce one to believe they acted by their ſole Authority in the Promulgation of the Laws, their Words are not to be taken in the literal Senſe. The reaſon is, theſe Expreſſion are explained and limited by thoſe of ſome other Kings, who own'd, they acted in concert with the Wittena-Gemot. Now there is no likelihood, Sovereign Princes would ever acknowledge their Power to be limited, if it was not ſo in reality. If any one will inſiſt upon this ſort of Expreſſions, which ſeem to imply that the Kings make Laws without the Conſent and Approbation of Parliament, it may by the ſame method be proved, that the King at this very day is inveſted with an abſolute Power in this reſpect. And indeed, in ſome certain Acts, which are preſented to him by the Parliament, he ſays, that he wills and requires, though it is well known, his Will would be of no force, unleſs preceded by the Conſent of the two Houſes.

II. Raiſing Taxes.

The ſame Reaſonings and Reflections occur with regard to the ſecond Queſtion, or the Impoſition of Taxes. If the Saxon Kings ſeem in ſome Paſſages to levy Taxes by their own Authority, we are to underſtand it was not till after the previous Conſent of the Eſtates, as we find upon other Occaſions.

I ſhall not inſiſt here on the third Queſtion, concerning the electing and depoſing of the Kings, becauſe I intend to treat of theſe Points under the Article of the Succeſſion.

IV. The Authority of the WITTENA-GEMOT in Eccleſiaſtical Matters.

BEFORE the Anglo-Saxons embraced the Chriſtian Religion, one of their fundamental Maxims (aſcribed alſo by Tacitus to the antient Germans) was, that all important Affairs relating to the whole Nation, were brought to the General-Aſſembly, where they were debated in common, that they might be ſettled with the unanimous conſent of all that had a Right to vote. 'Tis no wonder therefore that Religious Affairs were regulated in the Wittena-Gemots, as I have elſewhere obſerved, ſince they are of the greateſt importance to Mankind. Accordingly, Edwin King of Northumberland, being deſirous, after his Converſion, to eſtabliſh the Chriſtian Religion in his Dominions, did not undertake it till he had conſulted his Wiſe-men, that is, his Wittena-Gemot, as Bede relates it. The Maxim, that no Laws are binding but what the whole Nation has conſented to, has all along been looked upon in England as the Foundation of Liberty, and the Baſis of Government.

Eccleſiaſtical Affairs may be ranked in two Claſſes. Firſt, ſuch as relate to the Clergy alone, as making a diſtinct Body from the Laity. Theſe were left, as they now are, to the ſole management of the Eccleſiaſticks, who held their Councils or Synods, where the Laity had nothing to do. Secondly, ſuch as concerned the Body of the People, as Chriſtians. Theſe were regulated in the mixt Councils, conſiſting of the chief Men of the Clergy and the Nobility. Herein, the Rules of Equity were perfectly followed. It was not thought juſt to enact civil Laws, that were obligatory to the Clergy as Members of the State, without their concurrence. On the other hand, it was deemed unreaſonable, that the Clergy ſhould have a power of making Eccleſiaſtical Laws that were binding to the Laity, as Chriſtians, without the Conſent of the Wittena-Gemot, or Repreſentative of the Nation. Thus, in both theſe reſpects, the ſame Principles were followed, namely, that no Man was bound by any Laws, to which he had not given his Conſent, either by himſelf or his Repreſentative. Hence it is, that the Wittena-Gemots were for the moſt part mixt Aſſemblies, where all important Affairs, as well Eccleſiaſtical as Civil, were treated, and that theſe Aſſemblies had no leſs Authority in Spirituals than in Temporals.

Wittena-Gemot was a mixt Aſſembly.

Proofs of it.

To be convinc'd of this, we need only caſt an eye on the Laws of the Anglo-Saxons, where we find a perpetual mixture of Eccleſiaſtical and Civil Matters. I ſhall produce a few inſtances, which ſeem to be inconteſtable. In the Year 673, a Council was convened, where Theodore Archbiſhop of Canterbury preſided, and ten Canons of the aneient general Councils were aſſented to, as hath been related in the Hiſtory of the Church of that time. But this Aſſembly was not purely an Eccleſiaſtical Synod; for beſides the Biſhops, all the Kings and great Men of England were preſent, as an Hiſtorian relates it. And therefore 'twas a mixt Council, a mycel Synod, a real Wittena-Gemot. We muſt take care not to be led into error by the Words Council or Synod, which at preſent denote an Aſſembly of Eccleſiaſticks; whereas in the time of the Anglo-Saxons, theſe Terms were not underſtood in ſo limited a Senſe, but ſerved to expreſs all ſorts of great Aſſemblies. Whoever carefully examines the nature of theſe antient Aſſemblies, which by Hiſtorians are called Councils, he will find, they were mixt Conventions; ſince they were ſubſcribed, approved, and aſſented to, by the Kings, Princes, and great Men there preſent. In the reign of Edward the Elder, an Aſſembly was held, where the Articles of a Treaty were ſettled between that Prince and Guthurm, to whom Alfred had given Eaſt-Anglia, a State Affair, if ever there was any. And yet, in this very Aſſembly were enacted ſeveral Eccleſiaſtical Laws, which in the Preamble are called Senatus Conſulta, becauſe made by the Witan, that is, by the great Men of Weſſex and Eaſt-Anglia. Among theſe Laws, beſides ſeveral that were purely political, there are ſome with theſe titles, Of Apoſtates, Of the Puniſhment of ſuch as are in Orders, Of Inceſts, Of Faſts, &c. From whence it is manifeſt, theſe Political Aſſemblies made Laws concerning Religion. An Hiſtorian ſays, King Athelſtan convened a Council, in which many Laws both Eccleſiaſtical and Civil were enacted: Conſequently this was not an Aſſembly of Churchmen, ſince it was never pretended, the Clergy had a power to make Secular Laws.

The Wittena-Gemot often elected Biſhops.

But this is not all. It is ſhewn by ſeveral inſtances, that the Wittena-Gemot elected and deprived the Biſhops. Wilfrid Biſhop of York, whom I have had frequent occaſion to mention, was elected by the two Kings of Northumberland, and the General Council of that Kingdom, as the Author of his Life relates. Erkenwald Biſhop of London was elected with the Conſent of King Sebba and the Advice of all the People. Wulſtan was made Biſhop of Worceſter in Curiâ, that is, in the great Aſſembly, which was called the Court, or the King's Court. Ingulphus, Abbot of Croyland ſpeaks in this manner of the Elections of the Biſhops and Abbots: For many Years, there was no Election abſolutely free and canonical: But all Eccleſiaſtical Dignities were conferred by the King's Court, according to their good pleaſure (1).

Eddius vit. Wilf. c. 11. p. 46.

And deprived them alſo.

As the Wittena-Gemot was concerned in the Election, ſo was it alſo in the Deprivation of Biſhops. Of which I ſhall give the following inſtances. Brithelm, Biſhop of Dorcheſter, being promoted to the See of Canterbury, Edgar, who had a mind Dunſtan ſhould be Archbiſhop, cauſed Brithelm to be ſent back to his former Biſhoprick. How this was done we are informed by Osbern the Monk, who wrote the Life of Dunſtan: Within a few days after Brithelm was made Archbiſhop, not thinking himſelf fit for ſo great a Charge, he departed to the Church he had lately left, by the Command of the King and People. Another Hiſtorian relates this matter in the manner following: Edgar made Brithelm deſcend the ſame way he was raiſed: For a Council being convened for this very purpoſe, he objected ſeveral Articles again Brithelm, and by the Order and Conſent of his Barons, ſent him back to the Cure of his former Church of Dorcheſter. Brithelm therefore was both elected and deprived by the Authority of the Wittena-Gemot. In the Reign of Edward the Confeſſor, Robert Archbiſhop of Canterbury was removed from his See by a Degree of the Wittena-Gemot, and Stigand being elected in his place, the papal power could neither procure this Election to be annulled, as long as the Dominion of the Saxons laſted, nor prevent the Engliſh from acknowledging Stigand as lawful Archbiſhop, tho' ſuſpended by the Pope.

J. Wallingford.

Theſe Inſtances ſhow, the Wittena-Gemot, or Mycel-Synod was an Eccleſiaſtical and Political Aſſembly at the ſame time, and that all Affairs relating to the Church and State were indifferently treated there. 'Twas not till long after, when the Papal Authority was grown to a great height, under the Norman and Angevin Kings, that the Clergy claimed the Privilege of debating apart all matters any ways relating to Religion, in Eccleſiaſtical Aſſemblies or Synods.

It is time now to ſpeak of the King in particular, his Prerogatives, Revenues, and Succeſſion to the Crown.

Of the KING.

The Power of the King was bounded.

I Have already obſerved in another place, that the Saxon Government in Germany was Ariſtocratical, and that they had only a General who commanded their Armies in time of War. The Saxon Leaders themſelves erected their ſeveral Conqueſts in Great-Britain into Kingdoms, and aſſumed the title of King. But with this new title, they were however conſidered at firſt by their Subjects upon the ſame foot only with their Governors in Germany, whoſe power was far from being Deſpotical. Nevertheleſs, ſome pretend, the right of Conqueſt gave theſe firſt Kings an unlimited power, from whence it would follow, that the Privileges of the Engliſh Subjects were either Conceſſions of the Kings, or Uſurpations of the People. This Argument, drawn from the right of Conqueſt, might have ſome weight, if the Privileges of the Britons, who were ſubdued, was the point in queſtion. But the Buſineſs in hand is the Privileges of the Saxons or Engliſh, who were themſelves the Conquerors, and over whom Conqueſt gave no power to their Kings. I ſay, we are to conſider here the Saxons only, ſince there remained in the Country they became maſters of, but very few Britons, who were looked upon but as ſo many Slaves. As therefore the Anglo-Saxons can't be ſaid to loſe their Rights by making Conqueſts, they are to be conſidered upon the ſame foot as in Germany, that is, as a free People under the conduct of a Head or Chief, whoſe power was limited by Law.

There is no doubt, that in England, as in all other Kingdoms, the Royal Authority by degrees exceeded the Bounds at firſt preſcribed. But, the Hiſtory of the Anglo-Saxons being very imperfect, there is no giving a particular Account of this matter. I muſt therefore content my ſelf with ſhowing in general ſome of the chief Prerogatives enjoyed by the Anglo-Saxon Kings during their Dominion, which laſted above 600 Years, without being able ſo much as to obſerve the alterations that may have been in this reſpect in ſo long an Interval.

The King's Prerogatives.

One of the moſt conſiderable of the King's Prerogatives was the Power of appointing the Earls, Viſcounts, Judges, and other Officers as well Civil as Military. Some however aſſert, that the military Poſt of the Dukes or Holds of each County was conferred by the Shire-Gemot. Very probably, it was in the King's power to change theſe Officers according to his pleaſure, of which we meet with ſeveral inſtances in Hiſtory. But after all, it can't be poſitively affirmed; becauſe when ſuch an Officer is found to be turned out by the King, it does not neceſſarily follow, it was done without the Conſent or previous Sentence of the Wittena-Gemot (2). 1.

Another great Prerogative of the Crown, was that the Laws made in the Wittena-Gemot were of no force without the Aſſent of the King, to whom was committed the Executive Power. 2.

The King had alſo power to pardon Malefactors. But as Offences may be conſidered in a double view, namely, as they concern the publick, or as being prejudicial to ſome private Perſon, the King could only pardon them in the firſt reſpect. The King's pardon prevented not the offended Party from demanding ſatisfaction for the wrongs he had received. This ſatisfaction was called in Saxon, Wiregeld, that is, a Reparation, made to the injured party or his friends and relations. Hence doubtleſs came the Cuſtom in England at this day, of the Wife's or Son's appealing in caſes of Murders. For the ſame reaſon alſo this Clauſe is uſually inſerted in Pardons: Ita tamen ut ſtet rectò in curiâ noſtrâ, ſi quis verſus eum loqui voluerit. 3.

The power of coining Money was another of the King's Prerogatives, which he could grant by Charter to whom he pleaſed, as we find ſeveral of the Saxon Kings granted the ſame to the two Archbiſhops and others. But the King had not the power of enhancing or debaſing the Coin. The Mirror of Juſtice recites it as an old Law, that the King could not change the Money, or make other Coin than of Silver, without the Conſent of all the Counties. 4.

It is uncertain, whether it was abſolutely in the Power of the Saxon Kings, to make War or Peace, without the Conſent of the Wittena-Gemot. It is true, indeed, the Power of making War was, as it is now, of little conſequence; ſince the King not being able to raiſe Money without the Conſent of the Eſtates, could not bear the expence, if his Subjects refuſed to aſſiſt him. But as for making Peace, the caſe is quite different, ſince on a good or bad Peace, depends the welfare of a whole Kingdom, as hath been too often experienc'd. And therefore, theſe two Prerogatives, which are commonly joined together, widely differ in their Conſequences. It lies in the People's Breaſt to contribute to the Wars the King is pleaſed to undertake of his own accord, and, by refuſing their Concurrence, have it in their power to prevent the miſchiefs that an unjuſt or unneceſſary War may occaſion. But how ſhall they hinder the effects of a pernicious Peace, concluded without their Knowledge?

The King's Revenues.

The King's Revenues were of three ſorts. The firſt conſiſted in certain things, furniſhed him by the States, for the maintenance of his Houſhold, as Corn, Hay, Cattle, and the like, which were uſually paid in kind. The ſecond Branch was the produce of certain Demeſnes or Lands annexed to the Crown, and deſigned to ſerve for publick Uſes, it not being in the power of the King to grant any part of them, not even to the Church, without the Conſent of the Eſtates. Hence it is that we find the antient Charters of the Saxon Kings to the Churches or Monaſteries, confirmed by the principal Members of the General Aſſembly, who ſigned them in this manner. I N------have ſubſcrib'd, confirm'd, approv'd, corroborated, or other the like Expreſſions. It cannot be doubted

(1) After which the Perſon ſo elected being firſt conſecrated, the King inveſted him with the Temporalities, by the Delivery Baculi and Annuli, as you may ſee in the ſame Author.

(2) As the Earls in thoſe Days held their Earldoms of the Community and not of the King, there is no doubt but they were both made and turned out with the Conſent of the Great Council. But as a Body Politick cannot act it ſelf, when any particular Act is to be done, the Execution thereof naturally devolves on the King as Lord or Head of the great Seignory of the Kingdom. And therefore when he is ſaid to make or put out an Earl, the Aſſent of the Wittena-Gemot is always to be ſuppoſed. For Feudal Earls (and all were ſo in thoſe Days) could not be made without the Conſent of the Peers.

but this Branch of the King's Revenue was applied to publick Uſes, when it is conſidered, that ſo late as the end of the XIVth Century, in the Reign of Richard II, the Parliament order'd, that for the future the Revenues of the King's Demeſnes ſhould go towards defraying the charge of the Wars he ſhould be engaged in. The third Branch conſiſted, as at this day, of certain Taxes or Impoſts, which were laid from time to time on the People upon urgent occaſions, by the Authority of the Witten-Gemot.

We don't find, during the Heptarchy, the Kings affected any ſwelling Titles, as ſome did afterwards. They were all contented with the Title of King of their reſpective Kingdoms; and the Prince who was elected Monarch did not imagine he had a Right to diſtinguiſh himſelf upon that account. Egbert himſelf, after acquiring the Sovereignty of the Seven Kingdoms, made no Alteration in his uſual Title of King of the Weſt-Saxons. Athelſtan was the firſt that ſtiled himſelf Imperator. Edmund was ſatisfied with, Rector & Gubernator Angliæ. Edgar called himſelf, King of the whole Iſland of Albion. Canute the Great aſſumed the Title of King of Albion and many other Nations. Some affected a Greek Title, as Edgar, who ſtiled himſelf, Totius Angliæ Baſileus.

The Coronation of the Kings.

As for the Coronation of the Anglo-Saxon Kings, there was no time fixed for this Ceremony, either during the Heptarchy, or after the Union of the Seven Kingdoms. Each was crowned when he thought it moſt convenient. Before Egbert, the Kings of Kent were crowned by the Archbiſhops of Canterbury: The Kings of Northumberland, by the Archbiſhops of York; and the reſt commonly by the Biſhop of their Capital. After Egbert united the Heptarchy, or at leaſt four of the Kingdoms into one, the Archbiſhop of Canterbury claimed the Privilege of crowning the Kings; but this pretenſion was founded only on a Cuſtom, which, tho' uſual,' was not however neceſſary. And indeed we find, after the Union, ſeveral Kings were crowned by the Archbiſhops of York, or even by other Biſhops. Some ſay, Harold put the Crown on his own head himſelf. Sweyn, the firſt Daniſh King, was not crowned at all, and yet was owned for King. Edgar reigned ſeveral years in Weſſex before he was ſolemnly crowned. Edward the Confeſſor's Coronation was not performed till ſix Months after he was proclaimed. This neglect is a clear Evidence this Ceremony was not then deemed abſolutely neceſſary. And therefore they who date the beginnings of the Reigns from the Coronation-days, only breed confuſion in Chronology, from a miſtaken nicety. This way of reckoning is ſo much the more liable to Error, as there were ſeveral Kings who repeated the Solemnity of their Coronation ſeveral times; for inſtance, Cerdic firſt King of Weſſex. This Ceremony was not at firſt performed in a Church, but in the open Air. Thus it is expreſly ſaid by the Hiſtorians, that Athelſtan, Edmund and Edred were crowned in an open Place (1).

Form of the Crown.

As for the Form of the Crown, it was not over-curious, at leaſt it was not uniform, as may be ſeen from many Impreſſions of Heads of the Saxon Kings, given us by Camden and Spelman (2). Some have only a Diadem of Pearls. Others a Coronet with ſix Rays or Points, with Flower de Luces between, or Pearls upon them. Edward the Confeſſor has an Imperial Crown. This variety ſhows, that in England, as well as in other places, there was not then any ſettled Form for the Crowns, but that each Prince pleaſed his own fancy (3).

The SUCCESSION to the CROWN in the Time of the ANGLO-SAXONS.

Three Opinions concerning the Succeſſion.

THERE are three different Opinions upon this Subject. The firſt is, that the Crown was all along Hereditary, as well during the Heptarchy as afterwards. The ſecond, that the Crown was always Elective, and in the diſpoſal of the People; ſo that, although the Son ſucceeded the Father, it was however by Election. The third, that the Crown was neither Hereditary nor Elective, but the Kings had power to give it by Will to any one of their Sons or Relations, whom they thought moſt worthy. But how confidently ſoever each aſſerts his Opinion, it is eaſily perceived that to eſtabliſh any one of the three, is more difficult than to combat the other two. This difficulty ariſes from our imperfect Knowledge of the Hiſtory of the Anglo-Saxons, and perhaps from their not proceeding regularly themſelves in this matter. The Arguments uſed by each Party in defence of his own, and againſt the Opinions of his Adverſaries, are as follow.

Proof of the Crown's being Hereditary.

The firſt ſay, we need only run over the Hiſtory of the Heptarchy, to be convinced that in each of the ſeven Kingdoms, the Crown remained in the Family of the firſt Kings, as long as there were any Male Heirs in being. And that after the Union of the ſeven Kingdoms, there was no alteration in this reſpect, the Race of Egbert ſitting on the Throne down to Edward the Confeſſor. 'Tis true indeed the Daniſh Kings are to be excepted: but as they intruded themſelves by force of Arms, nothing can be inferred from thence againſt the Crown's being Hereditary.

Proof that it was Elective.

They who believe the Crown was Elective, ground their Opinion upon the ſame Hiſtory, by ſhowing that the Lineal Succeſſion from Father to Son was not always preſerved. And indeed, they demonſtrate, by undeniable Proofs, that the King's Brother often ſucceeded before the King's Sons, and diſtant Branches of the Royal Family were preferred before the neareſt; whence they conclude, this was occaſioned by the right of Election reſiding in the People. They further add, that although the Son ſucceeded the Father, ſometimes even for ſeveral Generations, it does not neceſſarily follow, that the Crown was Hereditary; as the Imperial Crown of Germany can't be ſaid to be ſo, though it has now continued two hundred and fifty years in the Houſe of Auſtria. To ſupport their Opinion concerning the Right of Election, they alledge ſeveral Paſſages of the Hiſtorians, who, ſpeaking of the Kings that ſucceeded their Fathers, uſe this Expreſſion, electus eſt in Regem, He was elected King.

Anſwer.

To this the others reply, That indeed upon certain occaſions, Fraud and Violence took place: But however, the Lineal Succeſſion, tho' broken for ſome time, preſerved its Rights, ſince quickly after we find things were reſtored to their former State. I think it needleſs to produce the Inſtances alledged by both Parties. Beſides their having been related in the Hiſtory, the Reader may eaſily refreſh his Memory by caſting his Eye on the Genealogical Tables of the Anglo-Saxon Kings, where the Order of the Succeſſion is ſet down. As for the Expreſſion of the Hiſtorians, He was elected, they ſay, theſe Words are to be found only in Authors who wrote long after, and made uſe of them without conſidering the Conſequences, as not treating expreſly of this matter. Beſides, 'tis pretended, theſe Authors have not rightly tranſlated the original Terms in the Saxon Annals, Feng to Rice, which properly ſignify Regnum capeſſit, he took upon him the Kingdom.

That the Crown was diſpoſed of by the King.

They who are of the third Opinion, alledge againſt the firſt, that the Crown was not therefore Hereditary, becauſe it continued long in one Family, as appears from the example of the Houſe of Auſtria. To the ſecond they object, that after proving the Crown not to be Hereditary, their Inference, that it was therefore Elective, is not juſt, for there is another way, which excluded the other two, namely, the Kings diſpos'd of the Crown as they thought fit. To confirm their Opinion, they alledge the example of France, where they pretend, the Kings, even as low down as ſome of the ſecond Race (4), enjoyed the Privilege of diſpoſing of their Dominions, which occaſioned the ſo frequent diviſion of that Kingdom. For, ſay they, had it been the eldeſt Son's Right always to ſucceed his Father, 'tis inconceivable that the younger Brothers ſhould ſo frequently riſe in Arms to compel their elder to ſhare the Kingdom with them. On the other hand, they obſerve, if the Crown of France had been Elective, 'tis not likely the French would have always elected as many Sovereigns, as the former Kings had left Sons. From all which they conclude, that the frequent Partitions during the firſt and ſecond Race, were ſolely owing to the teſtamentary diſpoſition of the Kings. Agreeable to this, is, what Mezerai ſays, ſpeaking of Aribert King Dagobert's Brother. His words are: But as Aribert was young, and the King his Father perhaps had left him no Part of the Kingdom in his Will, it was to no purpoſe that Bernulph, his Mother's Brother, endeavoured to perſuade the Neuſtrians to riſe in his favour. This Cuſtom eſtabliſhed among the French from the beginning of their Monarchy, as it is pretended to be proved, is doubtleſs a ſtrong Preſumption that the Anglo-Saxons did the like, ſeeing they lived at the ſame time, and came, as well as the Francs, from Germany, in the ſame

(1) They were crowned in the Market-Place of Kingſton upon Thames.

(2) Theſe Impreſſions were taken from old Saxon Coins.

(3) Tyrrel looks upon it as Fiction in them who will needs have it that Alfred was crowned with a Crown wrought with Flower de Luces, becauſe ſuch a Crown was kept among the Regalia at Weſtminſter before our late Civil Wars. (See Note (9) p. 95.) The Inſcription, Hæc oſt, &c. being in all probability put on the Box wherein it was kept by ſome Monk of After-Times, to give the greater Air of Antiquity to the Crown.

(4) The Crown of France has been enjoyed by three Royal Families: Firſt, the Merovians, begun by Pharamond, and ended in Childeric III, twenty one Kings: Second, the Carolinians from Charles Martell to Lewis V, fourteen Kings: Third, begun in Hugh Capet, of which there have been thirty one Kings.

Century.

Century. But if it be objected, there are no Inſtances to be found then in England of the like Partitions, in the Kingdoms of the Heptarchy, it is replied, there were ſome, tho' not many. The Kings of the Heptarchy, who were but petty Princes in compariſon of the Kings of France, took care not to divide their Dominions, otherwiſe there would quickly have been as many Sovereigns as Cities. However there were ſome that did ſo: For Inſtance, Penda King of Mercia, placed in his Life-time, his eldeſt Son Peda on the Throne of Leiceſter, having erected that City, and the adjoining Country into a Kingdom. Ethelred his Son and Succeſſor, gave his Brother Merowald part of his Dominions, with the Title of King of Hereford, which little Kingdom was left by Merowald, to his Brother Mercelm. Oſwy King of Northumberland, gave the Kingdom of Deira to Alfred his Natural Son, as Ethelwulph did the Kingdom of Kent in his Life-time to Athelſtan. For a farther Confirmation of this Opinion, Ethelwulph's Will is produced, who diſpoſed of his Dominions in ſo abſolute a manner, that his four Sons were to ſucceed one after another, whether the firſt had Children or not; which was accordingly done. Theſe are the Arguments alledged in Proof of the third Opinion; but they have not remained unanſwered.

Anſwer. It is ſaid firſt, thoſe Princes, who were crowned in their Father's Life-time, were properly but ſo many Viceroys: and they, who, contrary to the eſtabliſhed order, ſucceeded by virtue of a Will, were admitted to the Throne by the Authority, or at leaſt, not without the Conſent of the Eſtates, which implies a Right of Election in the Subjects.

Another Proof in favour of the Kings. But it is more difficult to anſwer the Arguments drawn from the Proceedings of Canute the Great, who, towards the latter end of his Life, very carefully avoided every thing that might make the Engliſh apprehenſive of his intending to alter the form of Government. 'Tis well known, this Prince annulled his Marriage Articles with Emma of Normandy, by making his Will, and appointing Harold his Succeſſor, inſtead of Hardicanute, who by the Marriage-Contract was Heir to the Crown. This ſeems to demonſtrate, the King was entirely free to chuſe his Succeſſor. It is true, after his death Diſputes aroſe; but however that be, it appears at leaſt, this Prince thought he might diſpoſe of the Crown by Will. The ſame thing may be ſaid of Edward the Confeſſor. Whether this Prince made a Will in favour of the Duke of Normandy, or deſigned it only, or even gave him but a bare verbal Promiſe, it may be inferred from thence, that he imagined he had a Right to ſettle the Succeſſion that way.

Theſe are the Reaſons alledged to ſupport the three Opinions, in this important Inquiry. I call it important with regard to thoſe who really think it ſo. For my part, I can hardly be perſuaded there is any occaſion to recur to the Cuſtoms of the Anglo-Saxons, to eſtabliſh thoſe that are to be followed at this day.

The three Opinions may be united. It would not, perhaps, be impoſſible to form an Idea of the Anglo-Saxon Government, with regard to the Succeſſion, by uniting the three foregoing Opinions. It ſeems to me that from all the reaſons alledged, it may be inferred in favour of the reſt, that the Crown was Hereditary in the Family of the Saxon Kings, as well during the Heptarchy, as after the Union of the Seven Kingdoms. In favour of the ſecond, it may be granted, that upon extraordinary occaſions, the Wittena-Gemot, conſidering itſelf as Supreme Legiſlator, aſſumed an abſolute Authority, and went beyond the uſual Bounds. With the third it may be ſaid, the Kings had power of nominating their Succeſſor, provided, when they deviated from the common Practice, which was to prefer the next in Blood, they took care to have their Choice confirmed by the Great Council of the Kingdom. This is the Reaſon why thoſe Kings who were not the next in Blood, never failed of making uſe of the Conſent of the Eſtates, thereby to rectify the Irregularity of their acceſſion to the Throne. This we ſee alſo in Alfred's Will, at the end of his Life publiſhed by Spelman (1). By uniting thus the three Opinions, the Rules for the Succeſſion in the time of the Anglo-Saxons, will be found to be much the ſame with thoſe at preſent. It is conſeſt, the Crown is Hereditary. But however, this prevents not the Parliament in extraordinary caſes, from claiming a Power to over-rule Cuſtom, and ſettle the Succeſſion on a more diſtant, in prejudice of a nearer Relation. Of this the Hiſtory of England ſince the Conqueſt affords many Inſtances and Precedents, without inſiſting on thoſe of our own Times. If it is objected, all do not allow the King and Parliament to have a right to ſuch a Power; it may be replied, till the contrary is determined by a lawful Authority, it is reaſonable to preſume this Power is rightfully lodged in the Nation. According to theſe Principles, they, who labour to prove the Crown was Elective in the time of the Anglo-Saxons, don't ſeem to do much in favour of the Parliament, which claims a Power to alter the Succeſſion but on certain occaſions. On the other hand, they, who undertake to prove the Crown was Hereditary at that time, do no great prejudice to the Authority aſſumed by this Auguſt Body only in extraordiny Caſes. In fine, as they who pretend to prove the Saxon Kings had an abſolute Power to diſpoſe of the Crown, probably do not mean that the preſent Kings have the ſame Power, they ſeem to me to debate a Queſtion of more Curioſity than Importance.

Of the LAWS of the ANGLO-SAXONS.

Several ſorts of Laws. DURING the Heptarchy, there were no Laws common to all the ſeven Kingdoms; but each had its own in particular. It is very likely however, theſe Laws were not very different, ſince the Inhabitants of the ſeven Kingdoms had the ſame original. But there is nothing certain in this matter. The firſt Laws, we have any Knowledge of, are thoſe publiſhed by Etherbert King of Kent, about the time of the Converſion of the Saxons. We have likewiſe Ina's King of Weſſex, and Offa's King of Mercia; and there is no doubt but ſome of the other Kings made Laws, though they are not tranſmitted to us. Bede, l. 2. c. 3.

After the Union of the ſeven Kingdoms, Egbert's Succeſſors explained or extended the Laws already eſtabliſhed, or made new ones. The moſt famous are thoſe of Alfred the Great, taken, as he himſelf ſays, from the beſt he could find, and particularly from Ina's and Offa's abovementioned. Edgar, with ſuch Additions and Emendations as he thougt fit, cauſed the Laws of Alfred to be ſtrictly obſerved. But it muſt be remembred, when England was divided into two Kingdoms, namely, Weſſex and Mercia, each had their Laws apart, and Canute the Great cauſed thoſe that were introduced by the Danes into Northumberland and Eaſt-Anglia, to be approved by the General Aſſembly. There were therefore in England three ſorts of Laws, the Weſt-Saxons, Mercian, and Daniſh, till Edward the Confeſſor united them all in one Body (2). As I propoſed only to give a general Notion of the Government of the Anglo-Saxons, my deſign is not to enter into a particular Account of all theſe Laws. I ſhall content my ſelf with relating ſome Circumſtances, which ſeem to me to merit the Curioſity of ſuch as are Strangers to the Engliſh Conſtitution, and are intelligible to all the World. Laws of Alfred. Of Edgar. Three ſorts of Laws.

The Laws were divided into Civil and Criminal. The firſt concerned the Lands or Eſtates, which were of two ſorts Bocland and Socland. Bocland was much of the ſame Nature with the Lands we call Allodial (3). It was Free and Hereditary, and might be alienated by the Owner, though he held in Fee of a ſuperior Lord. This is properly what is elſewhere called, Feudum honoratum. This ſort of Land was poſſeſſed by the Nobles and moſt conſiderable among the People. Socland was poſſeſſed by the Ceorles, and held of the Lord by payment of a certain annual Rent, and performance of certain perſonal Services. This ſort of Land is the ſame with what is called

(1) Ego Ælfredus——totius Weſt-Saxoniæ Nobilitatis Conſenſu pariter & Aſſenſu, Occidentalium Saxonum Rex, &c. Whence it is manifeſt, that though he was nominated in his Father's Will to ſucceed his Brothers, yet he was elected or at leaſt confirmed by the Great Council in the Poſſeſſion of the Crown ſo bequeathed to him by his Father. And therefore it is plain, that though the King had the Power to diſpoſe of the Crown by Will, yet it could not be done without the Conſent and Aſſent of the Eſtates.

(2) See what Biſhop Nicholſon ſays of this threefold Diſtinction of the Laws in p. 126. Note (3). To which may be added here the Opinion of Spelman: "Our Saxons, though divided into many Kingdoms, yet were they all one in Effect, in Manners, Laws, and Language; ſo that the breaking of their Go-"vernment into many Kingdoms, or the re-uniting of their Kingdoms into a Monarchy, wrought little or no Change among them touching Laws. For "though we talk of the Weſt-Saxon-Law, Mercian-Law, and Dane-Law, whereby the ſeveral Parts of England were governed, yet they all held an "Uniformity in Subſtance, differing rather in their Mulcts than in their Canon; that is, in the Quantity of Fines and Amerciaments, than in the Courſe "and Frame of Juſtice." Reliq. Spel. p. 49.

(3) The Northern Nations neither incorporating nor deſtroying the Inhabitants in their Conqueſts, divided the Land into three Parts; one they left to the old Poſſeſſors, the other two they took themſelves. Theſe Diviſions are called by the Writers of thoſe Ages, Sortes Gothicæ, and Sortes Romanæ, in Italy. The Franci proceeded in the ſame manner in Gaul. What they took to themſelves was termed Terra Salica, the reſt was called Alodium, from the negative Particle A and Lend, which ſignifies in Teutonick, Perſons linked by feudal Tenures, who only had a Share in the Legiſlature. So that Allodial Lands were ſuch as were not ſubject to feudal Duties; yet before Tenants were oppreſſed, the Term Allodarii was a Term of Reproach, as it diſcriminated the Vanquiſhed from the Victors. Though their Land was at firſt free from all Service, many Poſſeſſors for their better Security gave their Allodial Lands to the Chiefs of great Lordſhips to take them back under feudal Tenures. Others, without diveſting themſelves at all of their antient Poſſeſſion, placed themſelves under ſuch Superiors, and then came in uſe the Phraſe tenere in Allodio, frequent enough in our Doomſday Book, and in foreign Writers; for all Protection and Subjection was ſuppoſed then to be founded on Tenure. St. Amand, p. 26, 27.

a Rural

a Rural Fief. I don't think it neceſſary to enquire here into the original of Fees, which would lead me too far, and beſides would contain nothing peculiar to England. I ſhall only ſay, in Selden's opinion, Fees derive their origin from the North, and from thence paſſed into Germany, Italy, France, Spain, England, where the northern Nations ſettled. It would alſo be too long a Digreſſion from my purpoſe, to recite all the Laws concerning the poſſeſſion of the two ſorts of Lands before-mentioned, eſpecially as theſe things are underſtood by few People. 'Tis ſufficient to have given a general Idea of them, and therefore I ſhall proceed to what is much more intelligible, the Criminal Laws.

The Criminal Laws. Trial by Peers.

By the regulations of Alfred the Great, all Perſons accuſed of any Crime were to be tried by their Peers. This Privilege which the Engliſh have preſerved to this day, is one of the greateſt a Nation can enjoy. It ſcreens the ſmall from the Oppreſſion of the great, and from the Caprice or Paſſion of the King himſelf, of which there have been ſeveral Inſtances in England. But as the Term Peers may not be rightly underſtood by many Readers, it will be proper briefly to explain the meaning of the Word. It is to be obſerved, that in England there are but two Degrees or Orders of Men, namely, the Peers of the Realm, and the Commons. Dukes, Marqueſſes, Earls, Viſcounts, Barons, Archbiſhops and Biſhops, are Peers of the Realm, and Peers among themſelves; inſomuch that the loweſt of the Barons is the Peer of the higheſt Duke. All the reſt of the People are ranked with the Commons. So that in this reſpect, the meaneſt Artificer is Peer of all below the rank of a Baron. When therefore it is ſaid, every one is tried by his Peers; the meaning is, the Peers of the Realm are judged by thoſe of their own Order, that is, by the other Lords; who, like them, are Peers of the Realm. In the ſame manner, one of the Commonalty is tried by ſuch as are of the order of the Commons, who, in this reſpect, are his Peers or Equals, how much ſoever they may differ with regard to Birth or Fortune. There is however this difference between the Peers of the Realm and the Commons; every Peer of the Realm has a right to vote at the Tryal of another Peer, whereas the Commons are tried but by twelve Perſons of their Order, whoſe Verdict concerns only Fact. Theſe twelve Perſons, after hearing the publick Examination of the Witneſſes for and againſt the Party accuſed, only bring him in Guilty or not Guilty of the Crime laid to his Charge; after which, the Judge condemns or acquits him according to Law. Such is the Privilege enjoyed by the Engliſh ever ſince the Time of King Alfred. And perhaps this Prince only revived and rectified a Cuſtom eſtabliſhed by the Saxons Time out of Mind (1).

Meaning of the Word Peer.

Means of diſcovering the Truth.

When the Crime was not clearly proved, or ſufficient Evidence found to condemn or acquit the Accuſed, two Methods were uſed, by which, it was thought, the Truth might be diſcovered.

By Oath.

The firſt was the Oath of the Party accuſed, to purge himſelf of the Crime he was charged with. But his ſingle Oath was not ſufficient: He was to bring with him a certain Number of Perſons who were [and ſtill are] called Compurgators, who alſo ſwore to his Innocence.

Ordeal Tryals.

The ſecond Method was by Ordeal (2), that is, Trial by Fire or Water. The Trial by Fire was performed two ways. The Perſon accuſed held in his Hand a red-hot piece of Iron of one, two, or three Pounds weight, according to his Crime, or according to the Evidence againſt him; or elſe he was made to walk barefoot and blindfold over nine red-hot Pow-ſhares placed at a ſtated diſtance. If he had the good fortune to come off unhurt, he was declared Innocent: But in caſe he was burnt, he was pronounced Guilty. Perſons of Quality were tried by Fire-Ordeal, of which Emma, Mother to Edward the Confeſſor, is an Inſtance. Trial by Water-Ordeal was made either by cold or ſcalding Water. Peaſants and Slaves were put upon this Trial. In the Trial by cold Water, the Party ſuſpected had his Hands and Feet tied together, and ſo was thrown into a Pond or River. If he ſunk, he was adjudged Innocent; but if he floated on the Surface of the Water, he was declared Guilty (3). When ſcalding Water was the Teſt, the Perſon accuſed was to plunge his Arm into it as far as the Wriſt, and ſometimes up to the Elbow. The Trial by cold Water was introduced by Lewis le Debonnaire, and by Pope Eugenius II, inſtead of an Oath, which was but too often the occaſion of the guilty Perſons perjuring themſelves; and the Engliſh followed their Example.

Single Combat.

The third way of Trial was by ſingle Combat. When the Evidences of the Accuſation were not ſtrong, the Party was allowed to vindicate his Innocence by challenging his Accuſer to ſingle Combat. If a Woman was accuſed, ſhe had the Privilege of ſubſtituting one in her room, who was called her Champion. This Cuſtom was not introduced into England till towards the End of the Empire of the Saxons: But it continued a long time in being.

Corſned.

A fourth way of Trial was by giving the Party ſuſpected a bit of Bread or Cheeſe (4), conſecrated with abundance of Ceremonies. If he was guilty, it was believed the Bread or the Cheeſe would ſtick in his Throat and choak him; but if innocent, he would readily ſwallow it. Part of the Imprecations uſed upon delivering him the Bread, (after receiving the Communion) was as follows: May this Bread [or this Cheeſe] which is given him in order to bring the Truth to light, ſtick in his Throat and find no Paſſage if he is guilty (5). But if innocent of the Crime laid to his Charge, may he eaſily ſwallow this Bread [or this Cheeſe] conſecrated in thy Name, to the end all may know, &c. This way of Trial was evidently in Imitation of the Waters of Jealouſy among the Jews. They who forged the Circumſtances of Earl Goodwin's death, as related in the reign of King Edward, had probably an eye to this Cuſtom. This conſecrated Bread or Cheeſe was called Corſned, from the word Snide or Snidan, which ſignifies to cut a bit off, and Corſe, that is, to curſe, becauſe 'twas believed it brought a Curſe on the guilty Perſon. The Church not only approved of all theſe ways of Trial, but preſcribed the Ceremonies and Form of Prayers to be uſed on theſe occaſions, and even conſented that the Biſhops and Prieſts ſhould officiate. There is a Law of Canute the Great concerning the Corſned, to this effect: If a Man be accuſed of Murder, or of having any hand in it, let him clear himſelf to the Relations and Friends of the murdered Perſon, and, if neceſſary, let him be put to the Trial of the Corſned. It is very wonderful, the Saxons and other Nations, among whom theſe Trials were common, could for ſo long together fancy they were infallible ways of diſcovering the Truth. On the contrary, one would think the numberleſs Experiments, they muſt needs have had of their uncertainty, ſhould have opened their Eyes and made them ſee their Error.

Numb. 5.

When the Charge was fully proved, the Law ordained ſeveral ſorts of Puniſhments, according to the Quality of the Offence: The greateſt part whereof conſiſted in Fines, which the guilty Perſon was condemned to pay to the injured Party, to the King, to the Earl or to his Lord. There were ſome Crimes however, that were looked upon as Capital, and puniſhed with Death. Such were Treaſon againſt the King, or Lord, wilful Murder and Theft. Though Treaſon was Death by the Law, yet the guilty Perſon had the Liberty of redeeming his Life by paying the Valuation of the King's or Lord's Head: I ſhall explain this hereafter. Coining of Money was not originally a Capital Crime; but the Conſequences made the Penalty very great. The firſt Law that made it Death was in the Reign of Ethelred II, though it was left in the King's Power to commute the Puniſhment for a Fine. As for Murder, the Laws diſtinguiſhed killing a Man in a ſudden and unforeſeen Quarrel, from wilful and premeditated Murder. The Puniſhment of the former was only pecuniary, the latter was Death. This Diſtinction ſtill ſubſiſts in the Laws of England, where the firſt is called, Manſlaughter, and the other, Murder. Theft or Robbery was not till after ſome time puniſh-

Murder and Manſlaughter.

Theft.

(1) Sir William Temple ſays, Traces are not wanting of this Cuſtom, from the very Inſtitutions of Odin, the firſt Leader of the Aſiatick Goths or Getæ into Europe, and Founder of that mighty Kingdom round the Baltick Sea, from whence all the Gothick Governments in theſe North-Weſt Parts of the World were derived. This is the Reaſon that it is known to have been as antient in Sweden as any Records, or Traditions of that Kingdom, and ſtill remains in ſome Provinces. The Normans introduced the Terms of Jury and Verdict as well as many other Law-Terms; but the Trials by Twelve Men are expreſly mention'd in Alfred's and Ethelred the Firſt's Laws.

(2) Somner in his Gloſſary derives this Word Or, a Privative, and Dal, that is, Diſtinction or Difference, as much as to ſay, an impartial Judgment, without any Diſtinction.

(3) Rapin, by miſtake, ſays Sinking was a Sign of Guilt, and Swimming of Innocence. The Cuſtom among the Country-People of trying Witches, by throwing them into the Water with their Thumbs and Toes tied together, is perhaps a Relict of Water Ordeal. Theſe Trials were made with great Solemnity, and were always managed by the Clergy. The Perſon accuſed was obliged to ſwear to his Innocence, and ſometimes, eſpecially if in Orders, to receive the Sacrament. After the Charge was legally brought in, the Perſon impeach'd was to ſpend three Days in Faſting and Prayer. At the Day of Trial, which in the Fire Ordeal was made in the Church, the Prieſt in his Habit took up the Iron which lay before the Altar, and repeating the Hymn of the Three Children, put it into the Fire: Then uſing ſome Forms of Benediction over the Fire and Iron, he ſprinkled the Iron with Holy Water, and made the Sign of the Croſs in the Name of the Trinity: Which done, the Party accuſed paſſed through the Teſt. The Ceremony of the Scalding Water-Ordeal was much the ſame. But when the Trial was by Cold Water, the three Days Faſt and other Circumſtances being premiſed, the Perſon ſuſpected drank a Draught of Holy Water, to which the Prieſt added an Imprecation, in caſe he was Guilty: Then the Water into which he was to be thrown, had a ſort of exorciſing Form of Prayers ſaid over it: All theſe ways of Trial continued long after the Conqueſt. The firſt publick Diſcountenance from the State was in the third Year of Henry III.

(4) He was to take an Ounce of either faſting.

(5) The Imprecations go on thus: May his Face turn pale, his Limbs be convulſed, and an horrible Alteration appear in his whole Body.

able by death, and even the firſt Laws that made it ſo, permitted the Thief to redeem his Head with a ſum of Money.

Fines for other Crimes. All other Offences were puniſhed only by Mulcts or Fines, 'till the Reign of Canute the Great, who ordered in the caſe of Adultery, that a Woman ſhould have her Noſe and Ears cut off, and the Man be baniſhed the Realm. Theſe Fines were not left to the Will of the Judge, but were ſettled by Law, according to the Quality of the injured Party, from the King to the Peaſant; and with regard to the Malefactors, from the Ealdorman to the Slave. Upon ſome certain occaſions, they who had incurred the Penalty of Death, might buy off their Puniſhment by giving the King part of their Eſtates. But this ſeldom happened, except where the Quality, or Power of the guilty Party, rendered the execution of the Laws difficult or dangerous. We have a remarkable inſtance of this in the Trial of Earl Goodwin in the Reign of Edward the Confeſſor. This Lord, as was ſaid in the Life of King Edward, entering the Thames with a Fleet, the King was forced to reſtore him to his Honours. But having been baniſhed by the Wittena-Gemot, he was to be recalled by the ſame Authority. It was neceſſary therefore to uſe ſome Formality, which ſhould ſcreen him from all future enquiry; and the method taken was this. The Earl being come to London, where the great Council was aſſembled, the King himſelf turned his Accuſer, and ſaid, "Thou Traitor Goodwin, I charge thee with "the death of Alfred my Brother, whom thou haſt trai-"terouſly murdered." "My Lord (anſwered the Earl) "ſaving the Reverence I owe you, I have neither mur-"dered, nor betrayed your Brother, and am ready to re-"fer myſelf to the Judgment of your Court." Upon which the Witneſſes were produced and examined, and then Leofric Duke of Mercia ſpoke thus: "It ſeems evi-"dent to me that Prince Alfred was put to death by the "Advice of Earl Goodwin. But as he is one of the great-"eſt Lords in the Kingdom, it is my opinion, that twelve "of us Earls, who are his Relations and Friends, ſhould "take as much Gold as we can carry in our hands, and "humbly preſenting it to the King, ſupplicate for his "Pardon and Reſtoration to his Honours, upon his taking "the Oath of Allegiance.". This being agreed to, twelve of the Lords offered a certain ſum to the King, which he accepting, pardoned the Earl. But this whole Proceeding was all a Farce. Goodwin knew before-hand how matters would go, otherwiſe he would never have ventured to ſtand a Trial.

Before I conclude this Head, it will be proper to remark, that ſeveral, upon reading the Saxon Laws, prepoſterouſly imagine, the Murder, as well of the King, as of any other Subject, was puniſhable only by Fine. But this miſtake proceeds purely from not attending to the fore-mentioned diſtinction between wilful Murder and Manſlaughter. Of this laſt, we are to underſtand Athelſtan's Law (1), which ſettles the Fines to be paid for the killing any Perſon from the King to the Slave.

The Cuſtoms and Manners of the Anglo-Saxons.

THE Anglo-Saxons brought with them from Germany their own Country's Virtues and Vices, and tranſmitted them to their Poſterity. Their Valour, to which they were indebted for their Conqueſts, as well in England as Germany, was what they valued themſelves moſt upon. They were bred up to Arms from their Infancy, and War may be ſaid to be their only Profeſſion. They came to their General Aſſemblies armed; and ſhewed their Approbation of what was propoſed by ſtriking their Javelins one againſt another. Their uſual Arms were the Sword, Club, Battle-Ax, or Bill, and Javelin. As they had no Bows and Arrows, their Battles were the more bloody. After darting their Javelins, they came to cloſe Fight, where their dexterity in handling their Arms, gave them a great advantage. Indeed, towards the end of their Empire, they were frequently worſted by the Danes, and at length vanquiſhed by the Normans. But where is the Nation, how famous ſoever for Bravery, that has not experienced the like turns of Fortune? Among the Saxons, a Man without Courage was looked upon with the utmoſt Contempt. This high Conceit of martial Valour was the cauſe of their being very hardly reconciled after a quarrel. Every one dreading the name of Coward, ſhould he make the firſt advances, the Quarrel was perpetuated from Father to Son, and very ſeldom ended but with the Extinction of one of the Families (2). It is eaſy to imagine, that people of this Temper, accuſtomed from their Childhood to fear neither Blows nor Wounds, and continually encouraged by the examples of their Relations and Friends, encountered Dangers with great reſolution. Accordingly there never was any Nation that looked death in the face with greater Intrepidity than the Saxons. And all the World knows this is the Character of the Engliſh at this very day.

The Saxons were extremely addicted to Religion, even before they had the happineſs of becoming Chriſtians. When they ſettled in Great-Britain, they were not only Idolaters, but of all the Heathens were the moſt attached to the Service of their Gods; even to the ſacrificing of the Priſoners of War on their Altars. As ſoon as they embraced the Goſpel, the ſame Inclination cauſed them to receive and practiſe, with equal zeal, the Duties of the Chriſtian Religion, and whatever the Monks, their firſt Teachers, were pleaſed to inculcate upon them. It was their unhappineſs not to come to the Knowledge of God, 'till the Monks began by degrees to diſfigure Religion by ſuperſtitious Practices. As the Saxons were Men of no Learning and conſequently incomplete Judges of what they were taught, they entirely gave themſelves up to the management of their Guides. Hence their great zeal in founding and endowing Monaſteries. They were made to believe, that enriching the Monks was the main of Religion, or at leaſt would ſupply all defects. This is alſo the reaſon that in the two firſt Centuries after their Converſion we find among them ſo many Saints of diſtinguiſhed Birth and Fortune. Indeed, ſince a Saintſhip might be purchaſed by liberal Benefactions to the Monaſteries, it was an eaſy way for the Rich and the Powerful to attain it. But although they were attached to many unneceſſary things, yet even in that may be ſeen their Biaſs to Religion. This natural Inclination, no doubt, was the reaſon ſo many of their Kings voluntarily exchanged their worldly Grandeur for a Cloiſter. They who are acquainted with the Temper of the Engliſh at this day, will readily own, no Nation can produce more Inſtances of fervent and ſolid Piety. My long abode in England makes me affirm this the more boldly. Indeed, God has permitted Libertiniſm in point of Religion to make ſome progreſs there of late Years. But it would be very unjuſt to judge of a whole Nation by a few that are infected with it, and of whom one ſingle Perſon makes more noiſe in the world by his pernicious Maxims, than many thouſands of pious and ſincere Chriſtians.

Common ſwearing not frequent among the Saxons. The Anglo-Saxons were ſo little accuſtomed to Swearing and Blaſpheming, which are grown ſo common now-a-days in Converſation, that among all their Laws there is not one againſt this Vice. This cannot be ſaid to be owing to the negligence of the Legiſlators, ſince we ſee in thoſe very Laws great Penalties laid upon ſuch as violated the Sabbath, or a Faſt.

Given to Drunkenneſs. Edgar's Laws about it. Drunkenneſs was their reigning Vice. They were uſed to drink out of large Cups, and take great Draughts, 'till Edgar, willing to reform this Abuſe, ordered certain Marks to be made in their Cups at ſuch a height, above which they were forbid to fill under ſuch a Penalty. But this Regulation was not long in force.

The Sciences. Although the Engliſh in general, before the Norman Conqueſt, were not very famous for Learning, it is not to be aſcribed to their want of Genius, but rather to their Education, which was entirely turned to Arms. Beſides, the time of the Dominion of the Saxons, eſpecially after the Union of the Seven Kingdoms, was not a time wherein the Sciences greatly flouriſhed.

They reckoned Time by Nights. I have but two Obſervations more to make on the Cuſtoms of the Anglo-Saxons. The firſt is, they reckoned the time by Nights, which is ſtill obſervable in ſome Engliſh Expreſſions. For inſtance, inſtead of two Weeks they ſay a Fortnight, or fourteen Nights. Mezerai ob-

(1) In this Law we have the Valuation of Men's Heads of all Orders and Degrees. This Valuation was called in Saxon, Wiregild. The King's Head was valued at thirty thouſand Thrimſa's (that is, in our Money, three hundred and ſixty Pounds, each Thrimſa being ſuppoſed worth about our three Pence, the ſame as their Peninga or Sceat) half of which was to be paid to his Relations, and half to the State. An Atheling or Prince's was valued at fifteen thouſand Thrimſa's: A Biſhop's and Ealdorman's, at eight thouſand: A General's, at four thouſand: A Spiritual and Temporal Thane's, at two thouſand: (Hence it is evident, that a Thane was far from being the ſame with a Baron, whoſe Valuation would have been at leaſt as much as a Biſhop's) the Ceorle's Head was valued at two hundred ſixty-ſeven, but if he was ſo rich as to poſſeſs five Hides of Land, at two thouſand, the ſame as a Thane's. The Saxon Money is thus calculated by Mr. Camden; a Peninga, three of our Pence. A Shilling, three Peninga's, or fifteen Pence; a Pound, forty eight Shillings, or three of our Pounds; Manca, Mancuſa, or Marca, twelve of our Pence. Manca of Gold, thirty Peninga's, or ſeven Shillings and Six-pence.

(2) Theſe are what we call deadly Feuds, that is, Quarrels which end not but in Death. The thirty eighth Law of Alfred is concerning theſe deadly Feuds, and gives a ſtrange Licenſe for Men to take Satisfaction on their Enemies, even without the Preſence of any Officer. Nay, ſo far did they proceed, that if one Man killed another, his Kindred revenged his Death upon any of the Murderer's Relations (as they do among the Indians) 'till King Edmund ordered by a Law, that the Murderer alone ſhould bear the deadly Feud or Enmity of the Kindred of the Party ſlain.

ſerves the ſame thing of the antient Francs. This, with ſeveral other Cuſtoms common to the Francs and Saxons, is a ſtrong Preſumption, theſe two Nations had the ſame Original, as Sir William Temple aſſerts in his Introduction to the Hiſtory of England.

The Saxon Dikes.

My ſecond Obſervation is, that the Anglo-Saxons were wont to ſeparate their Lands by large and deep Ditches. This was not only practiſed by private Perſons; but the Kings themſelves took care to raiſe Ramparts with large Ditches on the Frontiers of their Dominions, to part them from the neighbouring States, when there was no Mountains or Rivers to ſerve for Boundaries. Offa's Dike made to divide Mercia from Wales, was twenty-four miles long. There was another between the Thames and the Severn, ſeparating Mercia from Weſſex. It was called Woden's Dike, but contracted now into Wanſditch. Mercia and Eaſt-Anglia were parted by a like Ditch. Aterwards, the Eaſt-Angles making Conqueſts upon the Mercians, made another Ditch ſeven Miles further into the conquered Country. The firſt was called, but for what reaſon I know not, the Devil's Dike, and the other the Seven Mile Dike. They had this cuſtom from the antient Saxons, who practiſed the ſame thing in Germany. We are informed by ſome Hiſtorians, that the Saxons of Sleſwick threw up a large Rampart from Sea to Sea, to defend themſelves againſt the Incurſions of the Danes, who were in poſſeſſion of the Cimbrick Cherſoneſus or Jutland. Pepin King of France was long prevented from entring Saxony, by one of theſe Ramparts, and it was with great difficulty that he made his way over it at laſt.

The Language of the ANGLO-SAXONS.

The ſeveral Dialects of the Anglo-Saxon Language.

TO ſay in general, the Anglo-Saxons ſpoke Engliſh or Saxon, would not be ſhewing with ſufficient exactneſs what their Language was. To give a fuller Idea of it, it will be neceſſary to diſtinguiſh the ſeveral Tongues uſed in England after the arrival of the firſt Saxons. The Engliſh Tongue originally differed but little from the Daniſh, ſince the ancient Writers call them indifferently Cimbric, Scandinavian, Gothic: But this Language was not the ſame with the Saxons. In the parts lying North of the Thames, was ſpoken pure Engliſh or Daniſh, and South of the Thames pure Saxon. Though theſe two Languages were different, they ſo far agreed however, as to be underſtood by both Nations. In proceſs of time, and eſpecially after the Union of the Seven Kingdoms, Saxon prevailed in all England, becauſe the Kings were of that Nation. Thus pure Engliſh, [or the Language of the Angles] was by degrees diſuſed, or at leaſt baniſhed from common Converſation. Afterwards the Danes ſettling in England, brought their Language, which was not the ancient Daniſh or Engliſh abovementioned, but a modern Daniſh, mixt with the Language of ſeveral neighbouring Nations of Denmark. This modern Daniſh was chiefly uſed in Northumberland, Mercia, and Eaſt-Anglia, wherein the Danes were Maſters. Though, out of complaiſance to the Engliſh, Canute the Great publiſhed his Laws in Saxon, yet the Daniſh Tongue was ſtill retained in the North, where the People were moſtly Danes. As it was alſo the Court Language during the Reigns of Canute the Great and his two Sons, it became neceſſary for the Weſt-Saxons, who adopted ſeveral Words and Idioms of it into their own Language. But upon Edward the Confeſſor's acceſſion to the Throne, Saxon prevailed again at Court. Hence the Inhabitants of the North were under ſome neceſſity of learning it, juſt as the Gaſcons in France are obliged to learn French.

In the Reign of King Edward, the Norman Language began alſo to be introduced into England. As his Mother was a Norman, and he had lived many Years in that Court, he was very fond of the Norman Language. Moreover, the great number of Normans that flocked into England, very much helped to introduce this Language among the perſons of Quality, who took a pride in ſpeaking it well: The Norman Tongue being at that time a mixture of Daniſh and French, the laſt began to prevail, ſo that the ancient Daniſh brought by the Normans into Normandy, daily loſt ground. As ſoon as William the Conqueror was ſeated in the Throne of England, he uſed all poſſible means to bring his native Tongue in vogue throughout the Kingdom. He publiſhed his Laws in Norman, which, with the ſettlement of multitudes of Norman Families in England, made that Language as common as the Saxon.

The Language then of the Anglo-Saxons juſt before the Conqueſt was a mixture of the following Dialects. 1. Of Britiſh or Celtic, from whence no doubt the Saxons borrowed ſome Words and Phraſes. 2. Of Latin, which was common in Great Britain when the Saxons arrived. 3. Of the ancient Engliſh or Daniſh. 4. Of the modern Daniſh. 5. Of pure Saxon. 6. Of Norman mixed with Daniſh and French. They who have carefully ſtudied this matter, diſtinguiſh three principal Dialects in the Anglo-Saxon Language. The firſt was compounded of Britiſh, Latin, and Saxon, but in ſuch manner that the Saxon was predominant. The only remains of this Dialect, which was in uſe above three hundred Years, is a Fragment of the Writings of Cedmon the Monk, inſerted by Alfred the Great in his Tranſlation of Bede's Eccleſiaſtical Hiſtory. The ſecond Dialect, which may be termed Dano-Saxon, was uſed in the northern Parts, from the firſt Invaſions of the Danes, to the Norman Conqueſt. They are ſtill preſerved in ſome Libraries, two Manuſcript Verſions of the Goſpels in this Language. The third Dialect was compoſed of the other two and the Norman. This Dialect, which was introduced chiefly in the Reigns of Edward the Confeſſor and William the Conqueror, has admitted of great alterations, by the addition of many French Words, particularly, after Henry II's Acceſſion to the Crown of England. They who are ignorant of the Engliſh Tongue, hardly believe, that a mixture of ſo many Languages can have any extraordinary Beauties. But the Engliſh pretend, their Language, for that very reaſon, muſt be more Beautiful and Expreſſive, ſince they have adopted only the more refined part of other Tongues, and rejected what is rude and unpoliſhed. Be this as it will, they have a great value for their Language, and, if a Foreigner may be allowed to give his Opinion, I think, very juſtly.

Sterling Money.

I ſhall conclude this Article with a word or two concerning the Name of Sterling, given to the Engliſh Money. Some believe this word comes from the Town of Striveling or Sterling in Scotland, where they pretend, but without any ground, that the beſt and pureſt Money was formerly coined. Others ſay, with much greater probability, that Sterling is derived from the Saxon Word Steore, which ſignifies Rule or Standard: So that according to this opinion, Sterling Money means no more than Money made according to a ſettled Standard. Camden and ſome others imagined this word was of a more modern date, and taken from certain Flemiſh Workmen, who in the Reign of King John were invited into England to reduce the Money to its due fineneſs, in which they were more expert than the Engliſh. As the People of that Country were generally called Eaſterlings, on account of their Situation Eaſtward of England, 'tis pretended, the Money they coined, was called Eaſterling or Sterling; that is, made by the Eaſterlings, or Flemiſh, and conſequently purer than what had been hitherto coined (1).

Brady.

(1) It is believed, that in the moſt ancient Times, when Money was firſt coined in this Iſland, it was made of pure Gold and Silver, like Moneys now current in Hungary and Barbary: And that afterwards, in making the Moneys, it being found convenient to have a certain Quantity of baſer Metal to be mixed with the Gold and Silver, the word Sterling was introduced, and hath ever ſince been uſed, to denote the certain Proportion or Degree of Fineneſs which ought to be retained in the reſpective Coins compoſed of ſuch Mixture. Sterling and Standard are therefore ſynonymous Terms. It is probable the word Sterling was unknown in the time of the Conqueror, as there is no mention of it in Doomſday, which values every Manor in Money, ad Numerum, ad Penſam, ad Pondus, but not in Sterling. But however this Term was ſoon after introduced, becauſe the Statute of the twenty fifth of Edward III, refers to ancient Sterling. Some imagine the Word is derived from Star, which they ſuppoſe to have been impreſſed on the Money.

HISTORY of ENGLAND.

BOOK VI.

The Norman Line: From the Reign of WILLIAM the Conqueror, to the Death of King STEPHEN, containing the Space of about Eighty Eight Years. With the State of the CHURCH during the ſaid Space.

I. WILLIAM I. Sirnamed the BASTARD, or CONQUEROR.

Reflections on the Duke of Normandy's Attempt upon England.

WHEN a Man impartially conſiders the Attempt formed by the Duke of Normandy upon England, he is at a loſs which to admire moſt, either the Ground, or the Boldneſs, or the Succeſs. In the firſt place, it muſt be very ſurprizing, he ſhould build his Right upon ſo ſandy a foundation as the bare Will of King Edward; of which too it does not appear in Hiſtory, he ever offered to give the leaſt Proof, or produce any Evidence. In the next place, it is as hard to conceive, how this Prince, who paſſed for one of the moſt politick of his time, could form a Deſign to ſupport his pretended Right by Arms, notwithſtanding all the Obſtacles that ſeemed to conſpire to divert him from it. Never Project ſeemed more raſhly form'd, or with leſs appearance of Succeſs. The Forces of Normandy were not comparable to thoſe of England, neither had Duke William, in the Country he undertook to conquer, any ſtrong Holds, or Friends, or Correſpondence, whereon to ground the hopes of ſucceeding. Even after he had landed a powerful Army, not a ſingle Lord declared in his favour. Far from reaſonably expecting any Aſſiſtance from the Engliſh, he could not poſſibly be ignorant how well they ſtood affected to Harold. Indeed ſome among them, from a Senſe of Juſtice and Equity, might be diſpleaſed with the new King's uſurping the Crown upon Edgar. But they were far enough from blaming him for ſupplanting the Duke of Normandy, whoſe very Pretenſions were unknown to them. They were ſo little inclined to reject the King they had choſen, that, on the contrary, they had juſt given him ſenſible marks of their Fidelity, by their zeal and readineſs in his defence againſt the King of Norway. On the other hand, the Obſtacles Duke William was naturally to expect from the neighbouring Princes, were no leſs apt to deter him from his purpoſe. Their Intereſt required, that inſtead of promoting his Enterprize, they ſhould oppoſe his growing Power. The French in particular could not, without running counter to the moſt obvious Maxims of Policy, forbear endeavouring to blaſt a Deſign, the Succeſs whereof would infallibly be very prejudicial to them. But ſuppoſing he could have been ſure, the Princes his Neighbours would voluntarily ſhut their eyes againſt their own Intereſt, how could he expect to ſucceed, ſince the States of Normandy refuſed to aſſiſt him in an Undertaking, which to them ſeemed equally unjuſt and raſh? Laſtly, in the execution of this Deſign, it is ſurprizing to ſee, contrary to all expectation, the greateſt Difficulties inſenſibly vaniſh before him, and the very things, which ſeemed moſt oppoſite to his Deſigns, help to accompliſh them. The States of Normandy refuſing him the Aſſiſtance he wants, private Perſons voluntarily drain their Purſes and ſupply him more plentifully than he could have expected from the States. The Court of France lets him act unmoleſted, and even ſuffers the French to aid him in procuring a Crown which might one day render him equal to his Sovereign, or at leaſt enable him to diſpute his Superiority. All the reſt of the neighbouring Princes ſtrive with emulation to forward a Deſign, the ſucceſs whereof muſt be fatal to them. He is aſſiſted by the Earls of Bretagne (1) and Anjou, who a little before were his mortal Enemies. In a word, within the ſpace of a few Months, he has a numerous Army (1), a thouſand Tranſport-Ships, and Money in abundance. Even Harold's late Victory over the King of Norway contributed as much as any one thing to the Duke of Normandy's Succeſs, though ſeemingly it ſhould have deſtroyed all his hopes. In that action, Harold loſt his beſt Troops, diſpleaſed the reſt by with-holding the Spoils, and by his Victory was inſpired with a fatal contempt of the Normans, that proved his ruin. Had it not been for this Contempt, he would have avoided coming to battle, according to his Brother's advice; and ſuffered the Norman Army to dwindle away in an Enemy's Country, where no Aſſiſtance could be found. And if afterwards, Duke William, conſtrained to fight with diſadvantage, had been vanquiſhed, what could he have urged to vindicate the Injuſtice and Raſhneſs of his Attempt? But the event has diſpell'd all theſe Reflections, and determined the Hiſtorians to extol an Action they would infallibly have blamed, had it proved unſucceſsful. Thus, the Foundation on which the Duke of Normandy built his Petenſions, the little reaſon he had to flatter himſelf with the happy Iſſue, and the Eaſe wherewith he accompliſhed his Enterpriſe, equally deſerve our Admiration. Add to all theſe Conſiderations, that, by one ſingle Battle he became maſter of a Country, which neither the Danes, or the Saxons, nor the Romans themſelves, could ſubdue till after numberleſs Engagements, and in the ſpace of ſeveral Ages. All this obliges us to own, he was guided by the hand of the Almighty, the only Giver of Victory, and who exalts and humbles Nations according to his good pleaſure. God, no doubt, was pleaſed to make uſe of this Conqueror, to render the Engliſh Nation more illuſtrious than ever. The Engliſh, hitherto almoſt unknown to the reſt of the World, began after this Revolution to make a conſiderable figure in Europe. This may be ſaid to be the firſt Step by which England is arrived to that height of Grandeur and Glory we behold it in at preſent. This will evidently appear in the whole courſe of the Hiſtory, the principal Events of which I am going to deſcribe. But ſince I am to begin with the Reign of William the Conqueror, it will not be improper to give ſome farther account of this Prince, who was two and forty Years old at the time of the Battle of Haſtings, and had been now three and thirty Years Duke of Normandy. It will be neceſſary therefore, before we enter upon his Reign, to conſider by what degrees Divine Providence raiſed him to the Throne of England, of which his Birth ſeemed to give him no manner of proſpect.

The Affairs of Normandy from Rollo to William the Baſtard. Gul. Gemiticen. Walſing. Upodig. Neuſtr.

Normandy, one of the largeſt and moſt conſiderable Provinces of France, was poſſeſſed by the Normans ever ſince the forced Grant made by Charles the Simple to Rollo the Dane, the firſt Duke. Rollo and his immediate Succeſſors, content with this noble Acquiſition, were leſs ſollicitous about enlarging their Bounds, than ſecuring the Poſſeſſion to their Poſterity. By means of numerous Colonies of their own Nation, who by reciprocal Marriages were incorporated with the Natives, they ſoon cauſed the two Nations to become one People under the common Name of Normans; for ſo the French called the Foreigners lately ſettled in Neuſtria, which from them took alſo the Name of Normandy. The firſt Dukes made it their principal care to gain the affection of their Subjects, by cauſing them to enjoy as much as poſſible, the ſweets of Peace, and governing them with Juſtice and Equity. By this prudent conduct they not only deſtroyed the ſeeds of Rebellion, which might lurk in the hearts of the ancient Inhabitants; but alſo ſcreened themſelves from the ſecret Practices of the Kings of France, who grieved to ſee ſo noble a Province torn from their Monarchy. Accordingly, when the French, at any favourable Juncture, attempted to recover it, they always found the Dukes of Normandy able to defend themſelves with their own Forces, becauſe they were aſſured of the People's affection.

From Rollo to William the Baſtard there were ſeven Dukes, among whom Richard II, who was the fourth, was one of the moſt illuſtrious. His firſt Wife was Judith of Bretagne, by whom he had three Sons, Richard, Robert and William. After the Death of Judith, he made a double Alliance with Canute the Great, giving him his Siſter Emma, Widow of Ethelred II, King of England, and taking himſelf Eſtrith Siſter to that Prince. How honourable ſoever this Match might be, his Love of a young Damſel called Pavia, cauſed him to divorce Eſtrith and marry his Miſtreſs. By this ſecond Wife he had William Earl of Arques, and Mauger Archbiſhop of Roan.

After the death of this Prince, his Son Richard III ſucceeded him, notwithſtanding the Endeavours of his younger Brother Robert to ſupplant him. Robert, not being able to accompliſh his deſigns, was forced to deſiſt; or rather, as ſome affirm, went a ſurer and more ready way to work. 'Tis ſaid, he procured his Brother to be poiſoned, who, after a Reign of two Years, left him the poſſeſſion of the Dukedom he had ſo ardently wiſhed for. Whether Duke Robert's crime was never fully proved, or his juſt Government blotted out the remembrance of it, he found means to gain the affection of his People at home by his Juſtice and Liberality, whilſt his Valour made him reſpected abroad. By his aid it was that Henry I, King of France, took poſſeſſion of the Throne, notwithſtanding the Pretenſions of Robert his younger Brother, who was ſupported by a powerful party. The Intrigues of Queen Conſtance their Mother, who eſpouſed the Intereſt of her younger Son, obliging Henry to implore the aſſiſtance of the Duke of Normandy, he came to him at Roan, and obtained an Aid of five hundred Spear-Men. This firſt Aid was ſoon followed by a more conſiderable Supply, led by the Duke himſelf into France, where he placed Henry on the Throne, compelling the younger Brother to be ſatisfied with Burgundy. Henry, in a grateful ſenſe of ſo ſignal a Service, proteſted, he would have it in eternal remembrance: And to give him an effectual Proof of his Sincerity, annexed to the Duchy of Normandy the Cities of Chaumont and Pontoiſe, then in poſſeſſion of the Crown of France.

It will not be proper here to enter into the particulars of Duke Robert's Wars with ſome rebellious Norman Lords, and with the Duke of Bretagne for refuſing Homage. 'Tis ſufficient to ſay in a word, he was ſucceſsful in taming the Rebels, and reducing the Duke of Bretagne to his Duty. I have already mentioned his deſign of cauſing Juſtice to be done to his Couſins, Sons of Ethelred II, and how his Enterprize miſcarried; wherefore it is needleſs to ſay any more of it.

It is hard to conceive why this Prince who was a Lover of his People, ſhould never think of marrying, though he might plainly foreſee, in caſe he died without Heirs, great Confuſion and Trouble would enſue. There were in Normandy ſeveral Branches of the Ducal Family, who might pretend to the Succeſſion if he died without Children. Conſequently their ſeveral Pretenſions would, very probably, occaſion a Civil War, which Robert might prevent by marrying. Notwithſtanding this, he was reſolved to live ſingle. One would be apt to think, this reſolution was owing to his Inſenſibility for the fair Sex, had we not a proof to the contrary, in his paſſion for a young Damſel, with whoſe graceful Mein he was charmed as he ſaw her dancing. The Damſel, who was called Arlotta (2), a Skinner's Daughter of Falaiſe, thinking herſelf extremely honoured by the Duke's Addreſſes, readily yielded to his Sollicitations. 'Tis ſaid the firſt night the Duke took her to his Bed, ſhe dreamt her Bowels were extended over all Normandy and England. This Dream was very naturally interpreted afterwards, if it be true that it was not forged after the Event. Malmsb. Brompt.

Robert had by this Miſtreſs a Son called William, of whom 'tis related, that, the Moment he was born, laying hold of ſome Straws, he held them ſo faſt, that his Fiſt was forc'd to be unclinch'd before he would let them go. This made the good Women ſay, he would one day prove a great Acquirer, ſince he began ſo early. Robert educated his young Son with all imaginable care, deſigning him for his Succeſſor. But whilſt he was laying out his pains in his Education, the fancy took him to go in Pilgrimage to Jeruſalem. This act of Devotion was looked upon as the effect of his remorſe for the murder of the Duke his Brother, and of his deſire to attone for his Crime by this ſort of Penance. Be this as it will, before he ſet out, he took all neceſſary meaſures to ſecure the Succeſſion to his Baſtard Son. He was very ſenſible how difficult it would be for young William to take poſſeſſion, if the Normans were not prepared beforehand to acknowledge him. And therefore, he ſummoned the States of Normandy, and communicated to them his deſign of going to the Holy Land, conjuring them, in caſe he ſhould never return, to receive, after his death, his young Son William for their Sovereign. The States did all that lay in their power to divert the Duke from his Journey; but finding, he was not to be prevailed upon, gave him their Promiſe with an Oath, if any ill Accident befel him on the road, they would conform to his Will. To convince him of their Sincerity, they ſwore Fealty to William as the preſumptive Heir of the Duke his Father. This Affair being ſettled to Robert's Satisfaction, he appointed Alain Duke of Bretagne, his Relation and Vaſſal, Seneſchal of Normandy, giving him power to govern, in his abſence, with an abſolute Authority. Then he carried his Son to Paris, and delivered him into the hands of the King of France, who took charge of his Education. Before he left the Court of France, he made young William do Homage to the King, as if he had been in actual poſſeſſion of Normandy.

The

Troubles in Normandy.

The Abſence of Duke Robert occaſioned Troubles in his Dominions, which obliged the Duke of Bretagn to uſe ſome Severity, and exert the Authority he was intruſted with. But whilſt he was earneſtly endeavouring to reſtore Peace and Tranquillity, he was taken off by Poiſon. This Accident was ſoon followed with a Report of the Duke's being dead on the road. Notwithſtanding the uncertainty of this News, it was the cauſe of Commotions ſo much the more dangerous, as there was no body in Normandy capable of appeaſing them. They who had the Adminiſtration of Affairs in their hands, were themſelves engaged in Factions, which had been forming ever ſince the Duke's departure, and thereby help'd to increaſe the Confuſion.

Robert's Death.

Whilſt things were in this ill ſtate, ſome of the Duke's Retinue arrived, and confirm'd the news of his death. Upon which ſeveral of the principal Lords, deſcended from the antient Dukes, began to cabal openly, to exclude the Baſtard from the Succeſſion. Plauſible pretences were not wanting; but the States declared, they could not without Perjury violate the Oath they had bound themſelves by. The Reſolution being taken of acknowledging William for Sovereign, Ambaſſadors were diſpatch'd to the King of France to demand the young Prince. After Henry was informed of the Duke of Normandy's Death, the Shame of doing an ill Action, and the deſire of becoming maſter of Normandy, kept him in ſuſpence. He was in hopes the Troubles of that Dukedom would turn to his advantage, and began to lay his Schemes accordingly. However, when he found the States of Normandy had declared in favour of William, he thought proper to defer the execution of his Deſigns, 'till a more convenient Seaſon. He choſe therefore to conceal his Intentions, and ſend home the young Prince. As ſoon as William came to Roan, the States ſwore Fealty to him, and gave him for Governor Raoul de Gace, Conſtable of Normandy.

William is acknowledged Duke of Normandy.

New Troubles in Normandy.

The Troubles were not allay'd by the Arrival of the new Duke. The Lords who claimed the Ducal Crown, could not reſolve to drop their Pretenſions. They imagined the preferring a Baſtard before them, was a manifeſt Injuſtice. But, as they who held the Reins of the Government, were Men of great prudence and intereſt, and thought to be ſupported by France, the Claimants durſt not openly avow their deſigns. Mean time, King Henry burnt with deſire to make an advantage of theſe diſſenſions. The death of Duke Robert made him forget the great Service received from that Prince. In fine, not being able to reſiſt the Temptation any longer, he ſuddenly laid Siege to the Caſtle of Tilliers, to which he had ſome Pretenſions. This Place being very ſtrong and well provided with Ammunition, would have held out a long time, if the Duke's Miniſters had not ordered the Governor to ſurrender it, on Condition the Caſtle ſhould be demoliſhed. Henry very readily agreed to theſe Terms, and commanded the Walls to be actually raz'd; but on ſome ambiguous Clauſe in the Capitulation, cauſed them to be immediately rebuilt. This good Succeſs inſpiring him with great hopes of his Enterprize, he ſeizes alſo upon Argenton. Then marching to Falaiſe, he became maſter of the Town with the ſame eaſe. He would have made farther Progreſs, if Raoul de Gace, having drawn together a powerful Army, had not compelled him to retire. His retreat gave the Conſtable opportunity of retaking Falaiſe, the French not having time to lay in any Stores.

The King of France attacks Duke William.

Revolt of Roger de Treſney.

As ſoon as the Claimants ſaw, the King of France, inſtead of protecting the young Duke, was making War againſt him, they began to ſtir again and proſecuted their reſpective Pretenſions. The firſt that appeared, was Roger de Treſney, Standard-bearer of Normandy, deſcended from an Uncle of Rollo. This Lord, who had amaſs'd great Riches in Spain, where he had long bore Arms againſt the Saracens, returning home during Duke Robert's Abſence, put himſelf at the head of one of the Factions that diſturbed the State. As ſoon as he heard of that Prince's Death, he formed the Project of ſeizing the Dukedom. But his Apprehenſion of the King of France's aſſiſting Duke William prevented him then from purſuing his Deſigns. But this Apprehenſion being removed by the Proceedings of King Henry, he drew ſome Troops together, imagining the Duke's Forces would be ſufficiently employ'd againſt France. But he was preſently after defeated and ſlain by Roger de Beaumont, who commanded the Duke's Army.

Revolt of the Earl of Arques.

William, Earl of Arques, Son of Richard II, by Pavia, was not diſcouraged by this Example. As he found himſelf ſupported by the King of France who put him upon action, he boldly ſent a defiance to the Duke. But the Duke, heading his Army in Perſon, puſh'd him ſo vigorouſly, that he compelled him to ſhut himſelf up in the City of Arques, where he beſieged him. Henry, who had engaged the Earl in this Enterprize, thought himſelf obliged in Honour to raiſe the Siege. To this end he march'd into Normandy, where he received two Overthrows, and was conſtrained at laſt to abandon the Rebel, who, upon the City's being taken, was ſent into Exile.

and of Guy de Burgundy.

Guy of Burgundy, Son of a Daughter to Duke Richard II, was the next that appeared on the ſtage. He had concerted his meaſures ſo well, that he was like to have ſurpriz'd the Duke's Perſon, who was then at Valogones without any Guard, ignorant of what was practiſing againſt him. But a certain Fool, whom the Conſpirators did not miſtruſt, hearing their deſign, travelled all night to give the Duke notice, who had but juſt time to put on his Cloaths, and ride full ſpeed to Falaiſe. What haſte ſoever he might make, he was ſo cloſely purſued, that he muſt have been taken, his Horſe not being able to carry him thither, had he not been aſſiſted by a Gentleman whom he accidentally met on the road. This Conſpiracy ſeemed to him ſo dangerous, that he applied to the King of France for Aid. Henry, either out of Generoſity, or for ſome other unknown Reaſons, being unwilling to ſuffer the young Prince to be oppreſſed, brought him ſome Troops himſelf, which enabled him to give his Enemy Battle. Guy being vanquiſhed and taken Priſoner, Duke William by an Act of Generoſity, which redounded no leſs to his Honour than the Victory, freely gave him his Pardon.

Chron. of Normandy. Mezerai.

and of the Earl of Eu.

William Guerland, Earl of Mortagne, and another William, Earl of Eu, Son to a natural Brother of Richard II, were likewiſe for attempting to diſpoſſeſs the young Duke. But being prevented by his Diligence, they were ſentenced to perpetual Baniſhment.

League of the French King with the Earl of Anjou againſt Duke William.

The Vigour and Conduct ſhown by Duke William during all theſe Troubles, made his Subjects conceive great Hopes of him. His Neighbours began alſo to conſider him as a Prince of diſtinguiſhed Merit, and capable in time of giving them trouble. The King of France, in particular, grew extremely jealous of him, and blamed himſelf exceedingly for aſſiſting him againſt Guy of Burgundy; but to retrieve that Overſight, he raiſed him a freſh Enemy, the Earl of Anjou; whom however he only privately aſſiſted at firſt. Afterwards he openly eſpouſed his Quarrel, and made a fierce War upon the Duke, which laſted ſeveral Years, but in the end turned to the diſadvantage of the two Allies. Duke William gaining two ſucceſſive Battles, they ſued for Peace, which the King of France could not obtain but by the Surrender of the Caſtle of Tilliers, taken by him during the Duke's Minority.

The War ends to his Honour.

He chaſtiſes the Inſolence of the Men of Alençon.

During this War, as the Duke was beſieging Alençon, ſome of the Inhabitants came upon the Walls with Skins in their hands, by way of Reproach, for his Mother being a Skinner's Daughter. He was ſo provoked at this Inſult, that he ſwore by the Splendor of God, his uſual Oath, he would be reveng'd. Some time after, becoming maſter of the Town, he accompliſh'd his Oath by putting out the Eyes, and cutting off the Hands and Feet of two and twenty of the inſolent Burghers.

Death of Henry I. King of France. Philip I. ſucceeds him.

Henry died ſoon after this War. He was ſucceeded by Philip I. his Son, a Minor, under the Guardianſhip of Baldwin, the fifth Earl of Flanders; who had lately given his Daughter Matilda in Marriage to the Duke of Normandy. The relation the Regent ſtood in as well to the King his Pupil, as to the Duke his Son-in-law, made him take all neceſſary Precautions to keep up between the two Princes a good Underſtanding, which laſted many Years.

Duke William deſpoils his Father's, and inriches his Mother's Relations.

Duke William took this Opportunity to extinguiſh all remains of Rebellion among his Subjects. He baniſhed great numbers, who, for the moſt part, retired into Apulia, to Robert Guiſcard, a Norman Gentleman, who made then a great Figure in that Country (1). The Duke's Relations by his Father's Side giving him the moſt diſturbance, he obliged almoſt all of them to quit Normandy. Their Eſtates being confiſcated to his uſe, he enriched with them his Mother's Relations, who 'till then were but in mean Circumſtances. Robert, his uterine Brother, had the Earldom of Mortagne, forfeited by William Guerland. Odo, his Brother, partook alſo of his Bounty, and moreover was made Biſhop of Bayeux. Two of their Siſters were married to the Earls of Aumale and Albemarle.

He deprives his Uncle Mauger.

Mauger his Uncle, Archbiſhop of Roan, was not only concerned in all the Plots againſt the Duke, but had alſo the boldneſs to excommunicate him, on pretence of the too near Relation between him and Matilda his Wife (2). As ſoon as the Duke was in a ſtate of Tranquillity, he reſolved to be revenged on this Prelate. To that end, having aſſembled all the Biſhops of Normandy at Liſieux, he cauſed him to be accuſed before them of ſeveral Miſdemeanors, particularly, his ſelling the conſecrated Chalices to ſupply his Luxury. Upon theſe Accuſations, ſupported with all the Duke's Intereſt, Mauger was ſolemnly deprived and Maurillus elected in his room.

He viſits King Edward.

After Duke William had thus humbled, or diſperſed all that could create him any Diſturbance, his Circumſtances were ſuch, that he might have ſpent his Days in profound Tranquillity, ſince he had nothing to fear either at Home or Abroad. But as he was of a covetous and ambitious Temper, this Tranquillity, which only procured him what he already enjoyed, was far from contenting him. It was probably with a view to new Acquiſitions, that he went to viſit King Edward his Couſin, who had no Children, and perhaps had given him ſome hopes of being his Heir. However this be, it is generally believed, Edward during the Duke's ſtay at the Court of England, promis'd him to make a Will in his favour. But though this Will never appeared, and no proof of it was ever produced by the Duke, it was however, according to all the Hiſtorians, the Pretence, uſed by him, to undertake the Conqueſt of England. Nevertheleſs, in the Manifeſto publiſhed upon his Landing, he ſays not a Word of this ſame Will or Promiſe, of which he could not produce any Evidence. We have ſeen in the foregoing Book, what Duke William did to ſupport his pretended Right 'till the Battle of Haſtings. It is time now to ſee, how he improved the Succeſs of that Day to mount the Throne of England, and the Methods he uſed to ſecure the poſſeſſion, in ſpite of all Oppoſition.

1066. Duke William's Conduct after the Battle of Haſtings. W. Pictav.

It is eaſy to conceive the Conſternation of the Engliſh, after the Loſs of the Battle of Haſtings, and the Death of their King. They were deſtitute of Men, Arms, and Ammunition; but chiefly of a Leader that had a Right to command them, and take Care of their preſent Wants. On the other hand, the victorious Normans were not far from London, the only place where neceſſary Meaſures could be taken to prevent the Calamities the Kingdom was threatned with. Harold's Sons were fled into Ireland. Edgar Atheling was too young, and beſides of too narrow a Genius, to give them any proſpect of Aſſiſtance in this their preſſing Neceſſity. It is true, the Earls Morcar and Edwin were ſtill alive, and retired to London with part of the fugitive Army. But to take proper Meaſures on ſuch an occaſion, more time was required than, probably, the Conqueror would afford them. Thus the Affairs of the Engliſh were in a terrible Confuſion; all the Methods propoſed to free them from Danger, being clogg'd with inſurmountable Difficulties. On the other ſide, the Duke of Normandy, willing to make Advantage of the Terror of the Engliſh, was now marching towards London (1) to increaſe, by his approach, the Trouble and Confuſion that prevailed in the Metropolis. But on a ſudden he altered his Reſolution: He conſidered, though the loſs of a Battle had thrown the Engliſh into aſtoniſhment, yet there was no likelihood of their being entirely diſcouraged: That their Caſe not being yee deſperate, they might eaſily bring into the Field freſh Armies, and try again more than once the fortune of War: That in ſuch a caſe, ſhould he chance to receive but one Overthrow, he had no-where to retreat to, nor any Opportunity of ſending for ſupplies from Normandy. Theſe Reflections made him reſolve to beſiege Dover, before he advanced any farther, to ſecure a Retreat in caſe of Neceſſity, and a Port, where his Convoys might eaſily come from Normandy. This Precaution, even after his Victory, is a clear Evidence of the Boldneſs, or rather Raſhneſs of his Enterpriſe, ſince, had he been vanquiſhed, he would not have had a ſingle Spot in the Kingdom to retire to. He marched therefore directly to Dover, a Place naturally very ſtrong, but that was become more ſo by the great Number of Engliſh Officers and Soldiers fled thither after the Battle. For this Reaſon it might have ſtood a long Siege; but the Conſternation was ſo great, that it ſurrendered in a few Days. As ſoon as the Duke was in poſſeſſion, he ordered the Town to be more ſtrongly fortified, and ſpent eight Days there to forward the Works. After which he marched for London (2).

W. Pictav.

Kent ſends Deputies to him. Thorn.

We find, in ſome Hiſtories, that the Duke as he was marching at the Head of his Army, ſaw at a diſtance a great Multitude of People coming towards him with Boughs in their hands, who, looking like a moving Foreſt, at firſt ſomewhat alarmed him. But this Surpriſe ceaſed, when he found they were Deputies of the County of Kent, attended with great Crowds of People, who were come to aſſure him of the Submiſſion of the County, and withal to demand the Preſervation of their antient Privileges. They who relate this Adventure, add, the Duke received them very graciouſly, and granted their Requeſt. But as William of Poictiers, who was then with the Duke, makes no mention of this Fact, there is reaſon to think it a Forgery (3).

Great Confuſion at London. W. Pictav.

Whilſt the Duke was before Dover, or on his march towards the Thames, the Trouble and Confuſion at London continually increaſed by the diverſity of Opinions preventing them from coming to any Reſolution. Some were for ſubmitting to the Duke without loſs of time: Others believed it more adviſeable to treat with him firſt, and procure ſome aſſurances for the Preſervation of the Privileges, not only of the City, but the whole Kingdom. Some intimated, that things were not yet deſperate; that the Winter, which was begun, might give them time to concert Meaſures for their Defence: and with this view laboured heartily to get Edgar Atheling placed on the Throne. Edwin and Morcar were at the head of this laſt Party. But, how great ſoever their Credit might be, it was not poſſible for them to carry their Point. All they could obtain of the Citizens, was, to ſhut the Gates againſt the Duke, 'till ſome Reſolution was taken. Mean while, the Duke approaching the City, encamped in Southwark, ſeparated from London by the Thames. He hoped his approach would oblige the Londoners to a voluntary Submiſſion, and in that belief lay quiet ſome Days. This Proceeding had a quite contrary Effect to what he expected, Morcar and Edwin took this Opportunity to excite the People to take Arms and ſally out to ſurpriſe the Normans, who were on the other ſide the Bridge. This ſally, which was eaſily repulſed, convinced the Duke that other Meaſures were to be taken, and the City vigorouſly puſh'd, of which he could have but ſmall hopes of being maſter, if he gave the Inhabitants time to recover out of their Conſternation. However, he was under ſome Perplexity, as may well be thought, if it is conſidered, that although he had gained a Battle, he was ſtill very far from his ends. He had but one ſingle Caſtle, ſituated in the utmoſt Bounds of the Kingdom. All the reſt of the Country was againſt him, and there were ſeveral remote Counties, where the Engliſh might draw an Army together without moleſtation. And indeed there was no advancing towards the middle of the Kingdom and leaving London behind him, without being expoſed to manifeſt Danger, and loſing the Communication with Dover, ſo abſolutely neceſſary for him. On the other hand, it was hardly poſſible for him to undertake the Siege of London, during the Winter, beſides that the ſituation of the City would have neceſſarily obliged him to leave a conſiderable Body of Troops on the South-ſide of the Thames, which would very much have weakened his Army. In fine, a Siege of that importance, which probably would have laſted ſeveral months, would have given the Engliſh time to recover, and raiſe Armies in other parts of the Kingdom. By which means he would have been obliged to conquer England inch by inch, as the Romans, Saxons, and Danes had done. But he was by no means in condition to maintain ſo tedious a War. He had therefore properly but one way to compaſs his ends; which was, to take Advantage of the Conſternation of the Londoners, and oblige them, rather by terror than force, to ſubmit to his Laws. With this view it was, that he poſted himſelf at Wallingford, from whence he continually ſent Detachments to ravage the Counties adjoining to London, in order to terrify the Citizens, cut off their Proviſions, and prevent them from laying in Stores (4). At the ſame time, he cauſed Southwark to be reduced to Aſhes, to let them ſee what they were to expect, if they obſtinately perſiſted in the defence of the City. But perhaps all his Efforts would have been ineffectual, if the Clergy, who were at London, had not broken all the Meaſures Morcar and Edwin would have taken to cruſh his Deſigns.

The Aim of theſe two Lords and ſome other zealous Aſſertors of their Country's Liberty, was to place Edgar Atheling on the Throne. They repreſented to the People, that the only way to avoid the preſent Danger, was firſt to come out of that ſtate of Anarchy they were in: That, whilſt there was no body who had a right to command, it was impoſſible to take juſt meaſures to reſiſt the Normans, now at their Gates: But as ſoon as there ſhould be a King, he would ſend Orders into all Parts of the Kingdom

1066. Kingdom to levy Troops, and the Duke of Normandy would then find to his coſt, the gaining a ſingle Battle was not ſufficient to render him Maſter of England; but in caſe they continued inactive, they could expect nothing but total Ruin, and to ſee the Kingdom fall under a foreign Yoke: In a word, that Prince Edgar had an inconteſtable Right to the Crown of England, and could not be refuſed poſſeſſion without great Injuſtice. The Majority of the People approved the propoſal of the two Earls; but the Clergy openly rejected it, not thinking proper to expoſe their Lands and Repoſe to the Chance of War. Edgar was little able to protect them. On the other hand, the Duke of Normandy had the name of a Religious Prince, well-diſpoſed to the Church, and his Enterprize had received the Pope's Approbation. This was ſufficient to oblige all the Clergy, who were then in London with the two Archbiſhops at their head, to cabal among the People in order to hinder Edgar's Election. They were in hopes, their Submiſſion to the Duke of Normandy would turn to a better account than a War, which, in all appearance, would be of long continuance, in caſe a Reſolution was taken to reſiſt him. However this be, or whatever their Motive was, they made ſo ſtrenuous an Oppoſition, that Edwin and Morcar deſpairing of ſucceſs, retired into the North (1), imagining, it would be long before the Duke could follow them thither. They were no ſooner gone, but Stigand, Archbiſhop of Canterbury, repaired to the Duke, then at Berkhamſtead. He was quickly followed by Aldred Archbiſhop of York, the Biſhop of Wincheſter (2), and at laſt by Prince Edgar, who ſuffered himſelf to be guided by their Counſels. The Duke received them in a very civil and courteous manner. He granted all their Requeſts, among which there were ſome that concerned the whole Nation: Nay, it is added, he confirmed his Promiſes by a ſolemn Oath. It is not known what were the Terms theſe Prelates obtained of the Duke; but it is to be preſumed, the Church's Intereſts were not forgotten. Be this as it will, they ſwore Fealty to the Duke, as if he were already their Sovereign, and induced Prince Edgar to do the ſame. Their Example influencing many Perſons of Diſtinction, in a few days the Londoners found themſelves deſtitute of the aſſiſtance of thoſe they could chiefly rely on, in caſe they reſolved upon a vigorous Defence.

The two Archbiſhops and Prince Edgar ſubmit to the Duke. S. Dunelm. Hoved.

Mean time, as the Citizens were ſtill in ſuſpenſe, and as the poſſeſſion of the Metropolis, before the reſt of the Kingdom had taken any Reſolution, would be of the utmoſt Importance to the Duke, he drew nearer the City as if he intended to beſiege it. His approach immediately determined the Magiſtrates, who, finding they were in no condition to defend a City, where all was in confuſion and deſpair, choſe to go and preſent him with the Keys of the Gates. He gave them a very favourable Reception, and, it is ſaid, promiſed with an Oath to preſerve their Privileges. They had gone too far to draw back. The Duke's whole conduct diſcovering he aſpired to ſomething more, they thought it beſt to prevent his Wiſhes, ſince it was not in their power to hinder the Execution of them. To this purpoſe, after adviſing with the Prelates and Lords, who had now ſubmitted, they unanimouſly reſolve to place the Duke on the Throne. Accordingly, they all went in a Body, and made him an offer of the Crown, telling him, They had always been accuſtomed to live under kingly Government, and they knew no Perſon more worthy than him to govern them. The Duke, forgetting on this occaſion, or pretending to forget, that he had entered the Kingdom in arms, by virtue of his pretended Right to the Crown, ſhowed at firſt ſome doubt, whether he ſhould accept of the Honour. He told them, their Offer was of ſo great moment, that he deſired, before he reſolved, to adviſe with his Friends. The Reſult of which was, that he ought by no means to refuſe the Dignity voluntarily offered him by the Engliſh, ſince, by ſuch a Refuſal, he would put it out of his power to reward his Followers, who had engaged in his Cauſe, with the ſole Proſpect of placing him on the Throne. He was entreated therefore not to reject what Providence had been ſo kind as to throw in his way, and what had coſt him ſo much Blood already. The Duke, eaſily yielding to theſe agreeable Sollicitations, returned in Anſwer to the Engliſh Lords and the Magiſtrates of London, That he was ready to conſent to their Requeſt. Accordingly, he accepted the Crown, as their Gift, and tacitly acknowledged a Right of Election in the People of England, though the manner in which he cauſed himſelf to be elected, was no great ſign of his being perſuaded of that Right. And indeed, what Authority could the Magiſtrates of London and a few Biſhops and Lay-Lords have to diſpoſe of the Crown without the Concurrence of the Eſtates? Notwithſtanding the eſſential Defect in this precipitate Election, the Duke appointed Chriſtmas-day following for the Ceremony of his Coronation. Mean while, as this Solemnity was to be performed at London, the Inhabitants whereof he ſuſpected, he ordered a Fortreſs to be run up in haſte, which he garriſoned with Normans. 1066.

His Coronation. W. Pictav.

Stigand, Archbiſhop of Canterbury, was then ſuſpended by the Pope, as an Intruder into that See, in the room of Robert, who was never canonically deprived. But notwithſtanding this Suſpenſion, he exerciſed the Archiepiſcopal Function, the Engliſh not being yet convinced, the Pope's Power was ſo extenſive as he pretended. However, the Duke who was obliged to the Pope, and beſides was willing to avoid the Objections that might be made to his Coronation, if performed by a ſuſpending Biſhop, would not receive the Crown from the hands of Stigand. Aldred therefore, Archbiſhop of York, performed the Ceremony. Before he ſet the Crown on his head, the Archbiſhop, addreſſing to the Engliſh, asked them, whether they would have the Duke of Normandy for their King? All the People conſenting by their Acclamations, the Biſhop of Conſtance put the ſame queſtion to the Normans, who anſwered in the ſame manner as the Engliſh (3). This laſt Circumſtance evidently ſhows the Duke had even then reſolved to make the Engliſh and Normans but one and the ſame People. Otherwiſe, there was no occaſion to ask the Conſent of the Normans, to make him King of England. What followed, plainly diſcovered this to be his real intention. The Archbiſhop of York, continuing the Ceremony, placed the Duke on the Throne, and adminiſtred to him the Oath uſually taken by the Saxon Kings. The Subſtance of the Oath, was, "That he would protect the Church and its "Miniſters; That he would govern the Nation with "equity; That he would enact juſt Laws, and cauſe "them to be ſtrictly obſerved; and that he would forbid "all Rapines and unjuſt Judgments." Malmsbury adds, he promiſed to behave himſelf mercifully to his Subjects, and govern the Engliſh and Normans by the ſame Laws (4). If this Hiſtorian do not deceive us, it may be inferred from this laſt Article, that this Prince had already determined to ſettle the Normans in England. There are Writers however that affirm, King William took no Oath at all, as unwilling to be bound to receive Law from a conquered Nation. But very probably they are miſtaken. King William accepted the Crown as a Gift, and conſequently had no reaſon to diſpenſe with the uſual Oath. In the next place, only the Londoners can be ſaid to have acknowledg'd him for Sovereign. All the reſt of the Kingdom being ſtill to conquer, what likelihood is there that a Prince of his Abilities ſhould, at ſuch a juncture, let the Engliſh ſee he intended to rule with an arbitrary Sway. In fine, tho' the Sirname of Conqueror is given him, it is certain, he never openly pretended to poſſeſs the Crown by right of Conqueſt, but rather, took great care that this Title ſhould never be clearly explained. 1066.

Among the things which, contrary to all appearance, promoted the execution of King William's Undertaking, That which I am now going to relate, is one of the moſt ſurpriſing. He had indeed gained a Battle, which gave him Opportunity of approaching London; and tho' he could ſcarce have taken that City, if the Citizens and the reſt of the Kingdom would have done their Duty, the Gates were opened to him, and the Crown ſet on his head. But as he was crowned without the Advice and Conſent of the reſt of the Kingdom, he ſtill ſeemed to have a great deal to do to compleat the Conqueſt of a Country that reſiſted whole Ages, the Arms of the Romans, Saxons and Danes. And yet, as ſoon as it was known that he was crowned at London, all the reſt of England ſubmitted to the new Sovereign, without any one offering to diſpute with him the poſſeſſion of a Crown, which no body knew by what Title he could claim. Probably, if the Engliſh had reſolved to elect a King of their Nation, whether Edgar or any other, King William would have ſtill found many difficulties to ſurmount. Let us ſuppoſe, for a moment, this King to have drawn together an Army in ſome remote place from London, what a Perplexity would King William have been under? He could not have removed from London and Dover, without a manifeſt Hazard of loſing the capital City; nor have ſtaid at London without giving the Enemies Army time to increaſe. The bare mention of this conſideration ſufficiently ſhows how fortunate King William was

The Reader, of his own accord, may reflect on a thouſand difficulties King William would have found in his way, if the Engliſh had determined, even after the Battle of Haſtings, to make a vigorous ſtand. Moſt certainly, the more this Enterpriſe with all its conſequences are conſidered, the more extraordinary and almoſt ſupernatural it appears.

1067. The King diſtributes Harold's Treaſures. W. Pictav.

The new King's firſt care after his Coronation, was to ſeize on the Treaſure laid up by Harold at Wincheſter. He diſtributed part among the principal Officers of his Army, and part to the Churches and Monaſteries, to gain the reputation of a pious and religious Prince. The Pope had alſo a ſhare, whether he had lent the King Money, or the King was willing to ſhow his Gratitude for Favours received, when he embarked in this Enterpriſe. At the ſame time, he ſent to Rome the late King's Standard, as a ſort of Homage to the Holy See, and a Teſtimony that the Conqueſt of England was undertaken with the Pope's approbation. Harold's Treaſures being thus diſtributed, ways and means were to be deviſed to fill the new King's Coffers. To this end, it was intimated to the Cities, Corporations, and moſt wealthy of the Subjects, that it would not be amiſs to gain the Good-will of their new Maſter by ſome Preſents. Every one chearfully conſenting, theſe Preſents yielded the King a very conſiderable Sum.

The Cities and Corporations make him Preſents.

W. Pictav.

The King's moderation to the Engliſh, in the beginning of his Reign, gave them room to hope they were going to enjoy a ſolid Happineſs under the Government of a Prince who ſeemed to have their Intereſts at heart. Indeed he exhorted the principal Officers of his Army to treat the Vanquiſhed with the Moderation due from one Chriſtian to another. He intreated them to refrain from all kind of Inſults to the Engliſh, leſt by Injuries they ſhould be provoked to revolt. As for the inferior Officers and Soldiers, he publiſhed ſevere Orders againſt ſuch as ſhould violate the Chaſtity of the Women, or give the leaſt cauſe of complaint to the Natives. Then he confirmed by a publick Edict the People's Privileges, and all the Promiſes he had made in that reſpect. If we were to judge of Princes by their Manifeſto's, or the expreſſions in their Edicts, we ſhould be apt to imagine, they always make Juſtice and Equity the ſole Rule of their Conduct. But their Actions too frequently ill correſpond with their Words. Theſe ſorts of publick Acts ſeldom fail however of producing a preſent Effect, which is generally the only end propoſed. King William found the Engliſh diſpoſed to truſt to his magnificent Promiſes. They were ſo far from taking any meaſures for the Preſervation of their Liberties, that they ſuffered themſelves to be ſeduced by this ſeeming Indulgence. Theſe happy beginnings made them believe, the Conqueror, in imitation of Canute the Great, who behaved in the ſame manner, would uſe his utmoſt endeavours to gain the People's Affection, that he might enjoy his Conqueſt in Peace.

He protects the Engliſh from violence, and confirms their Privileges.

He is jealous of them. W. Pictav.

How great a regard ſoever the King ſhowed for the Engliſh, he could not forbear miſtruſting them, perſuaded as he was, that their Submiſſion proceeded rather from fear than good-will. A few days after his Coronation he retired from London to Berking (1), not daring to ſtay in that great City, whoſe Fidelity he ſuſpected. But as he was not more ſure of the reſt of the Nation, he placed ſtrong Garriſons in Haſtings, Dover, and Wincheſter, to take away from the Engliſh the deſire of ſhaking off their new Yoke. Mean while, theſe Precautions had no ill effect on their Minds. They conſidered them as abſolutely neceſſary, in the beginning of ſo great a Revolution, and were not at all alarmed at them. On the contrary, they who had hitherto refuſed to acknowledge the new King, came and ſubmitted to him in Crowds. Edwin and Morcar, who had begun to concert meaſures for the Defence of their Country, altered all their Projects. As they were convinced of the King's Sincerity, like the reſt of their Countrymen, they went and ſwore fealty to him at Berking (2). He forgot nothing that could help to keep them in this mind. He not only aſſured them of his Protection, but even in their preſence beſtowed on Prince Edgar large Poſſeſſions (3), who was the Idol of the Engliſh, and generally ſtiled England's Darling.

1067. Edwin and Morcar ſubmit. S. Dunelm.

The Victory of Haſtings was too glorious for the King to neglect to tranſmit the Memory of it to Poſterity. For that purpoſe he laid the Foundations of a Church and Abbey, in the very place where Harold was ſlain (4), and ordered, when they ſhould be finiſhed, the Church to be dedicated to St. Martin (5), and the Monaſtery called Battle-Abbey (6). Though the deſire of Prayers for his own and Harold's Soul was the Pretence he uſed to make this Foundation, probably Vain-Glory had no leſs a ſhare in it than Devotion. The three firſt months of this new Reign paſſed in this manner to the mutual Satisfaction of the Engliſh and Normans. The former believed they were no great Loſers by the great Revolution, and the latter liv'd in hopes the King would perform the Promiſes made them, when they engaged in his Service.

The Founding of Battle-Abbey. M. Paris.

King William's Precautions procuring him an univerſal Submiſſion, he thought his happineſs incompleat, if he had not the pleaſure to go to Normandy, and appear in his new Grandeur. This Journey was not only unneceſſary, but ſeemingly very dangerous, in the beginning of an Empire eſtabliſhed by Arms. He imagined however he could prevent all Revolts during his abſence by two Precautions. Firſt, by placing ſtrong Norman Garriſons in all the Caſtles. Secondly, by carrying along with him ſuch of the Engliſh Lords as were moſt ſuſpected. Of this number were Prince Edgar, Stigand, Morcar, Edwin, Waltheoff Son of Siward, formerly Earl of Northumberland, with ſeveral others of the prime Nobility. Theſe Lords were not over-pleaſed with the Honour he did them, being ſenſible he carried them into Normandy but as ſo many Hoſtages, and to add to the Glory of his Triumph. However, they were forced to comply, for fear of giving him occaſion to ſuſpect them by an unſeaſonable Oppoſition to his Will. Before he left England, he committed the Government of the Kingdom to his Brother Odo Biſhop of Bayeux, and William Fitz-Osbern (7). There was no end of the Rejoicings among his old Subjects upon his arrival in Normandy. He ſpent his Eaſter (8) at Feſcamp, where the French Ambaſſador (9), attended with a numerous Retinue of Nobles, came to congratulate him in his Maſter's Name upon his new Dignity. On this occaſion, the King affected to appear before the French with all the magnificence he thought capable of advancing the Luſtre of his Glory. He paſſed all that Summer, and part of the following Winter in Normandy, where he ſeemed to forget his New, amidſt the Acclamations of his Old Subjects.

Whilſt he was giving the Normans marks of his Affection by his ſtay among them, his Abſence proved fatal to England. Odo his Brother, and William Fitz-Osbern, who governed the Kingdom, abuſed their Authority without any diſcretion (10). Wholly taken up with enriching themſelves by all manner of means, inſtead of protecting the Engliſh who made their complaints to them, they not only ſuffered them to be grieved with a thouſand Injuſtices, but oppreſſed them by continual Acts of Tyranny themſelves. To ſee theſe two Regents proceed with ſo little caution, one would have thought they had Orders to ſtir up the People to revolt, on purpoſe to make them incur the Puniſhment. The moſt prudent however preſerved their Allegiance, in a belief that the King, at his return, would rectify theſe Diſorders. But others, more impatient, were of opinion, they ought to take the advantage of his Edric's Revolt. Flor. Wor. Hoved. The King returns.

Notwithſtanding this Example, Edric, an Engliſh Lord (2), to whom Hiſtorians give the Sirname of Foreſter, took up Arms in the County of Hereford, and barbarouſly uſed all the Normans that fell into his hands. News being brought the King he immediately embarks for England (3), committing the Government of Normandy to Matilda his Wife, and Robert his eldeſt Son. His return appeaſed the Storm raiſed by his Abſence. But theſe two Attempts filled him with ſo many Suſpicions of all the Engliſh in general, that he began from that time to conſider them as ſo many ſecret Enemies, who ſought an Occaſion to revolt. This Opinion of his was not groundleſs. When one conſiders his Temper, and how the Engliſh ſtood affected towards him, it is eaſy to conceive, the mutual Confidence, neceſſary for their common Tranquility, could hardly ſubſiſt. The King was naturally miſtruſtful and rigid. On the other hand, his great Armament had plunged him deeply in Debt. Beſides, he was under a Promiſe of liberally rewarding the Officers who had engaged in his Service, and all this muſt be done at the Expence of the Engliſh. To this may be added, he was naturally covetous, greedy of Money, not to expend but hoard it in his Coffers. In fine, his Partiality to his own Nation was exceſſive, and prevented him often from giving Ear to the Complaints of the Engliſh againſt the Normans, who made a very ill Uſe of the King's Favour. On the other Side, the Engliſh were extremely prejudiced againſt the Normans. This Prejudice, begun in the Reign of King Edward, and fomented by Earl Goodwin and his Son Harold, was farther encreaſed ſince the late Revolution. How careful ſoever the King was to recommend Moderation to the Normans, there was no hindering them from abuſing the Superiority, their Victory gave them over the Engliſh, and inſulting them in their Misfortunes. This was not very proper to maintain a good intelligence between the two Nations. Beſides, the King had built his Right to the Crown upon ſo ſlight a Foundation, that the Engliſh muſt have conſidered him as a greedy and ambitious Prince, who had formed the Project of his Enterprize upon England, from the ſole Motive of gratifying his Paſſions. In a word, the Adminiſtration of the two Regents during his Abſence, gave Occaſion to think, they would not have carried their Exceſſes and Rapines to that Height, had they not been aſſured of their Maſter's Approbation. However, the Conſideration of the Mildneſs of his Government for the three firſt Months of his Reign, had in ſome Meaſure cauſed theſe Reflections to vaniſh, and diſſipated all their Fears. But when they found, after his Return, he not only neglected to puniſh the Regents, but even approved of their Conduct, they could not contain any longer. They every where ſpread their Complaints and Murmurs, and openly ſhewed their Diſcontent. Then it was, that the King's Suſpicions daily increaſing, made him reſolve to be on his Guard, and uſe all poſſible Means to prevent the Diſcontent of the Engliſh from breaking out into a Flame. As his Temper inclined him to Severity, his Methods were rigorous. To which he was alſo prompted by the Normans, whoſe Intereſt it was that he ſhould ſubdue the Engliſh by Force, rather than gain them by fair Means. This is the moſt that can be ſaid in his Favour, though there are ſome, who charge him with a ſettled Deſign of reducing England to a State of Slavery, before ever he received any Provocation. Be this as it will, the Confidence between the King and his new Subjects was ſoon broken (4), and from that Time the King thought only of uſing all proper Means to eſtabliſh himſelf on the Throne, without nicely examining whether thoſe Means were conſonant to Juſtice and Equity.

Not long after the King's Return (5), Maltida his Queen came into England, and was crowned with great Solemnity, this ſame Year She brought into the World a Son, named Henry. Her other Sons were born in Normandy, namely, Robert, Richard, and William, the eldeſt of whom was about Twelve Years old.

The King had hitherto delayed to ſatisfy thoſe who had voluntarily aſſiſted him in his Expedition into England. Beſides the Stipends due to them, they expected to be rewarded in Proportion to their Services, and the Power he had acquired by their Means. His ordinary Revenues not being ſufficient for this, there was a Neceſſity of having recourſe to the Engliſh, whoſe Misfortune it was to be vanquiſhed. To this End, he bethought himſelf of an Expedient, which could not but be very ungrateful to them. And that was, to revive Dane-gelt (6), aboliſhed by the Confeſſor, which brought to their Remembrance the Calamities they had ſuffered under a foreign Power. He plainly foreſaw, the People would be extremely diſſatisfied, and therefore endeavoured to prevent the ill Effects of their Diſcontent, by careſſing the principal Engliſh Lords, as far as his reſerved Temper would permit. He was moſt apprehenſive of Earl Edwin, who by his Birth, Honours, and perſonal Merit was in great Credit with his Countrymen. In order to prevent the Earl's uſing the preſent Occaſion to raiſe new Commotions, he thought proper to ſecure him to his Intereſt, by promiſing him one of his Daughters in Marriage. Edwin was very well pleaſed with the Offer, and inſtead of fomenting the Diſſatisfaction of the Engliſh, did all he could to appeaſe them. Aldred, Archbiſhop of York, was not ſo eaſily managed. This Prelate had entertained ſo great an Opinion of the King, that he was continually ſpeaking in his Praiſe. But when he ſaw him begin to pull off the Mask, by renewing a Tax ſo odious to the Nation, he was quite of another Mind. He ſent one to repreſent to him in his Name, the Injury he was doing the Engliſh, and the Inconveniencies that might follow. The King was offended with this Remonſtrance, and ſharply rebuked the Perſon that dared to deliver it. It is ſaid, Aldred was ſo ſenſibly touched with this Proceeding, that he could not forbear curſing the King and all his Race. There was Danger of the Archbiſhop's Reſentment occaſioning ſome Troubles in the North. At leaſt the King ſeemed to be uneaſy on that Account, by his ſending one of his Officers to endeavour to appeaſe him. But the Death of Aldred, which happened at that Time, freed the King from his Fears, and Dane-gelt was levied with all the Rigour imaginable. From thence-forward nothing was heard but Murmurings and Complaints, which incenſing the King, cauſed him to conſider the Engliſh but as ſo many Rebels, as they, on their Side, looked upon him under the odious Idea of a Conqueror.

Before I enter upon the Relation of the Troubles in this Reign, it will be proper to remark, the Hiſtorians are very much divided concerning the Cauſes that produced them. Some caſt the Blame on the Engliſh, and intimate the King uſed not Severity till he found milder Means were ineffectual. Others maintain, the King's ill Uſage of the Engliſh was the ſole Cauſe of their Revolts. To decide this Queſtion, it would be neceſſary to examine the Extent of a Prince's Power that had acquired the Poſſeſſion of the Crown in the manner we have ſeen, and how far the Obedience of a Nation was due, who had ſubmitted partly by Compulſion, partly of their own Accord. But upon theſe very Points, there would be perhaps no leſs Diverſity of Opinions. It is ſufficient therefore to obſerve, that among the Hiſtorians who have writ of William the Conqueror, ſome have ſtudiouſly diſplayed all his good Qualities, and but ſlightly touched upon his Faults. Others have endeavoured to miſrepreſent all his Actions, and aggravate even ſuch as may be eaſily juſtified. So far is certain, the Engliſh were ill-treated in his Reign. This the greateſt Sticklers for the Conqueror and his Race cannot deny, but alledge in his Excuſe, the Neceſſity he was under of guarding againſt the Engliſh, ever prone to revolt. Others, on the contrary, aſcribe the Ill-treatment of the Engliſh ſolely to the avaricious Temper of the King, and affirm, their Revolts were entirely owing to their Deſpair. Amidſt theſe various Opinions, the Courſe I ſhall take, will be, plainly to relate ſuch Facts as are uncontеſted, without making any Reflections, that the Reader may be at Liberty to judge as he ſhall think proper.

Divers Opinions about the King's Conduct to the Engliſh.

ſhake off a foreign Yoke, which to them ſeemed inſupportable. The Inſurrections began in the Weſtern Parts, where the Inhabitants of Exeter refuſed to take their Oath to the King and admit a Norman Garriſon (1). William, ſenſible of what Importance it was to put a Stop to this Evil before it ſpread any farther, marched in the midſt of Winter to reduce Exeter to Obedience. Upon his Approach, he was met by ſome of the principal Citizens, to petition him for Pardon in the Name of the Corporation, and give him Hoſtages. But, whilſt the Deputies were with the King, the ordinary Sort of Townſmen being ſuperior, diſapproved of their Proceedings, and reſolved to ſtand upon their Defence. Githa, Mother to King Harold, who was then in the City, encouraged the Inhabitants in their Reſolution, and probably, was the Perſon that put them upon it. Mean-time, the King being too far advanced to retire with Honour, found himſelf obliged to beſiege the Town in Form, notwithſtanding the Sharpneſs of the Winter. The Approaches being made, and the battering Engines beginning to play, the Citizens ſaw no other Remedy but to implore the King's Mercy. How much ſoever the King was bent to make an Example of them, he yielded to the Intreaties of the Clergy, who were very urgent for their Pardon (2). Githa had the good Fortune to eſcape into Flanders with a great quantity of Money. To prevent a ſecond Inſurrection, William ordered a Caſtle to be built in the City, and left it to the Care and Management of Baldwin, Son of Earl Gilbert, with a Norman Garriſon.

They ſubmit, and are pardoned.

The King builds a Caſtle.

He ſeeks means to pay his Debts.

The King could no longer delay the Payment of his Debts, and the Rewards ſo often promiſed to his Troops. The Sums raiſed by the late Tax of Dane-gelt, which at firſt were deſigned for this Uſe, had been paid into the King's Treaſury, and he could not bear the Thoughts of parting with the Money again. He believed it abſolutely neceſſary to have a Reſerve upon any ſudden Occaſion; eſpecially as the Diſcontents of the Engliſh gave him room to dread a general Revolt. And therefore, without meddling with that Money, other means were to be uſed, which very much inflamed the Diſcontent of the Engliſh. Commiſſioners were ſent into all the Counties, to enquire who ſided with Harold, and confiſcate their Eſtates. The Engliſh loudly exclaimed againſt this ſeemingly very unjuſt Enquiry. They alledged, when they took Arms for Harold, that Prince was in actual Poſſeſſion of the Throne, having been elected at a Time when William's Pretenſions to the Crown were even unknown. That before the Battle of Haſtings, they had never taken their Oath to the Duke of Normandy, and conſequently their Eſtates could not be liable to Confiſcation for bearing Arms againſt him. That beſide, ſuppoſing they were guilty, they had made ample Amends for their Fault by ready Submiſſion, which the King had accepted of; and even promiſed to protect them in their Rights and Privileges. Theſe Reaſons were very ſtrong. But on this Occaſion, the King acted with a view to Politicks rather than Juſtice. His Intent was not to puniſh them for their pretended Crime, but to have a plauſible Pretence to raiſe Money, and withal to put it out of their Power to hurt him, by depriving them of their Eſtates, a Thing, he judged abſolutely neceſſary for his Safety and Quiet. Accordingly this Fact is ſlightly paſſed over by the King's Friends, and by way of Diverſion, an Act of Juſtice done by the King on this Occaſion, is mightily extolled, namely, the reſtoring a confiſcated Eſtate to an Engliſh Lord, who proved he was never in Arms for Harold (3). However, we may be aſſured, this was one of the moſt remarkable Events of this Reign, ſince the confiſcated Lands paſſed into the Hands of the Normans and other Foreigners, who thereby became more conſiderable in England than the Engliſh themſelves. From theſe deſcended many noble Families now in being. However this be, theſe Confiſcations were of great Service to the King upon two Accounts. Firſt, as they enabled him to pay his Debts, and reward his Followers. Secondly, as they gave him an Opportunity of filling the Counties with ſuch as were devoted to him, and whoſe Intereſt it was to ſupport him in the Throne.

Whilſt the King was thus guarding againſt the Engliſh, he daily forfeited their Eſteem and Affection, and naturally led them to deviſe means for the Recovery of their Eſtates. Edwin, Earl of Cheſter, one of the moſt conſiderable among them, thought it his Duty to attempt the reſtoring of the almoſt deſperate Affairs of his Country. The King had amuſed him with Hopes of one of his Daughters; but there was no Likelihood he intended to perform his Word. On the Contrary, the King ſeemed to want only ſome Pretence to involve him in the ſame Ruin with the reſt. Morcar, his Brother, Earl of Northumberland, who was in much the ſame Situation, very readily engaged in the Plot. As theſe two Lords had a very great Intereſt in the Kingdom, they ſoon raiſed an Army which was reinforced by Blethwin King of Wales, their Nephew, with a good number of Troops (4). The King had Reaſon to fear this Revolt would become general, unleſs he timely oppoſed its Beginnings. Accordingly he drew his Forces together with the utmoſt Expedition, before the Evil ſpread any farther. In his March towards the Rebels, he fortified the Caſtle of Warwick, and made Henry de Beaumont Governour, who was alſo the firſt Earl of Warwick (5). At the ſame Time he built likewiſe Nottingham-Caſtle (6), to ſecure a Retreat in caſe of Neceſſity, by means of theſe two Places. Having taken theſe Precautions, he continued his March towards the North, to engage the Rebels, or beſiege York, which had ſided with them.

Mean-time, the two Earls hoping the reſt of the Kingdom would follow the Example of the North, were very much deceived in their Expectations. The King's great Diligence, and the Superiority of his Forces breaking all their Meaſures, they found themſelves unable to reſiſt him. In this Extremity, they had but two Ways to take, either to fly the Kingdom, or ſubmit to the King's Mercy. They choſe the laſt, and found their Account in it. How much ſoever the King might be incenſed, he very readily pardoned them, with a View to reclaim the Engliſh by this Act of Clemency. He purſued however his March towards York, the Inhabitants whereof, little able to ſuſtain the Burden of the War alone, came out to meet him, and delivered up the Keys of their City. By this Submiſſion they were pardoned as to corporal Puniſhments; but were forced to pay a large Fine, and had the Mortification to ſee a Caſtle built in their City (7), and garriſoned with Norman Soldiers. Archil, a Northumbrian Lord, who had been concerned in the Revolt, was alſo received into Favour upon delivering his Son in Hoſtage (8). Egelwin, Biſhop of Durham, made his Peace likewiſe upon the ſame Account (9).

York ſurrenders; where the King builds a Caſtle.

The King's Clemency to the Heads of the Rebels might have a good Effect, if at the ſame Time that he pardoned ſome, he had not puniſhed others who were much leſs guilty. He ordered great Numbers to be ſhut up in Priſon, who had no Hand at all in the late Inſurrection (10), and thereby gave Occaſion to think the Mercy ſhewn to the Leaders was only a Strain of his Policy. This Conduct ſpread a Terror throughout the Kingdom, which was ſtill increaſed, when Caſtles were ſeen building at Lincoln, Huntington, Cambridge, which were evidently deſigned to keep the Engliſh in Awe. Morcar and the other Northumbrian Lords (11), dreading their Puniſhment was only deferred till a more convenient Seaſon, retired into Scotland. Earl Goſpatric was under the ſame Apprehenſions, and inſtilled them into Prince Edgar, who by his Advice, fled to the Court of Scotland, with his Mother and Siſters (12). Malcolm Canmore (13), who was then on the Throne, received them with the Reſpect due to their Rank, and conſidering their 1068. Sax. Ann. Malcolm marries Edgar's Sister.

Birth

Birth rather than their Fortune, married ſoon after Margaret Edgar's eldeſt Siſter. From this marriage ſprung Matilda, Grandmother to Henry II. King of England, in whoſe Perſon the Saxon and Norman Royal Families were united.

1069. The King takes from the Engliſh their Arms, and eſtabliſhes the Curfew. Pol. Virg.

The King was not ſorry to ſee himſelf thus rid of his ſecret Enemies, who gave him much leſs uneaſineſs being in Scotland, than if they had ſtaid in England. However, the Flight of theſe Lords diſcovering how the Engliſh ſtood affected towards him, he reſolved to take all poſſible meaſures to ſcreen himſelf from their Reſentment. For that purpoſe, he took two Precautions which were equally inſupportable to them. The firſt was to take away their Arms (1). The ſecond to forbid them any Lights in their Houſes after eight a-Clock. At which hour a Bell was rung to warn them to put out their Fire and Candle, under the penalty of a great Fine for every offence. The ſound of this Bell, called the Curfew, was for a long while very grating in the ears of the Engliſh. When they reflected on the Sweets of Liberty, enjoyed under their antient Kings, they could not without extreme Grief behold themſelves reduced to ſuch Slavery. If this Order was not moſt punctually obſerved, they were ſure to be immediately puniſhed as if guilty of ſome heinous Crime. This Bell therefore was as a Signal, which being repeated every day, conſtantly put them in mind of their Slavery. This Oppreſſion joined to a thouſand others which they daily ſuffered from the hands of the King, as well as from the Foreigners, imbittered their Lives and made them deplore their ſad and helpleſs condition. In this manner ſeveral Hiſtorians repreſent the State of the Engliſh at that Time.

Harold's Sons make a Deſcent. S. Dunelm. Flor. Worc. Malmſb. p. 104.

Whilſt the King was thus guarding againſt the ſecret Practices of his Subjects, Goodwin, Edmund and Magnus, Sons of Harold, made a deſcent in Somerſetſhire. The only Oppoſition, they met with, was from Ednoth, formerly Maſter of the Horſe to the King their Father, who was willing to give King William a proof of his Fidelity by encountring theſe Princes. His Zeal for the new King proved fatal to him, for he was ſlain in the Battle; after which, they retired laden with Booty.

Engliſh and Normans complain one of another.

If the Hiſtorians on the ſide of the Engliſh may be credited, England was then in a pitiable ſtate. The Normans ſupported by the King's Favour and Protection, daily committed Outrages upon the Engliſh, for which theſe laſt could expect no Redreſs. Others, more Friends to the Normans than the Engliſh, aſſure us, the Engliſh vexed that the King's meaſures ſhould put it out of their power to ſhake off a Yoke which they bore with extreme Impatience, found fault with the Normans in general. They add, ſcarce a day paſſed but the dead Bodies of aſſaſſinated Normans were found in the Woods or Highways, without any poſſibility of diſcovering the Authors of theſe Murders, ſo firmly did the Engliſh ſtand by one another. In all appearance the King was perſuaded, the Engliſh were wholly to blame, ſince he publiſhed a ſevere Edict, ordering that when a Norman ſhould be ſlain or robbed, the Hundred where the Act was done ſhould be reſponſible for the Crime, and pay a large Fine. This Law was not new to the Engliſh. From the time of Alfred the Great, it had been in force in the Kingdom (2). But what extremely provoked them, was, that this Edict was made in favour of the Normans only.

Edict in favour of the Normans. Leges Will. cap. 53.

Several Normans quit England. Ord. Vital.

How gracious ſoever the King might be to the Foreigners, many of them deſired leave to return home (3). The King readily granted their Requeſt, paying the Arrears due to them, and rewarding them beyond their expectation. All this was done at the expence of the Engliſh, on whom were levied the Sums neceſſary to defray this charge.

Occaſions of complaint continually encreaſed on both ſides. The King complained, the Engliſh appeared ready upon all occaſions to rebel; and the Engliſh thinking themſelves unjuſtly oppreſſed, loudly murmured at it. The Northumbrians were the moſt impatient. We have already ſeen in ſeveral Parts of this Hiſtory, that they were wont to be, as it were, their own Maſters, and could not bear a ſtate of Slavery. The ſame Spirit ſtill reigned among them. They could not refrain expoſtulating upon the leaſt occaſion, and often uſhered in their Complaints with ſome Inſurrection. The turbulent Temper of theſe People, and the Neighbourhood of Scotland, creating ſome dread in the King, he reſolved to appoint them for Governor, Robert Cumin, a Norman Lord, whoſe rough Diſpoſition ſeemed proper to tame their Fierceneſs. They heard this News juſt as a Project of calling in the Danes was going to be executed. Some of them who had taken refuge in Denmark, had perſuaded King Sweyn, he might eaſily conquer England (4). Nay, they had brought Aſſurances from the Northumbrians, that they would aſſiſt him in his Undertaking. Whereupon Sweyn fitted out a Fleet of two hundred Sail (5), which was ready to put to Sea when Cumin with ſeven hundred Normans, came and took poſſeſſion of his Government. As his Arrival might prove very prejudicial to the Deſigns formed in the North, the principal Contrivers of the Plot reſolved to rid themſelves of ſo troubleſome an Inſpector with his Attendants. Though he had notice of their Inrent (6), he thought it ſo little in their power to hurt him, that he neglected the Intelligence. Mean time the Conſpirators privately drawing ſome Troops together, came to Durham, where Cumin lay in a careleſs manner, and put him and his Norman Followers all to the Sword (7). Preſently after arrived the Daniſh Fleet under the command of Osbern, Brother to the King of Denmark (8). Upon News whereof all the Malecontents went and joined the Daniſh General, who had now landed his Troops (9). Edgar Atheling, Goſpatric, Merlefweyn (10), and all the other Lords who had retired into Scotland, brought him Reinforcements, which rendered his Army very formidable. As all Northumberland was for the Danes, and the King had not in thoſe Parts any Forces capable of withſtanding ſo numerous an Army, Osbern marched directly to York. The Norman Garriſon upon the approach of the Danes, reſolved to hold out to the laſt Extremity, not doubting but the King would come to their Relief with all poſſible expedition. In this expectation they ſet Fire to the Suburbs at the foot of the Caſtle, that the Houſes might not be of Service to the Beſiegers. But the Fire ſpreading farther than was deſigned, a great part of the City was reduced to aſhes. The Cathedral-Church, the Monaſtery of St. Peter, and a famous Library begun by Archbiſhop Ecbert about the Year 800, entirely periſhed in the Flames. Mean while the Danes taking advantage of the Confuſion, cauſed by this Accident, entered the City without oppoſition. As ſoon as they were maſters of it, they attacked the Citadel ſo vigorouſly, that they took it at the firſt Aſſault, and put the Garriſon to the Sword (11). After this, the Daniſh General underſtanding the King was preparing to march againſt him, went and encamped in an advantagious Poſt (12), leaving in York Earl Waltheff with an Engliſh Garriſon.

The News of this Invaſion ſomewhat ſhook the King's reſolution. He was afraid the Danes were called in by a general Combination. Poſſeſſed with this Notion, he durſt not quit the Heart of the Kingdom, for fear his abſence would give the reſt of the Male-contents an opportunity to riſe. On the other hand it was no leſs dangerous to neglect the Affairs of the North, which might be attended with ill conſequences. In this perplexity, he believed it adviſeable, before all things, to endeavour to pacify the Engliſh by ſome Acts which ſeemed proper to that end.

He

1069. He recalled ſeveral whom he had baniſhed, ſet others at Liberty, and affected by ſome inſtances of ſeverity to repreſs the Inſolence of the Normans (1). His Fears being ſomewhat abated by the good effects of theſe Proceedings, he ſent the Queen and the Princes into Normandy, and then marched againſt the Danes. He was ſo provoked with the Northumbrians, that he was heard to ſwear by God's Splendour, he would not leave a Soul alive. As ſoon as he entered Yorkſhire, he began to execute his Threats by terrible ravages. Mean time the Danes kept their Poſt, where he durſt not attack them, well knowing, by hazarding a Battle, he ſtaked his all againſt little or nothing. To extricate himſelf out of this difficulty, he believed the beſt courſe he could take would be to bribe the General by Preſents. For that purpoſe he ſent private Emiſſaries to offer him a large Sum of Money, with leave to plunder the Country along the Sea Coaſt, provided he would depart when Winter was over. This Negotiation ſucceeding to his wiſh, Osbern retired in the beginning of the Spring, for which he was ſeverely puniſhed by the King his Brother (2). The Danes being gone, The King marched to York to beſiege the City, defended by an Engliſh and Scotch Garriſon, under the command of a brave Governor (3). This was Earl Walthoff, who by his Courage and Conduct, rendered the Siege ſo long and difficult, that the King began to deſpair of Succeſs, when the want of Proviſions obliged the beſieged to capitulate. How incenſed ſoever the King might be, he readily granted honourable Terms to this brave Governor, whoſe Valour he had ſo often admired during the Siege. He was not ſatisfied with ſhewing him this mark of his Eſteem, but gave him in marriage his own Niece, Daughter to the Counteſs of Albemarle (4). Some time after, he made him alſo Earl of Northampton and Huntingdon, and laſtly of Northumberland. He received likewiſe into favour Earl Goſpatric; but puniſhed ſeverely the reſt of the Officers and Soldiers of the Garriſon, laying a heavy Fine upon the Citizens of York. As ſoon as the Siege was over. and the King found it in his power to be revenged of the Northumbrians, he ravaged their Country in ſo mercileſs a manner, that for ſixty Miles together, between York and Durham, he did not leave a ſingle Houſe ſtanding (5). He ſpared not even the Churches and other publick Edifices. This is what William of Malmsbury, though a Norman, durſt not deny. His Pretence for thus laying the Country waſte, was, to prevent a ſecond Daniſh Invaſion. But the method he took, was a clear evidence, it was to glut his revenge, and ſtrike a Terror into the reſt of the Kingdom, It is impoſſible, according to Hiſtorians, to deſcribe the Miſeries of the northern Counties. The Lands lying untilled (6), and the Houſes being deſtroyed, People died in heaps, after having endeavoured to prolong a wretched Life, by eating of the moſt unclean Animals, and ſometimes even human Fleſh (7.)

1070. The king treats the Engliſh very ill.

The Step lately taken by the Engliſh in calling the Danes into the Kingdom, thoroughly convinced the King, he ſhould never be in peaceable Poſſeſſion of the Crown till he had intirely put it out of their Power to execute the Projects formed againſt him. This made him reſolve to humble in ſuch a manner all that had any Intereſt with the People, that they ſhould not be able to make any conſiderable Effort. It is true, many innocent Perſons were to ſuffer in the execution of this Deſign. But at that time, it is certain the King thought only of his own ſafety, without troubling himſelf, whether the means he made uſe of were conſiſtent with Juſtice. To accompliſh his ends, he ſuddenly removed the Engliſh from ſuch Poſts as gave them any Power over their Countrymen. After which he diſpoſſeſſed them of all the Baronies and the Fiefs of the Crown in general, and diſtributed them to the Normans and other Foreigners who had followed him into England. But as theſe laſt were not ſo many in number as thoſe that were deprived of their Eſtates, he was obliged to load them, as I may ſay, with Benefits. in order to draw all the Crown-Lands out of the hands of the Engliſh. We may be ſatisfied by the following inſtances, how profuſe the King was in this Diſtribution. Robert, his uterine Brother, had the Earldom of Cornwall, in which were two hundred and eighty eight Manors (8), beſides five hundred aad fifty eight (9), which he poſſeſſed in other Counties. Odo, Biſhop of Bayeux, his other Brother, was made Earl Palatine of Kent, and Juſticiary of England. This Prelate had one hundred and eighty Fiefs in Kent alone (10), and two hundred and fifty five in ſeveral other Places. William Fitz-Osbern was rewarded with the whole Earldom of Hereford (11). Hugh Lupus of Almonches the King's Siſter's Son, was preſented by his Uncle with the County Palatine of Cheſter, with all the Royal Prerogatives, to hold it in full Sovereignty as the King himſelf held his Crown. Alan Fergeant Duke of Bretagne, the King's Son-in-law, had all Earl Edwin's Eſtate with the ſame Privileges as were granted to the Earl of Cheſter (12). Roger de Montgomery had firſt Arundel, Chicheſter, and afterwards Shropſhire. Walter Giffard had Buckinghamſhire, and William Warner, the County of Surrey. Eudes, Earl of Blois, was put in poſſeſſion of the Lordſhip of Holderneſs. Ralph de Guader (13) a Breton, was made Earl of Norfolk and Suffolk, and Lord of Norwich. Henry de Ferrariis received Tutbury-Caſtle (14). William Biſhop of Conſtance was poſſeſſed of two hundred and eighty Fiefs, which he left at his Death to Robert Mowbray his Nephew. It would be endleſs to mention all the Donations granted by the King to the Foreigners, at the Expence of the Engliſh. Thoſe above-mentioned are ſufficient to ſhew, the Intent of this Profuſion was ſolely to deprive the Engliſh of their Eſtates. This therefore is a memorable Epocha, when, to ſpeak in the Language of the Hiſtorians, England was delivered into the hands of Foreigners. It may eaſily be conceived, the Lords, to whom the King diſtributed ſo many Eſtates, ſuffered none to hold of them but thoſe of their own Nation. Accordingly from that time, we hear no more of Ealdormen, or Thanes, but of Counts, or Earls, Viſcounts, Barons, Vavaſſors, Eſquires, and other Titles taken from the Norman or French Tongue, which began to be introduced into England inſtead of the Saxon Names. So that England may be truly ſaid to become Norman. Perhaps even its own Name would have been changed for that of Normandy, if ſome things, ſpoken of in the following Reigns, had not made the Normans, ſettled in England, deſirous of being conſidered as Engliſhmen, and even taking the Name. Be this as it will, from the Foreigners, who were then put in poſſeſſion of theſe Lands, are derived a great part of the moſt eminent Families this day in the Kingdom.

It was not only the Engliſh Nobility that were ſufferers by the Conqueror's new Plan: The Clergy met with no better quarter. The Saxon Kings had granted to ſeveral Biſhops and Abbots Lands exempted from all military Service, denouncing in their Charters Imprecations againſt ſuch of their Succeſſors as ſhould dare to violate theſe Privileges. But King William, not being one of thoſe ſcrupulous Princes who looked upon what their Predeceſſors have ſettled as unalterable, cancelled all theſe Immunities (15). Church-Lands as well as the reſt, were obliged to find, in time of War, a certain number of Horſemen, notwithſtanding the Clauſes in their ancient Charter to the con-

1070. trary. Such of the Clergy as refuſed to comply, only gave the King what he wanted, a Pretence to diſpoſſeſs them and place Foreigners in their room. Moreover, he quartered upon the Monaſteries almoſt all his Troops, and obliged the Monks to find them in Neceſſaries. By this means, he kept his Army without any charge, and had Spies in all the Religious Houſes, who watched the Actions of the Monks.

He ſeizes the Money and Plate in the Monaſteries. S. Dunelm. Sax. Ann.

All this not ſufficing to make the King eaſy, he bethought himſelf of another Expedient, which drew upon him the Imprecations of the People, and eſpecially of the Monks. Some of his Emiſſaries (1) informing him that many Perſons had lodged their Money and Plate in the Monaſteries, he took occaſion to order all the Religious Houſes to be ſearched, and every thing of value to be ſeiz'd, on pretence it belonged to the Rebels. Some Hiſtorians affirm, he did not ſpare even the Shrines of the Saints and the conſecrated Veſſels. Very probably, the Clergy's Zeal, after the Battle of Haſtings, to place this Prince on the Throne, was entirely owing to the fear of loſing their Effects. But on this laſt occaſion, they had but too much reaſon to perceive how greatly they were miſtaken in their Politicks.

Several Biſhops and Abbots are depoſed. Ingulph. S. Dunelm. Brompt. Malmſb. de Pontif.

How ſeverely ſoever the King had uſed the Clergy, he was not yet ſatisfied. The great Credit of the Biſhops and Abbots ſtill making him uneaſy, he reſolved to be rid of the moſt ſuſpected. To proceed in the leaſt blameable manner, he ſent for two Legates from Rome (2), who convened a Council at Wincheſter (3), where every thing paſſed to his wiſh. Stigand, Archbiſhop of Canterbury, was degraded for intruding into the See, Robert his Predeceſſor not having been canonically depoſed. This was probably a Sacrifice offered by the King to the Pope, for it does not appear he had any reaſon to complain of the Archbiſhop. The ſame Council alſo depoſed Egelmer, Biſhop of Eaſt-Anglia, whoſe See was at Helmham. Agelric, Biſhop of Selſey (4), and ſome others, whom the King did not like, were likewiſe ſacrificed to his Jealouſy. As for others, againſt whom the Council had nothing to alledge, the King, by his ſole Authority, baniſhed ſome the Kingdom, and threw the reſt into Priſon, without any legal Proceedings, or giving other reaſon than his Good-Pleaſure. After he was thus clear of all that gave him any Uneaſineſs, he placed in their room Normans or other Foreigners (5), for all were acceptable but Engliſh. He promoted Lanfranc, an Italian, Abbot of a Monaſtery at Caen, to the Archbiſhoprick of Canterbury (6), and Thomas, a Canon of Bayeux, to that of York. Three of his Chaplains were made Biſhops of Wincheſter, Helmham, and Selſey (7), and Norman Abbots were placed in the Monaſteries, from whence the Engliſh were removed. This however muſt be ſaid for the King, that he made choice of Perſons of eminent worth to fill up the Vacancies.

Lanfranc made Archbiſhop. Hoved. M. Weſt. Eadmer. Sax. Ann.

Let it not be imagined that I have uſed any exaggeration, in what has been ſaid concerning the uſage of King William to the Engliſh, or affected to follow thoſe who made it their buſineſs to blacken his Reputation. Whoever will be at the pains to conſult the original Hiſtorians, will eaſily be convinc'd of the contrary. They will ſee, there is not a ſingle Circumſtance but what occurs in the Hiſtories, written during his Life, or ſhortly after his Death, by Authors moſt deſirous to juſtify his Conduct. 'Tis therefore a groundleſs Aſſertion of ſome of our modern Writers, to ſay, this Prince never acted as Conqueror, but conſtantly followed the ancient Laws and Conſtitutions of the Realm.

The Revolt of the Abbot of St. Albans. M. Paris. p. 1000.

The King's whole Conduct demonſtrating to the Engliſh that his Deſign was to reduce them ſo low that they ſhould never more be able to hold up their Heads, ſome of the principal among them thought now was the time or never, to make a vigorous Effort to prevent their utter ruin. Fretheric, Abbot of St. Albans, was one of the moſt zealous to inſpire his Countrymen with this Reſolution, and by means of his Intereſt and Riches it was that a freſh Combination was formed to drive the King and the Normans out of the Kingdom. Matters were carried on with that Secreſy, that the Conſpirators ſuddenly drew an Army together, before the King had any notice of it. This Army growing very numerous in a few days, the Abbot of St. Albans ſent for Edgar Atheling out of Scotland, and put him at the head of the Malecontents, by whom he was acknowledged for King, and proclaimed in all the Places they were maſters of. This bold Enterprize made the King extremely uneaſy, who was ever apprehenſive of ſome ſudden Revolution robbing him of the Fruit of all his Labours. He communicated his Thoughts to Lanfranc the new Archbiſhop of Canterbury, who adviſed him to deal more gently with the Engliſh; intimating the abſolute neceſſity of a ſpeedy Negotiation with the Revolters, leſt the Flame, already kindled, ſhould over-ſpread the whole Kingdom. The King took his advice, and after many fair Promiſes, found means to engage the Heads of the Malecontents in a Conference at Barkhamſtead. He calmly heard all their Complaints, and promiſed to redreſs their Grievences. Nay, he ſwore on the Holy Evangeliſts, to eſtabliſh the antient Laws of the Realm, which went under the name of Edward his Benefactor. This Condeſcenſion ſatisfying the Malecontents, they returned to the Army to diſmiſs their Troops, believing they had no further occaſion for them. But the King had not the leaſt thought of keeping an Oath, which he looked upon as extorted. Preſently after, he ordered a great Number of thoſe that had taken up Arms againſt him, to be apprehended, ſome of whom were put to death, and others baniſhed or impriſoned. Upon this Edgar fled into Scotland (8), and the reſt took refuge in Ireland, Denmark, and Norway. The Abbot of St. Albans retired to the Iſle of Ely, where he died with Grief. As ſoon as the King heard of his death, he ſeized the Goods of the Monaſtery, and took from thence all the valuable Effects: He was reſolved to deſtroy it utterly, if Lanfranc had not prevailed upon him to deſiſt from his Deſign (9).

1071. Another Revolt. S. Dunelm. M. Weſt.

The King's Behaviour to the Malecontents variouſly wrought on the minds of the Engliſh. Some, terrified by his Severity, reſolved to endure all things for fear of increaſing their Afflictions by fruitleſs Attempts. Others, not ſo paſſive, determined to try all ways to free themſelves from a Yoke they could no longer bear. Theſe retired to the Iſle of Ely, where was a rich Monaſtery, the Abbot of which was their Friend. But this was not the only reaſon of their chuſing that Retreat. This Place, called an Iſle from its being ſurrounded with a Moraſs, was very ſtrong, and ſeemed proper to ſhelter them ſeom the King's Rigours, when filled with a ſufficient number of Men to defend it. Edwin and Morcar choſe to join them (10), being ſenſible they ſhould be the firſt Victims of the King's Suſpicions, and not daring any longer to truſt to his Promiſes. Some time after, Edwin reſolving to go into Scotland, where he thought he might be more ſerviceable to his Party, was murthered on the road by his own treacherous Followers. Morcar his Brother found in the Iſle of Ely, many Perſons of Quality, with Egelwin (11) and Walter, Biſhops of Durham and Hereford, all reſolutely bent to oppoſe to their utmoſt the deſpotick Power aſſumed by the King. Their Number being conſiderably increaſed by Multitudes of Male-contents flocking to them (12), they choſe for their Leader Hereward (13), Nephew to the Abbot (14) of Peterborough, who was looked upon as the braveſt and beſt Soldier in the Kingdom. He was baniſhed in the Reign of King Edward, for ſome Outrages committed in his Neighbourhood, and retired into Flanders, where his Valour gained him great 1071. Reputation, and raiſed him to eminent Poſts. The Death of his Father obliging him to return into England, he found his Eſtate given to a Norman. He demanded Reſtitution, but not obtaining it by a legal Proceſs, drove out the Foreigner by force, and took Poſſeſſion. It was preciſely at this Juncture that coming to Ely to avoid the King's Reſentment, he was choſen General by the Male-contents. As he had a great Reputation, and as the courageous and reſolute were as much dreaded by the King, as thoſe that dar'd not to oppoſe him were deſpiſed, he made the King extremely uneaſy. The Honour he had juſt received animating him with freſh Ardour, and with a Deſire to ſhew he was not unworthy of it, he prepared for a vigorous Defence, foreſeeing he ſhould not be long in that place without being attacked. Whilſt he was laying in warlike Stores, he cauſed all the acceſſible Parts of the Iſle to be carefully fortified, and took all other Precautions, that might render a Siege the more difficult. King William knowing whom he had to deal with, marched with all poſſible ſpeed to attack him, in expectation to ſurprize him unprepared. But Hereward had already taken care to oppoſe his Entrance into the Iſle, by ordering a Caſtle of Wood to be run up in the Moraſs, which could not be aſſaulted, and which defended the only Paſſage to the Beſieged. In ſpite of theſe ſeemingly inſurmountable Difficulties, the King was bent upon a Siege, or rather a Blockade. He was in hopes to reduce them by Famine, and have them all at his Mercy, the ſame thing that prevented his Approaches, being alſo an invincible Obſtacle to their Flight. With this view he built a Bridge over the Moraſs two Miles in length, by means of which he depriv'd the Beſieged of all hopes of Relief (1). However, though he had now ſpent a great deal of time in the Siege, he was never the nearer, ſince the Rebels had provided great ſtore of Proviſions. This Delay made him very uneaſy, as well upon account of the Affair in hand, as becauſe it prevented him from marching againſt the King of Scotland, who had taken this opportunity to make an Inroad into the northern Counties. At length, when he began to deſpair of the Succeſs of his Enterprize, a happy thought made him maſter of the Place.

The Monaſtery of Ely holding without the Limits of the Iſle many Manors, from whence the greateſt part of their Revenues aroſe, the King was adviſed to ſeize them, in order to reduce the Monks to obedience out of fear of loſing them. He had no ſooner put this advice in practice, and diſtributed the Lands to his Courtiers, but Thurſtan the Abbot, not being able to withſtand the Clamours of the Monks, ſought means to recover their Eſtates. He could think of no properer method than procuring the King's Favour by ſome conſiderable Service. To this end, he privately ſent and offered to put the King in poſſeſſion of the Iſle of Ely, with all that were in it, and pay him a thouſand Marks (2), on condition the ſeized Lands were reſtored to the Monaſtery. This offer was gladly accepted, and the Abbot performed his Promiſe: but Hiſtorians have neglected to inform us of the means he uſed to accompliſh it. However that be, the Male-contents were conſtrained by the Abbot's Treachery to ſubmit to the King's mercy. Hereward alone eſcaped, having opened a way with his Sword through the Guards that defended a certain Paſs. Of thoſe that were taken in the Iſle, ſome had their Eyes put out, or their Hands cut off, others were ſhut up in divers Priſons. Among theſe laſt were Earl Morcar, with Egelwin Biſhop of Durham, who having been ſo hardy as to excommunicate the King (3), was ſent to Abington, and there ſtarved to Death (4). The Monks of Ely were likewiſe chaſtiſed, though they had taken all imaginable care to perform their Capitulation. When they came to pay the ſtipulated Sum, for the want of a Groat only, they were forced to pay another thouſand Marks (5). Moreover the King quartered upon them forty Knights, for whom they were obliged to find all Neceſſaries.

The King of Scotland continues his Ravages. S. Dunelm. Hoveden.

Whilſt the King was employed in the Siege of Ely, Malcolm continued his Ravages in the North (6), with a Barbarity unworthy a Chriſtian Prince, if it was ſuch as is deſcribed by the Engliſh Hiſtorians. They tell us, the Scots ripped up the Bellies of Women with Child, cut the Throats of the old Men, and toſſed young Children into the Air to receive them on the Points of their Swords. But very likely, this Account is exceedingly aggravated, as well as the Number of Engliſh Slaves, carried into Scotland, where it is pretended every Houſe was furniſhed with one. Goſpatric, who was then Governor of Northumberland (7), not being ſtrong enough to reſiſt the King of Scotland, made an Incurſion into Cumberland, where he revenged on the Scots the Calamities inflicted by their Countrymen, on the Engliſh. This Expedition ſerved only to inflame the King of Scotland's Reſentment (8), who took occaſion from thence to encreaſe his Ravages in Northumberland. The King could not bear theſe Inſults; but the Affair of Ely ſeeming of greater importance, he was willing to ſee the End. As ſoon as it was over, he marched into Galloway, where however he only fatigued his Army to little purpoſe. Mean time Malcolm, who was retired into Scotland, endeavoured to prolong the War, in hopes ſome new Troubles, of which he might take advantage, would ariſe In England. The ſame reaſon obliged the King to put an End to it as ſoon as poſſible. The readieſt way to ſucceed, as he thought, was to follow the Scots into the heart of their Country, that the Dread of a Battle, which to them might prove fatal, might compel them to a Peace. This Reſolution procured him the expected Advantage. Malcolm, unwilling to hazard a Battle in his own Kingdom, offering to accommodate Matters by a Treaty, he was of Opinion, he ought immediately to end a War, which the Circumſtances of his Affairs made him look upon as extremely dangerous. Beſides, he ſeemed, ever ſince the Battle of Haſtings, reſolved never to run any hazard. This was what had formerly prevented him from fighting the Danes, and probably the ſame reaſon cauſed him to behave in like manner with the Scots. Be this as it will, the bounds of the two Kingdoms were ſettled (9), by the Treaty, and Malcolm did him Homage (10). Some Engliſh Writers (11) pretend this Homage concerned all Scotland; but the Scots affirm it was only for Cumberland. And indeed that is moſt likely, ſince there is no appearance that Malcolm, who had not received the leaſt check, ſhould humble himſelf to do Homage for his whole Kingdom. I am very ſenſible, King William is ſaid to have a right to demand it: But this is not a Place to examine this Point, the Diſcuſſion whereof will more properly come in elſewhere.

The good reception Malcolm gave all the Engliſh Fugitives, drew great Numbers into his Dominions, where ſome procured Settlements which obliged them to continue there. From theſe are derived ſeveral conſiderable Families at this day in Scotland (12). Some will have it, that the Engliſh brought thither their Language, with the Titles of Duke, Earl and Baron; but Buchanan affirms, they were in uſe there before that time. He freely owns indeed, that the Engliſh introduced into Scotland Luxury, Pride, Wantonneſs, Drunkenneſs and other Vices, to which he pretends, his Countrymen were Strangers before. Among the chief of theſe Refugees was Earl Goſpatric, who had been deprived of his Government, under colour of his being concerned in the Death of Cumin, tho' he had ſince that done the King very ſignal Services. He was ſucceeded by Earl Walthoff (13), the only Engliſh Lord, for whom the King yet ſhewed any Regard. 1073. see the King of England in so prosperous a Condition. He blamed himself for being so impolitick as not to assist the English Malecontents, and resolved to retrieve his Error by attacking Normandy. He expected no doubt the English would take Advantage of this Diversion to revolt, and keep the King employed in England. Whatever his Thoughts were, he suddenly invaded Normandy, without any Declaration of War. Upon which, the King went over with an Army wholly consisting of English (1), not daring to carry his Norman Troops out of the Kingdom. Besides, he chose rather to expose the English than Normans, who were absolutely necessary for the Preservation of his Conquest. With these Forces he retook Mans and all the Province of Maine, which had lately revolted, the English glorying in faithfully serving him in Normandy, whilst in England he treated them with great Rigour. Philip not succeeding according to his Expectation, soon grew weary of the War, and put an End to it by a Peace with the King of England.

Edgar Atheling submits to the King. Sax. Ann. Malmsb. M. Paris.

Shortly after this Treaty, Prince Edgar, tired with living like a Fugitive in a Foreign Country, came to the King, and, begging his Pardon, submitted to his Will. He met with a favourable Reception, and was allowed a Pound of Silver a-Day. From that Time he ever remained in Obedience without giving the King the least Cause of Uneasiness. If he had Occasion to complain, it was not so much of the King as of the English, who, after the Death of Edward, had preferred a private Person before him. It was not Edgar, that King William had deprived of the Crown, but Harold, who probably, had he been able to keep it, would have left it to his Son, regardless of the Rights of the Saxon Prince. On the other Hand, it must be confest, Edgar had Reason to be satisfied with the King's Clemency, who was very willing to receive him into Favour, notwithstanding the Mistrust he might justly entertain of him.

The Pope demands Homage of the King. Hoved. Eadm. Brady. Gregor. 7. Ep. Lib. VII. Ep. 27.

While the King was in Normandy, Gregory VII, the boldest and most enterprizing Pope that ever sat in the Papal Chair, sent his Nuntio to summon him to do him Homage, pretending, England was a Fief of the Holy See. He demanded likewise the Arrears of Peter-Pence, which had not been paid for several Years. Some pretend the Pope's Demand as to the first Article, was not groundless, but was the Condition, on which the King had obtained the Pope's Approbation for the Conquest of England. Others derive the Pope's Sovereignty over England from the voluntary Grant of Romescot, or Peter-Pence made to the Church of Rome, by Ina and Offa, Kings of Wessex and Mercia. They pretend it was a real Tribute by which they became Feudataries to the Holy See. In fine, there are some who giving up this Pretension, content themselves with dating this Sovereignty from the Time of Ethelwulph's Journey to Rome. But tho' perhaps at the Time King William was meditating his Enterprise, he did not dispute the Pope's Claims, yet when he found himself well fixed in the Throne, he was otherwise disposed. He plainly told the Nuntio, he held his Crown only of God and his Sword, and would not make it dependent on any Person living. Nay, he went further: For, upon the Nuntio's daring to threaten him, he published an Edict, forbidding all his Subjects to acknowledge any Pope but whom he allowed of, and receive any Orders from Rome without his Leave. This was to make Gregory sensible, who had then a Competitor, how great a Risk he run of being towered in his Turn, if he persisted in his Claims. As for the Arrears of Peter-Pence, he promised to pay what was due, and to be more punctual for the Future. This Firmness convincing the Pope, the King was not swayed by superstitious Scruples, much less to be awed by Threats, he desisted from his Pretensions.

The King resolutely refuses it. Eadm. p. 6. and Not. Selden, p. 164.

1074. Conspiracy of the Normans against the King. Malmsb. Hoved. Sax. Ann. M. Paris. Fl. Wigor. Huntingd.

The King's long Stay in Normandy occasioned in England a fresh Conspiracy; so much the more dangerous as the most considerable of the Norman Lords were the Contrivers. Ralph de Guader, a Briton, Earl of Suffolk, and Roger de Bretevil Earl of Hereford (2), resolving to unite their two Families by the Marriage of Ralph with the Daughter of Roger (3), the King for Reasons unknown, put a Stop to their Proceedings. The Earls, who durst not complete the Marriage whilst the King was in England, took the Opportunity of his Absence to accomplish their Design. They made a splendid Entertainment upon this Occasion, to which were invited several Persons of Quality, and, among the rest, Earl Walthoff. As they knew the King's Temper, they formed at the same Time the Project of a Conspiracy to depose him, perceiving no other Way to avoid the Effects of his Anger. The present Occasion seeming favourable to draw their Guests into their Plot, as soon as they saw them heated with Wine, they began to talk of the King, and dwelt upon such Subjects as were most likely to exasperate them against him. They pretended to pity the English, who from being always a free People, were now reduced to a shameful Servitude. As for the Normans, they stirred them up with a Consideration of the King's severe Government, who by the excessive Impositions laid on Estates, took from them with one hand what he had given them with the other. In fine, perceiving they were heard with Pleasure, they openly declared, it was unworthy of Persons of Honour to be governed by a Bastard, who had usurped the two Crowns he possessed. Their Discourse had so sudden an Effect upon Men who in their Cups thought nothing difficult, that with one consent they resolved to take Arms and oppose the King's return. Earl Walthoff, warmed with Wine like the rest, came into the Plot without reflecting on the Consequences. But on the morrow, the Fumes of the Liquor being dispersed, he considered more maturely, that he had embarked in an Enterprize, which instead of freeing the English from Oppression, could not but encrease their Misery. He foresaw the Difficulties which would naturally occur in the Execution. But supposing it chanced to succeed, he plainly perceived, England would not be the better for it, since she would become a Prey to several petty Trrants who would complete her ruin. Moreover, he considered, in case the Conspirators were crushed, which was very probable, the Vengeance would all fall on his Head, as being an Englishman, whereas the Foreigners might find some Favour with the King. He could not likewise forbear acknowledging he was much indebted to the King, who not only pardoned him once before, but also distinguished him by many Favours from all his Countrymen. These Reflections working in his mind a hearty Repentance for what he had done, he went to Lanfranc and imparted to him all that had passed. He alledged his drinking too much permitted him not to reflect on what was proposed to him, and intreated him to intercede for his Pardon. The Archbishop commended his Repentance, and advised him to repair forthwith to the King, and inform him of all the Circumstances. He put him in hopes of easily obtaining a Pardon for a Crime done with so little premeditation, at such a time, and for which he was so soon sorry, and even wrote to the King in his behalf. Walthoff taking this Advice, set out immediately and went and threw himself at the King's feet, who received him very kindly, and pardoned his Imprudence, after he was informed of all the Particulars of the Conspiracy.

The King was very much alarmed at this News, and resolved to return into England, without delay, to appease the Troubles occasioned by his Absence. But his Presence was not necessary. The Conspiracy was stifled almost in its very birth by the Vigilance of the Bishop of Bayeux the Regent (4). The two Earls had concerted their Measures so ill, that they could not even join the Forces each had assembled, so that Ralph de Guader found himself constrained to retire to Norwich Castle, where he was immediately besieged. As he despaired of pardon, in case he fell into the King's hands, he did not think fit to wait the Issue of the Siege, but finding means to escape, fled into Denmark (5). After his departure, his Countess defended the Castle some time, but at length surrendered upon Terms. She had liberty to follow the Earl her Spouse, who had now procured a powerful Aid from the King of Denmark to support the Revolters. And indeed, soon after a Danish Fleet appeared on the Coast of England, but not finding the English inclined to rise, sailed back immediately (6).

1074. Some of the Conſpirators puniſhed.

Mean time King William being returned to England, was informed, there were ſtill ſome remains of the Conſpiracy in the Weſtern Counties (1). To prevent the Fire from rekindling, he marched with all ſpeed to thoſe parts, and ſeverely puniſhed all whom he ſuſpected to be concerned in the Plot. Some he ordered to be hanged, others, to have their Feet and Hands cut off, or their Eyes put out. Thoſe that were moſt favourably treated were baniſhed the Kingdom. The Pardon granted Earl Walthoff going for nothing, he was apprehended, carried to Wincheſter, publickly beheaded and buried under the Scaffold. His Riches are ſaid to be the principal Occaſion of his Death, the King having a longing Deſire to his great Eſtate (2). Others add, that Judith his Wife did not a little contribute to his Ruin, exaſperating the King by falſe Reports, that ſhe might be at liberty to marry elſewhere. Be this as it will, the unhappy fate of this brave Earl was univerſally lamented. Every one thought he was too ſeverely dealt with for ſo ſlight a Crime, even ſuppoſing he had not obtained his Pardon. Some time after (3) his Body was removed to Croyland Abbey (4), where it was pretended to work divers Miracles, and accordingly this Earl paſſed with the People for a true Martyr. The Abbot of Croyland, encouraging this Belief, was turned out of his Monaſtery, by the King's order, and Ingulphus, a Monk of Fonteveraud, was put in his room. This is the ſame Ingulphus who, notwithſtanding his Obligations to King William, has not failed to atteſt, in his Hiſtory of Croyland, the Miracles wrought at Walthoff's Tomb.

The King took it for granted, they had privately fomented the Rebellion, and conſequently, deprived ſome of their Eſtates, and others of their Liberty. From this time William of Malmsbury dates the Servitude of the Engliſh. As much Norman as he was, he plainly enough intimates that from thence-forward the King had no manner of Regard for them. Hence it may be conjectured, this Prince's Severity to the Engliſh was very great and univerſal, ſince this Hiſtorian reckons as a Trifle, what the King had already done with reſpect to the Spiritual and Temporal Lords.

He was not ſatisfied with ſeizing all his Eſtates in England, but reſolved to deprive him alſo of his Hereditary Poſſeſſions. For that purpoſe, he laid Siege to Dol, which however he could not take, the Reſiſtance of the Beſieged giving the King of France time to come to their Relief. 1077. The King enjoyed then a Tranquillity which ſeemed to promiſe a long Continuance, when it was diſturbed by an unexpected War. Robert his eldeſt Son encouraged by the King of France (6), pretended his Father ought to reſign Normandy to him, in purſuance of a poſitive Promiſe, made him, as he ſaid, to that purpoſe (7). Upon this Pretenſion (8) he attempted to render himſelf maſter of the Dukedom, and even treated very ill ſuch as refuſed to own him for Sovereign. The King ſurprized at this Audaciouſneſs, immediately drew an Army together conſiſting entirely of Engliſh, for the reaſon before-mentioned, and paſſed into Normandy to put a Stop to his Son's Proceedings. Robert was not deterred from his Deſign by his Arrival; but vigorouſly oppoſed his Father, who ſaw himſelf forced to carry on the War in form, finding in his own Son no contemptible Enemy. He happened one day to fall into an Ambuſh, where he was obliged to expoſe his Perſon as much as the meaneſt Officer. He diſtinguiſhed himſelf ſo by his Valour, that Robert, who knew him not, deemed him the moſt formidable of his Enemies, aſſaulted him, and wounding him in the Arm, diſmounted him with his Lance. The King was in great Danger of loſing his Life, if, by good fortune, Robert had not known him by ſome Mark on his Arms. Then the young Prince, haſtily alighting, raiſed him up, and ſet him on his own Horſe, to reſcue him from the preſent danger. Mean time, the Engliſh Troops being roughly handled by the Normans, the King was obliged to retreat in Diſorder (9). Robert's being like to kill his Father, made ſuch an Impreſſion upon his mind, that, to ſhew the Sincerity of his Sorrow, he ſubmitted entirely to his mercy. But this Generoſity was not ſufficient to recover the King's Favour, who never after had any Affection for him. Nay, 'tis ſaid, in the firſt Emotions of his Paſſion, he denounced his Curſe againſt him, which all the Submiſſions of the young Prince could not prevail with him to retract. However he gave him a kind reception; but carried him into England, on pretence to ſend him at the head of an Army againſt Scotland. Accordingly, next Year (10) Robert was commiſſioned to bring the Scots to reaſon, who had renewed the War (11).

(7) When the Inhabitants of Mans ſubmitted to Duke William, one of the Conditions was, That the County of Maine ſhould be given to Robert; and King Philip made William likewiſe promiſe, immediately before his Expedition into England, that he would leave the Dukedom of Normandy to Robert: Accordingly the great Men and Barons of Normandy did the young Prince Homage. The 1078. The King's Conduct during the Peace.

The Peace with Scotland, and the Submiſſion of the Welſh, introduced a State of Tranquillity which laſted ſome years. The King took the opportunity of this calm to ſettle the Affairs of the Kingdom. Since his acceſſion to the Crown, England had been in extreme confuſion, by reaſon of divers Alterations as well in the Government, as in the Laws and methods of adminiſtring Juſtice. But this confuſion was ſtill encreaſed with regard to the Debts of private Perſons. The Creditors imagined, they who were put in poſſeſſion of the Lands were to pay the Debts of thoſe that were turned out, and accordingly to them were they ſent by the Debtors. But the Poſſeſſors refuſed to meddle with matters that were liable to ſo many Frauds; and maintained, the King granted them the Lands free from all demands. Beſides, the Juriſprudence of the Normans being different from that of the Engliſh, there was no knowing how to proceed, the King not having yet determined any thing on that ſubject. If he had made any Regulations, it was in caſes where his own Advantage and Intereſt were concerned. As for private Perſons, it does not appear that he had hitherto given himſelf much trouble about them. 'Tis true indeed, they who make it their Buſineſs to extol him on all occaſions, remark the ſtrict Juſtice that was exerciſed in his Reign, with reſpect to Crimes (1), as an argument of his Affection for his Subjects. But this proof is not ſo ſtrong as they imagine, for this Strictneſs turned no leſs to the King's, than to the People's advantage; as the ſuffering Crimes to go unpuniſhed muſt tend to the prejudice of the ſupreme Authority. Beſides, Offences for the moſt part being then puniſhable by pecuniary Fines, all the profit accrued to the King, who had deprived the Earls, Barons, and Biſhops of the ſhare they enjoyed under the Saxon Kings (2).

Malmſb. Sax. Ann.

However this be, it can't be denied that the King's predominant Paſſion was a greedy deſire to heap up Riches. He was never weary with inventing new Expedients to gratify his covetous Temper (3). We have already ſeen how he impoveriſh'd the Engliſh. But in this he acted as much or more for the advantage of the Normans and other Foreigners, than for his own. He therefore judged it reaſonable, that the Foreigners who were Proprietors of the Eſtates in England, ſhould be liable to the ſame Impoſitions as the Engliſh. But that he might proceed in due Proportion, he wanted to know the Value of every Perſon's Eſtate. To this end he ordered an exact Survey to be taken of the Lands, Goods and Chattels of all his Subjects. This Survey contained the number of Acres in each man's Eſtate, what he was wont to pay in the Saxon Reigns, and how much he had been taxed of late years ſince the Revolution. Moreover, what Stock each had of Horſes, Cattle, Sheep, &c. how much ready Money in his Houſe, what he ow'd, and what was owing to him. All this was ſet down in great Order in a Book called Dooms-day Book, that is, The Book of the Day of Judgment, apparently to denote that the Means of the Engliſh were ſifted in that Book, as the Actions of Mankind will be at that great Day. This general Regiſter, which ſome term the Great Terrar, or Land-Book of England, was laid up in the Exchequer or King's Treaſury, to be conſulted upon occaſion; that is, as an Hiſtorian expreſſes it, when it was required to know, of how much more Wool the Engliſh Flocks might be fleec'd. The King's ſtrict orders to take this Survey with all poſſible exactneſs, were punctually executed (4), the Commiſſioners as well as private Perſons, having cauſe to dread an exemplary puniſhment, in caſe they uſed any Fraud, or were guilty of the leaſt Connivance on this occaſion (5).

The King's Revenues. Brady.

We may eaſily gueſs, this Survey was not taken purely to ſatisfy the King's Curioſity. The Taxes laid afterwards upon almoſt all the Effects of private Perſons, were a clear Evidence that his Intent was to leave the Engliſh no more than what was abſolutely neceſſary for their Subſiſtence. This Monarch, conſidering England as a conquered Country, imagined himſelf the Proprietor of all the Lands in the Kingdom, and that the vanquiſhed were to receive what he was pleaſed to leave them, as a ſignal Favour. According to this Rule, 'tis eaſy to ſee, his Revenues were to be proportionable to the Eſtates of the Engliſh, and his own Avariciouſneſs. Not to enter into a particular Account of the ſeveral Branches of his Revenues (6), it will ſuffice to obſerve, that it amounted annually to four hundred thouſand Pounds Sterling, which Sum, according to a moderate computation, was equal to five Millions now of the ſame Money. Beſides theſe ſettled Revenues, he had a great many Perquiſites, as Mulcts and Fines, which were very frequent in thoſe days. But what is further remarkable in this matter, is, that none of this Money was employed in paying the Army that was kept on foot. In the diſtribution of the Lands taken from the Engliſh, the King had taken care to charge them with the maintenance of his Troops. The new Proprietors were very willing to accept of the Eſtates upon that condition, ſince having no right, they were wholly indebted to his Liberality for them. By this means, he maintained, without any manner of charge to him, threeſcore thouſand Men, ready to march upon the firſt notice. 'Tis not at all ſtrange, he paſſed for the richeſt Prince in his time, ſince his Incomes vaſtly exceeded the Expence of his Houſehold, in which he ſpent but a ſmall part of the yearly Profits of the whole Kingdom.

1079. The King extremely fond of Hunting. M. Paris. Sax. Ann.

After the King had thus ſettled his Revenues, he ſought means to gratify another Paſſion, which was almoſt as ſtrong as the former. I mean his fondneſs for Hunting, which cauſed him to commit a world of unjuſt Acts. By theſe Acts I don't underſtand thoſe ſevere Laws he made on that account (7), though they were exceeding rigorous. This does not properly diſtinguiſh him from many other Princes, who look upon the Breaches of the Game-Laws, as a moſt capital Offence, and more readily pardon the killing of a Man than a Stag. What I ſpeak of, was the prodigious Deſolation King William ordered to be made in Hampſhire, by diſpeopling the Country for above thirty Miles in Compaſs, demoliſhing the Churches and Houſes to make a Foreſt for the Habitation of wild

(2) See the foregoing Diſſertation, p. 151, 152. It does not appear that William aboliſhed the County, Hundred, and other Courts, (which did not grow into diſuſe till King John's Reign. See St. Amand. p. 161.) or that he abſolutely deprived the Ealdormen or Earls of the Profits that accrued to them from Fines, &c. But he ſeems rather by his Laws to have confirmed them in the Poſſeſſion thereof. As for the Biſhops, it is certain, that, whereas they uſed, under the Saxon Kings, to ſit in the County, Hundred, and Sheriff's Courts, with the Earl or Sheriff, and there jointly determine both Eccleſiaſtical and Secular Cauſes; King William did in the Year 1085. ordain, That no Biſhop or Archdeacon ſhould, for the future, hold Pleas in any of thoſe Courts, concerning Epiſcopal Laws or Canons; but that every one who had tranſgreſſed the Epiſcopal Laws, ſhould be judged in ſuch place as the Biſhop ſhould appoint; which gave Riſe to the Eccleſiaſtical Courts. The Order whereby the Biſhops were deprived of this valuable Privilege, and had their Juriſdiction confined to ſpiritual Matters, is in Selden's Notes on Eadmer, p. 167. and Brady, Vol. II. p. 214.

(3) W. Malmſbury owns that he was juſtly blameable upon that account, and that he had no regard for what he ſaid or did, though never ſo unbecoming his Royal Character, ſo as he could but be a Gainer by it. Malmſb. p. 112. Sax. Ann.

(4) Yet this is not ſo exact a Survey, as ſome Hiſtorians would repreſent it, if we may judge of the reſt by what Ingulphus, p. 79, relates about his own Monaſtery of Croyland. That the Commiſſioners were ſo kind and civil, as not to give in the true Value of it. And we may reaſonably ſuppoſe that other Monaſteries found the like favour. See Tyrrel, p. 55.

(5) This Survey was begun in the year 1080, and finiſhed in 1086. It was made by Verdict or Preſentment of Juries, or certain Perſons ſworn in every Hundred, Wapentake, or County, before Commiſſioners, conſiſting of the greateſt Earls or Biſhops, who enquired into, and deſcribed as well the Poſſeſſions and Cuſtoms of the King, as of his great Men. They noted, what, and how much arable Land, Paſture, Meadow, and Wood every Man had, and what was the extent and value of them in the Time of Edward the Confeſſor, (expreſſed by the Letters T. R. E. i. e. Tempore Regis Edwardi) and at the time of making the Survey. This Survey was made by Counties, Hundreds, Towns or Manors, Hides, Half-hides, Virgates, and Acres of Land, Meadow, Paſture, and Wood. Alſo they noted what Mills and Fiſheries, and in ſome Counties what and how many Freemen, Socmen, Villains, Bordars, Servants, young Cattle, Sheep, Hogs, working Horſes, &c. in every Town and Manor, and who they belonged to. Always ſetting down the King's Name firſt, then the Biſhops, Abbots, and all the great Men that held of the King in chief. Brady, p. 205, 206. [See the Liſts themſelves in Brady, Vol. I. Appendix, No. 1. and Vol. II. No. 10. and Selden's Preface to Eadmer, p. 3—5.] This Survey was chiefly intended to give the King a true Account of his own Lands or Demeſnes, as alſo what were held by his Tenants in Capite. It is therefore no wonder, if many of thoſe Towns or Villages, which were then held by their Feudataries or Under-Tenants, are quite left out and omitted in it. Some Cities and Towns of note are not mentioned therein, as any one may find, that will but take the Pains to compare it with an exact Catalogue of the antient Towns and Villages in England, the greateſt part of which he will not be able to find there. All England (except Weſtmoreland, Cumberland, and Northumberland,) was deſcribed, with part of Wales; and the Deſcription or Survey written in two Books, called the Great and Little Doomſday Book, now in the Exchequer. The little Book contains only Norfolk, Suffolk, and Eſſex. This being the higheſt Record in the Kingdom, it was then (and is to this day) a deciſive Evidence in any Controverſy in which there may be occaſion to make uſe of it.

(6) They are ſet down by Brady as follows. 1. A Land-Tax, called Hidage, which he found here before his Arrival in the time of Edward the Confeſſor, or rather which he ſet up again. 2. Reliefs, or Fines for giving the Poſſeſſion of Hereditary Fees, Aſſignation of Dower out of the Huſband's Eſtate, Compoſition for Licence to marry, and to have the Wardſhips of Heirs, or Entrance upon Farms due to him from all Tenants in capite. Alſo penal Fines, Forfeitures of Goods, and pecuniary Mulcts for Crimes, &c. Tolls and Cuſtoms for Paſſage and Puntage, for Liberty of buying and ſelling; Exciſe, beſides the antient Cuſtoms upon Merchandize. 3. Crown Lands, being fourteen hundred and twenty-two Manors or Lordſhips in ſeveral Counties, beſides abundance of Farms and Lands in Middleſex, Shropſhire, Rutlandſhire, in the laſt of which he had alſo a hundred and fifty Pounds of Rent in white Money. To which finally add Eſcheats and Forfeitures.——In ſhort, his Revenue was ſo great, that Ordericus Vitalis (p. 523.) ſays, it was reported to be one thouſand and ſixty Pounds of Sterling-Money, thirty Shillings and a Penny half-penny of the juſt Rents and Profits of England every day of the year, beſides his Gifts and Preſents, and pecuniary Puniſhments, which, if we reckon ten times as much now, according to the Rate of things in his time, his yearly Revenue amounted to 3,874,497 l. 16 s. 3 d. But allow it to be fifteen times ſo much now as then, as may very well be done, and not over-rate it, then his yearly Income was 5,811,746 l. 14 s. 4 d. half-penny, beſides Free-gifts, Fines, and Amerciaments for Offences. Brady, Vol. II. p. 204——211.

1079. Beaſts (1). If we may believe certain Hiſtorians, he did not make the Owners of the Lands or Houſes the leaſt amends. This Tract of Land, called before Ytene, was afterwards termed the New-Foreſt. Some affirm, beſides the Diverſion of Hunting, the King had another Inducement to depopulate theſe Parts. They pretend his aim was to give a free Acceſs to the Troops, which, in caſe of Neceſſity, he might ſend for from Normandy. But this Motive, which ſeems to be very trifling, was doubtleſs invented by thoſe who, having entertained a great Idea of this Prince, were perſuaded, he was guided in all his Actions by Prudence and Policy; as if Princes were not as ſubject to Paſſions as other Men. Others obſerving, that two of his Sons (2) and one of his Grandſons (3) loſt their Lives in this very Foreſt by extraordinary Accidents, conclude from thence, that Heaven took Vengeance for the Injuries done to the Proprietors of the Lands.

His Affection for Normandy. Brady. Tyrrel.

The King's great Affection for Normandy was another of his governing Paſſions. Every Thing practiſed there was, in his Opinion, the Pattern of Perfection. Accordingly he endeavoured to aboliſh the Saxon Laws, and eſtabliſh the Norman in their room (4). Perhaps he would have puſhed this matter further, had it not been repreſented to him, that the Laws of England, bearing the Name of his Benefactor, all the World would look with Horror upon his Ingratitude. However, he made ſeveral Innovations in the Engliſh Laws, and the Methods of adminiſtring Juſtice. For Inſtance, he would not ſuffer the Biſhops to preſide at the Shire-gemots, or County-Courts, but aſſigned them a Court of their own. His Pretence for ſo doing was, that the Eccleſiaſtical matters might not be intermixed with the Civil. But the true Motive was, becauſe he had a mind to deprive the Biſhops of their ſhare of the Fines and Mulcts. He erected alſo ſeveral Courts before unknown to the Engliſh (5), and which were very incommodious to them. They were not only ignorant of the Rules and Practices of theſe Courts; but, as they always attended the Prince, the Suitors were obliged to follow him wherever he went, to proſecute their Suits. Amongſt theſe ſeveral Courts there was one however which became very advantageous to the People; ſince it was deſigned to moderate the Rigour of the Laws by Equity, I mean, the Court of Exchequer, which is ſtill in being (6).

1080. He erects Courts. Pol. Virg.

King William was not ſatisfied with obliging the Engliſh to try their Cauſes in theſe Courts, but forced them alſo to make uſe of the Norman Language, and did all he could to aboliſh the Engliſh Tongue. With this view it was he erected in all the Cities and Boroughs Schools (7) where Nerman was taught, and obliged Parents under heavy Penalties to ſend their Children thither. I have elſewhere obſerved the Nature of the Norman Language, which was very difficult, and hard to be underſtood by the French themſelves, by reaſon of the great mixture of Daniſh with the French. However, the King was ſo bent to introduce his native Tongue, that he made it his chief buſineſs. They who had any Concerns at Court, and did not ſpeak Norman, were looked upon with an evil eye, as Perſons that had no complaiſance for the King. The moſt effectual means he made uſe of to oblige the Engliſh to learn Norman, was the publiſhing his Laws in that Tongue (8), the Ignorance of which was no ſufficient Excuſe for the Violators. Some have accuſed him of acting in this par-

(4) This is more than is advanced by the antient Hiſtorians: William had indeed the Laws tranſlated into French, but ſtill theſe were the Laws of the Land, and the Statutes of the Engliſh Kings. For this, we have the Authority of Ingulphus. Ipſum etiam Idioma tantum abhorrebant [Normanni] quod leges Terræ, ſtatutaque Anglicorum Regum linguâ Gallicâ tractarentur, p. 71. Sir Edward Coke ſays, King William I. liked the Engliſh Law ſo well, that he cauſed it to be written in the Norman Tongue, and eſtabliſhed a great Part of it in Normandy. But there is no Authority for This, it not being mentioned by any coeval Hiſtorian or other Writer, either of England or Normandy. It will not be amiſs to inſert here the Obſervation or Conjecture of a learned Gentleman as related by Madox, p. 123. Hiſt. of the Exchequer. It ſeemed to him, by the Courſe of Engliſh Hiſtory, and otherwiſe, that after the Norman Conqueſt, there enſued a great Alteration in the old Engliſh Laws, Manners and Uſages. Nevertheleſs, that Alteration with reference to the Laws, was not compleatly brought about and ſettled till the Reign of Henry II. The Reign of William I. was moſtly employed in quelling the Diſcontents and Inſurrections of his Engliſh Subjects, and in getting and ſecuring to himſelf and his Heirs, a full and faſt Poſſeſſion of the Regal and other Revenues of England. The next King (viz. William II.) reigned under a Title controllable by the juſt Pretenſions of his elder Brother Robert; yet being a ſtately, reſolute and ſubtle Prince, partly by Power, and partly by Policy, he kept the Engliſh under the Yoke, and continued to ſtrengthen himſelf in the new Acqueſts, and to form the Laws and Manners of this Country after the Norman Faſhion. The next King (viz. Henry I.) was a mild Book-learned Prince, and reigned likewiſe for ſeveral Years under a diſputed Title: He continued, as far as his Affairs would permit, to eſtabliſh the Norman Laws and Cuſtoms, as William I, and William II, had done. In his Time many of the Anglo-Norman Lords, who had great Eſtates in Normandy as well as in England, might probably be, and were inclinable to favour the Title and Intereſts of Robert Earl of Normandy, which might give Umbrage to King Henry. King Henry to win the Affections of the Engliſh Natives, who made the Bulk of the People, and thereby to check or ballance the Anglo-Norman Lords, commanded a Body of Laws to be compiled, which were agreeable to the Laws of the old Engliſh, or Anglo-Saxon Kings, and called the Laws of Henry I. However, theſe Laws of Henry I. relate chiefly to Criminal Matters, and were never, for ought that appears, duly publiſhed, much leſs put in Practice amongſt the Engliſh. The Reign of the next King (viz. Stephen) was nothing in effect but a State of War. Henry II, the next Succeſſor, came to the Crown by an undoubted Title, and ſurpaſſed all his Anceſtors in Power and Extent of Dominion; he was King of England, Earl or Duke of Normandy, Lord of Ireland, Anjou, and the Aquitannick Tract of Land; inſomuch that he was at that Time the greateſt King in Chriſtendom. This Prince did put the laſt or finiſhing Hand to the Norman Eſtabliſhment, or in ſpecial to the Alteration thereby made in the Engliſh Laws; as will in ſome meaſure appear from theſe Conſiderations following; namely, The Statutes or Conſtitutions of Clarendon, made in, or about the Eleventh Year of Henry II, are, both for Phraſe and Subſtance, more entirely Normannick than any Laws or Publick Acts from the Conqueſt to that Time. And Thomas Becket Archbiſhop of Canterbury who was the firſt native Engliſhman that had been Archbiſhop of that See, ſince the Conqueſt, oppoſed certain Articles of thoſe Conſtitutions, as they were, in his Opinion, prejudicial or derogatory to the ſuppoſed Rights of the Clergy, and to the old Law and Uſages of the Engliſh Nation. The Norman Laws, and Cuſtoms were ſettled by conſtant uſe during the Reign of Henry II; and at the latter end of his Reign Ranulf de Glanvil, a great Man in the Law, and a Juſticier, drew up a Compendium of the Laws of England, fitted for publick Uſe; which he probably did by the King's Command, that it might ſerve as a Code or Syſtem for the Direction of ſuch as dealt in Law-proceedings; and this Syſtem of Glanvil's, is in effect nothing elſe but a Tranſcript of the Norman Law; as will readily appear to any Man who pleaſes to compare it with the Grand Cuſtumier of Normandy. In fine, this Normannick Model of Laws continued, and was indeed firmly ſettled in England during the Reign of Henry II, and his two Sons, Richard and John, and of the ſucceeding Kings, bating the Alterations that were made therein, at the end of the Reign of King John, in the Reign of Henry III, and in ſubſequent Ages.

(5) Theſe ſeveral Courts were only the King's Court, and the Exchequer.

(6) At, and ſome time after the Conqueſt, it does not appear that there was more than one ſupreme ordinary Court of Judicature, namely, Curia Regis, or the King's Court, which was always at the Place of his Reſidence. At his Court, more eſpecially at ſome Solemnities of the Year, the King held his Great Councils, and tranſacted Affairs of great Importance, attended by his great Lords and Barons. There Coronations, &c. were celebrated: There was placed the Throne, a ſovereign ordinary Court of Judicature, wherein Juſtice was adminiſtred to the Subjects: and there the Affairs of the Royal Revenue were managed. To the King's Court belonged the following great Officers. I. The Chief Juſticier. He was next the King in Power and Authority, and in his Abſence governed the Realm as Viceroy. If the King was not preſent in Perſon, in Curia Regis, he was chief both in criminal and civil Cauſes. II. The Conſtable, or Conſtabularius Regis, or Angliæ. He was a high Officer both in War and Peace. This Office was antiently Hereditary. III. The Mareſchal. This Office was and is ſtill Hereditary. As an Officer in the King's Court he was to provide for the Security of the King's Perſon in his Palace, to diſtribute Lodgings there, to preſerve Peace and Order in the King's Houſhold, and aſſiſt in determining Controverſies there, &c. IV. Soneſchal or Steward. This Office was likewiſe Hereditary. He is called in Latin, Dapifer. V. The Chamberlain, of Camerarius Regis. It may be obſerved, the great Offices are diſtinguiſhed from the ſubordinate Offices of the ſame Name, by the Epithet of Magiſtratus, Magiſterium. As the Office of King's Chamberlain is called Magiſtra Cameraria, in like manner, Magiſtra Mariſcalcia, &c. VI. The Chancellor, who was uſually ſtiled Cancellarius Regis, to diſtinguiſh him from the inferior Chancellors of Dioceſes, &c. Little is ſaid of his Office. However, we find he was wont to ſuperviſe the Charters to be ſealed by the King's Seal, and likewiſe to ſuperviſe and ſeal the Acts and Precepts that iſſued in Proceedings depending in Curia Regis. He was one of the King's prime Counſellors. VII. The Treaſurer. He was for the moſt part a Prelate or Eccleſiaſtical Perſon. For ſome time after the Conqueſt, the Juſticier uſed to do many Acts, afterwards pertaining to the Treaſurer's Office. The Curia Regis, where all the Liege-men of the Kingdom repaired for Juſtice, was undoubtedly eſtabliſhed in England by the Normans, there being no notice of any ſuch Court in the Anglo-Saxon Times. All Pleas or Cauſes then were determined below in a plain manner, in the Courts within the ſeveral Counties, Towns or Diſtricts. And indeed at firſt there were but few Cauſes reſerved to the King's Courts after the Conqueſt, till the Norman Lords who were poſſeſſed of the large Seigneuries, carried it with ſo high a Hand towards their Vaſſals and Neighbours, that the latter could not have Right done them in the ordinary way, and ſo were conſtrained to ſeek for Juſtice in the King's Court. And this was likewiſe done when Contentions aroſe between the great Lords themſelves. However, few or no Cauſes were brought thither without permiſſion, and the Party's making Fine to the Crown to have his Plea in Curia Regis. Theſe were ſometimes called oblata, or voluntary Fines. When the Pleas in the King's Court became very numerous, there were certain Juſticiers appointed to go Iters through the Realm, to determine Pleas and Cauſes within ſeveral Counties. Theſe were veſted with great Authority. It is not known when theſe were firſt inſtituted: But they were new-modelled, and their new Circuits appointed by Henry II. A Branch of the King's Court was the Exchequer. It was a ſort of ſubaltern Court, reſembling in its Model the Curia Regis. For in it preſided and ſat the great Officers above-mentioned, and ſometime the King himſelf. It was called Scaccarium, becauſe a chequered Cloth, figured like a Cheſs-board, was antiently wont to be laid on the Table in the Court; which Cuſtom continues to this Day. This Court is thought to be firſt inſtituted about the Time of the Conqueſt, though it is not known for certain. The great Perſons that aſſiſted at this Court were called Barones Scaccarii. To theſe was left the Care and Management of the Crown Revenue, &c. The Chief Juſticier let to farm the King's Manors, held Pleas at the Exchequer, and made due Allowances to the Accomptants. The other great Officers had likewiſe their Part in Affairs tranſacted at the Exchequer. As to Cauſes, the Exchequer at firſt was alſo a Court having Juriſdiction in Common-Pleas. Matters remained in this Poſture till the Diviſion of the King's-Court, and Separation of the Common-Pleas from it, of which notice ſhall be taken hereafter. Madox's Hiſt. of the Exchq.

(7) This is more than can be found in the ancient Hiſtorians. He ordered indeed French to be taught in all Schools, as Ingulph teſtifies, Ipſum Idioma tantum abhorrebant, quod ——— pueris etiam in Scholis principia Literarum Grammatica Gallicè ac non Anglicè traderentur, p. 71. But this doth not prove that he erected thoſe Schools.

(8) The ſingle Inſtance of his Laws being in French in Ingulph, is of no conſiderable Force; for the Laws of King Edward confirmed by King William, were written in Latin, and not in French; as were alſo the Body of Laws of this King granted by way of a Charter. The like may be ſaid concerning thoſe of his Succeſſors: For all our antient Laws and Statutes, from the Reign of King Henry I. to the Statute of Weſtminſter 1, which was made in the Third Year of Edward I, are drawn up in Latin, and none of them in French: as are alſo all their Charters, except ſome few of the three firſt Norman Kings, which are either written in Engliſh Saxon alone, or in Latin with the Engliſh Verſion under them. Tyrrel's Introduction to Vol. II. p. ci.

1080. ticular from a worſe Motive. They pretend his Aim was to inſnare the Engliſh by cauſing them to commit Offences which were generally puniſhed by Mulcts and Confiſcations to his uſe. But ſuppoſing this were not ſo, as it muſt be confeſſed it cannot be proved, his covetous Temper, and all his other Ways to heap up Riches, are but too juſt Grounds for ſuch an Accuſation.

To return to the Norman Language. There are thoſe who affirm, that in Spite of all his Pains the King could not introduce it into England. On the contrary, they maintain, the Normans by Degrees learnt to ſpeak Engliſh, their ſmall Number being carried away by the Bulk of the Nation. Others, who are of a contrary Opinion, endeavour to demonſtrate the Norman Tongue was eſtabliſhed upon the Ruins of the Engliſh. But it is difficult for either to prove their Aſſertions. Thus much is certain, the Language ſpoken in England after the Conqueſt, was not exactly the ſame with what was uſed in the Time of the Saxon Kings. However, the Normans can't be ſaid to learn Engliſh, or the Engliſh to admit of Norman, but rather out of the two Languages was formed a third, which was neither one nor other, but partook of both. Nevertheleſs, all publick Acts were in Norman till Edward the Third's Time (1).

Remark on the Engliſh Tongue.

1081. The King's Partiality for the Normans. Ingulph. p. 86.

The King's Partiality to the Normans was ſo great, that he could not forbear ſhowing it upon all Occaſions. Ingulphus, Abbot of Croyland, gives us an Inſtance which deſerves Notice. He ſays, he appeared one Day before the Council, where the King was preſent, to demand certain Lands belonging to his Monaſtery (2), then in poſſeſſion of Talboys a Norman, who had ſettled there ſome Monks of his own Nation. The King, continues the Hiſtorian, examining the original Charter or Grant of the Abby-Lands, judged at firſt that the Demand was right and juſt. But Talboys alledging in his Defence, that the Monks ſettled on theſe Lands were Normans, and hearty Friends to the King, whereas thoſe of Croyland were Engliſh, this ſingle Argument was ſufficiently ſtrong to induce the King to give Sentence in Favour of the Normans. Herein, he was biaſſed by his natural Inclination and Intereſt. The former made him favour his own Nation, and the latter inclined him to put it as much as poſſible out of the Power of the Engliſh to revolt.

Odo aſpires to the Papacy.

What has been hitherto ſaid of the Oppreſſions of the Engliſh, ſuffices to ſhow, they did not complain without Cauſe. Perhaps their impatient Behaviour occaſioned theſe Oppreſſions. But, be this as it will, it is certain they were extremely impoveriſhed, whilſt they beheld the Normans enriched by their Spoils. A ſingle Inſtance will demonſtrate how much they were pillaged by thoſe who were moſt in favour with the King. Odo Biſhop of Bayeux, his 1082. Ord. Vital. Sax. Ann. Malmſb. half-Brother, after an Abode of fifteen or ſixteen Years in England, thought himſelf rich enough to purchaſe the Papacy. To that end, he bought a ſtately Palace at Rome, where he deſigned to reſide and convey all his Treaſures, that he might be ready upon the Pope's Death to put his Deſign in execution. Mean-time, as he was willing to conceal his Intentions, he took the Opportunity to begin his Journey during the King his Brother's Abſence in Normandy, and went to the Iſle of Wight, where his Ships lay ready for him. Contrary Winds preventing him from embarking ſo ſoon as he expected, he was forced to remain ſome time in the Iſle. His Stay there broke all his Meaſures. The King having Intelligence of his Deſign, came over with all Speed, and ſurprized him juſt as he was going to ſail. He ordered him to be ſeized immediately. But finding Fear and Reſpect hindered his Officers from doing their Duty, he laid Hands on him himſelf. In vain did the Prelate plead the Privileges of his Order. The King told him, he ſeized him not as Biſhop, but as Earl of Kent, and commanded him to Priſon, this Seizure was quickly followed with a Confiſcation of all his Effects to the King's Uſe, the Prelate being convicted of numberleſs Extortions and Rapines (3). 1082.

The King ſeizes him, and confiſcates his Eſtate.

Nothing remarkable happening in the reſt of this, and the next Year, I ſhall proceed to the Occurrences of the Year 1084, in which we meet with the Death of Queen Matilda (4), and the King's Preparations againſt an Invaſion he was threatned with. The Engliſh who had taken Refuge in Denmark, perſuaded King Canute that their Countrymen waited only for an Opportunity to throw off the Norman Yoke. The preſent Juncture ſeeming very favourable, he formed a Project to conquer England, to which he had ſome Pretenſions, that being ſupported with Force, appeared very plauſible. To this End he fitted out a Fleet (5), and levied Troops, whoſe Numbers plainly ſhowed he had ſome great Deſign in hand. Thoſe Preparations gave King William ſome Uneaſineſs; the Advices from Denmark putting it out of Doubt that this Armament was deſigned againſt him. As he durſt not confide in the Engliſh, he brought into the Kingdom a numerous Army of Foreigners (6), and laid upon his Subjects a Tax of Six Shillings upon every Hide of Land, which was three Times as much as Dane-gelt uſed to be. Whether Cannte was diverted from his Purpoſe by the Preparations in England, or by ſome other unexpected Affairs (7), he gave it over without making any Attempt. The King, on his part, disbanded his Army (8); but the Money, levied for their Pay, was not reſtored. On the contrary, he impoſed a new Tax, on Account of the Order of Knighthood, he intended to confer on Henry his youngeſt Son (9). The Norman Cuſtom of making the Prince Preſents, when he knighted any of his Sons, tended too much to the King's Benefit for him to neglect to introduce it into England, where it was never practiſed before (10).

It was not difficult for the King to lay what Burthens he pleaſed on his Subjects, ſince he was ſure to be obeyed in whatever he enjoined. The Normans took care not to oppoſe his Will, for fear of loſing their Eſtates the ſame Way they acquired them, I mean, by a bare Act of his good Pleaſure; and the Engliſh were unable to throw off his oppreſſive Yoke. There was ſcarce a Lord of that Nation, but what was impriſoned or baniſhed. If any ſtill preſerved their Liberty, they were watched ſo narrowly, that the leaſt Oppoſition, or the leaſt Suſpicion given the King, was ſufficient to ruin them. Edgar Atheling, who ſeemed the moſt formidable, ſubſiſted entirely upon his Penſion from the King. Beſides, ſince 1085. his voluntary Submiſſion to the Conqueror, he had forfeited the Hearts and Affection of the Engliſh, who looked upon him now with the utmoſt Contempt. An Hiſtorian even aſſures us, he was in ſome Meaſure ſtupid. And for Proof alledges, that for a Horſe preſented him by the King, he remitted the Penſion given him for his Livelihood. The ill State of his Affairs, and perhaps the Fear of falling a Sacrifice to the King's Suſpicions, made him reſolve to go into the Eaſt and bear Arms againſt the Infidels (11). The King readily giving him Leave, he ſet out attended with two hundred Knights, who having loſt their Eſtates in England, were willing to ſeek their Fortune elſewhere. Having ſpent two Years in the Eaſtern Parts, where, it is pretended, he ſignalized himſelf by many brave Actions, he returned to England, regardleſs of the Eſtates and Honours offered him by the Emperor of Conſtantinople.

It does not appear what Author Rapin follows in ſaying this Aid was levied by the Conqueror, to make his youngeſt Son a Knight, which was never practiſed. 1086. was grown so corpulent and unweildy, that a quiet Life seemed absolutely necessary for him. But he was far from any such thought. All on a sudden he is seen to make extraordinary Preparations, which plainly shewed he was meditating some great Undertaking. Philip, King of France, easily guessed this Armament was designed against him. And indeed, quickly after, King William sets out for Normandy, in order to make fierce War with France (1.). But Philip prevented the impending Storm, by offering Propositions, which were followed by a Truce. The King, whose Corpulency was extremely troublesome to him, taking this opportunity to go through a Course of Physick, a Jest of King Philip occasioned the breaking of the Truce. This Prince asking one that was come from Roan, Whether the King of England was delivered yet of his great Belly? King William being informed of it, sent him word (2), as soon as he was up again, he would come and offer in the Church of Notre-Dame at Paris, ten thousand Lances by way of Wax-lights (3).

A Truce. Malmsh. M. Paris. Broken by a Jest.

1087. His Words were soon followed by Deeds; for marching in the very hottest time or the Summer (4), he ravaged le Vexin in a terrible manner, and then laid Siege to Mantes. He was so provoked, that after taking the City, he reduced it to ashes, without sparing the very Churches, in one of which two Hermits were burnt (5). The warmth of the Season, and the great Fire, which he stood very near to see his Orders executed, threw him into a Fever, which interrupted his Progress. This was attended with another accident, no less fatal to him. Whilst he was on the road in his return to Roan, leaping a Ditch on Horse-back, he so bruised the Rim of his Belly against the Pummel of the Saddle, that the Violence of the Blow very much increased his Fever. After this Accident, not being able to mount his Horse, he was carried in a Litter to Roan, where he grew worse and worse. As soon as he found he was near his End, he began seriously to reflect on all the past Actions of his Life, and view them in a different Light from what he had hitherto done. He ordered large Sums to be given to the Poor and the Churches, particularly for rebuilding those he had burnt at Mantes. He set at Liberty all the Prisoners, among whom were Morcar and Ulnoth (6). This last, Brother to King Harold, had been detained in Prison in Normandy from his Childhood when he was given in Hostage by Earl Goodwin to Edward the Confessor. It was much more difficult to obtain the like Favour of the King for the Bishop of Bayeux his Brother, because he had sworn never to release him. However, he was prevailed upon by the Importunities of the Bishop's Friends (7). His Distemper, which daily increased, leaving him no hopes of Recovery, he ordered his principal Officers to stand round his Bed, and notwithstanding his Weakness, made them a long Discourse, wherein he greatly extolled the Reputation he had gained by his warlike Actions. Nevertheless, he could not forbear owning, he had unjustly usurped the Crown of England, and was guilty of all the Blood split upon that occasion. Adding, as he would not presume to bequeath a Crown, which of Right did not belong to him, he left it to God's disposal: but if he might have his Wish, William, his second Son, should wear it after him. In his Will, which he made just before he died (8), he left Normandy to his eldest Son Robert, not so much out of Affection (9), as because he foresaw great Obstacles in the execution of his Will, should he have ordered it otherwise. Henry his third Son, had for his share an Annuity of five thousand Marks (10), with all his Mother's Effects (11); this was all his Portion. It is said, the young Prince complaining that he was so ill provided for, the King told him by a prophetick Spirit, he should one day be King of England, and excell his Brothers in Glory and Riches. But one can hardly believe, God so intimately revealed himself to such a Prince as this (12).

Though the dying King left his Crown to God's disposal, he did all that lay in his power to procure it for his second Son. He wrote upon that subject to Lanfranc a very pressing Letter (13), which he ordered his Son William, even before his Death, to carry himself. No doubt, he thought that Prince would meet with too strong an Opposition in England, in case necessary Measures were not taken before-hand, to gain the Consent of the Normans and English. Having thus settled his Temporal Affairs, he caused himself to be removed to Hermentrude, a Village near Roan, that he might be more at Liberty to think of his Spiritual Concerns. Here this Prince ended his Days on the ninth of September, in the Sixty-fourth Year of his Age, after a Reign of Fifty-two Years in Normandy, and Twenty-one in England (14). If some of his Historians are to be credited, he expressed on his Death-bed a hearty Sorrow for all the Injuries he had done the English. His Body was removed to Caen without any Ceremony, and deposited in the Abbey-Church, built by himself, where he had chosen to lie. Robert, his eldest Son, being then in Germany, and William in England, his youngest Son Henry took care of his Funeral. The Corps was but meanly attended for so great a Prince, his principal Officers having abandoned him before he expired, some to make their Court to Robert, others to William (15). An extraordinary Adventure rendered the Funeral of this Monarch very remarkable. Just as they were going to lay him in his Grave, [Anselm Fitz-Arthur] a Norman Gentleman, stands up and forbids the Burial in that Place, claiming the Ground as his Inheritance, and alledging, the deceased had built the Church upon it, without paying him for it. Whereupon, they were forced to stop, according to the Laws of the Country, in order to examine this Pretension; which proving well grounded, Henry was obliged to make the Gentleman Satisfaction (16), and then the Corps was interred (17).

Thus lived and died William I. surnamed the Bastard and Conqueror, if this last Title may be justly ascribed to him, which all Historians are not agreed in. They that maintain this Title perfectly suits with him, ground their Opinion upon his having no Right to the Crown, and the Severity of his Government, which was all along Arbitrary. Others affirm, his Election entirely cancelled his Right of Conquest. This uncertainty gives occasion to compare him to the Emperor Augustus, of whom it is said, that he came to the Empire neither by Conquest nor Usurpation, nor Inheritance, nor Election, but by a strange mixture of these Rights. However this be, or in what manner soever King William may be accused or justified upon this head, he kept Possession of the Throne, by such Politick Methods as are practised by the most able Princes, but which are seldom consonant to the Maxims of Justice and Equity.

Remarks on the Surname of Conqueror.

This Prince's Character is variously drawn by the Historians, according to the different Faces, under which they were pleased to view him. Some considering him only as a Conqueror of a great Kingdom, extol him to the skies for his Valour and Prudence, and slightly pass over the rest of his Actions. Others considering the same Conquest as a real Usurpation, and reflecting chiefly on the Means he made use of to preserve it, scruple not to represent him as a real Tyrant. It is certain, they may be all in the right, since there was in this Monarch a great mixture of good and bad Qualities. He was reckoned one of the wisest Princes of his time. Ever vigilant and active, he shewed as great Resolution in executing, as Boldness in forming his Designs. He saw Danger at a distance, and generally endeavoured to prevent it. But when that could not be done, no Man faced it with greater Intrepidity. On the other hand, his extreme covetous Temper, and Partiality to his Countrymen, led him to the commission of many things, which can hardly be justified.

But at last, in the Year 1087, they came to Blows. Robert was the occasion of it; for he revolted again, and retired to the King of France, who furnished him with Troops, wherewith he ravaged Normandy. *W. The MONUMENT of K. William ye Conqueror.
at CAEN in NORMANDY.

1087. In his younger years, he was handſome and well proportioned. He had rather a ſtern and majeſtick, than a mild and taking countenance; however, he could ſometimes put on ſuch ſweetneſs and gentleneſs in his looks, as were hardly to be reſiſted. We may gueſs his great ſtrength and vigour from Hiſtorians aſſuring us, none but himſelf could bend his Bow. The ſame Hiſtorians are very much divided concerning his chaſtity. Some ſay, he was very much addicted to Women in his youth: Others tell us, his little inclination that way, gave occaſion to call his manhood in queſtion. Some affirm, after he was married, he never gave his Queen cauſe to be jealous. Others aſſure us, he kept for his miſtreſs a Clergyman's daughter, whom Matilda ordered to be ham-ſtringed. Be this as it will, after he was on the throne of England, Hunting was obſerved to be his ſole diverſion. His houſhold was perfectly well regulated; but his expences were not anſwerable to his greatneſs and riches. Nevertheleſs, upon ſolemn occaſions, he loved magnificence, and took a pleaſure in appearing in all his grandeur. Seldom did he fail of being crowned every year (1), at the three great feaſts of Chriſtmas, Eaſter, and Whitſuntide, which he generally ſpent at Glouceſter, Winchеſter, and Weſtminſter. During theſe feſtivals he kept a ſplended court, was much more eaſy of acceſs and liberal of his favours. The great Men of the Kingdom (2) were uſually about him whilſt theſe ſolemnities laſted; but one can hardly believe it was in order to hold a Wittena-Gemot or Parliament, as ſome do pretend (3). And indeed, there is no likelyhood, that after depriving the Engliſh of their eſtates, he ſhould leave them in poſſeſſion of the greateſt of their privileges. It is ſtill leſs probable he would tranſfer this right to foreigners, ſince he was at liberty to grant them the Engliſh eſtates on what terms he pleaſed. Now it is certain, his temper was ſuch, that he would never voluntarily render himſelf dependant on his own Subjects. However this be, if the Saxon Wittena-Gemot ſubſiſted in his reign, it may at leaſt be affirmed, its authority was very limited, and its nature very different from what it had been.

Malmſb. Sax. Ann. Malmſb.

There are Hiſtorians who greatly commend this Prince's clemency, on account of his being very often ſatisfied with puniſhing the Engliſh rebels, by the confiſcation of their eſtates. It cannot be denied, what they ſay is true, with regard to perſons of the firſt rank. Indeed, except Earl Walthoff, who was publickly beheaded, and Egelwin Biſhop of Durham, who was ſtarved in priſon, we don't find any of the principal Engliſh Lords put to death in this reign. But his clemency with reſpect to perſons of a lower rank cannot be juſtly extolled. It is certain he puniſhed great numbers with death, put out the eyes or cut off the hands of many others, and condemned multitudes to perpetual impriſonment for very ſlight crimes. All the Hiſtorians unanimouſly upbraid him with the death of Earl Walthoff, as an action the moſt heinous; ſince he beheaded him for what he had already pardoned. But this ſeverity was in ſome meaſure balanced by his moderation to Prince Edgar, who had furniſhed him with ſufficient pretences to ſacrifice him to his jealouſy. Perhaps, the little merit of this Prince was the ſole motive of this moderation; ſince the King never conſidered him as a very formidable rival. However, I think he ought to be praiſed for his clemency in this reſpect, ſince the motive is unknown. How little formidable ſoever Edgar might be, with regard to his perſonal qualities, he can't be denied to be ſo on account of his birth. He was the only ſurviving Prince of the royal family of the Saxons, and as he ſerved for a cloak to ſeveral inſurrections, the King could not be entirely aſſured of him.

King William had by Matilda, daughter to the Earl of Flanders, four Sons and five Daughters. Robert was Duke of Normandy. Richard was killed by a Stag in the new Foreſt, or, as others ſay, by a diſtemper caught in hunting, of which he died in his Father's life-time (4). William mounted the throne of England, and was ſucceeded by Henry his Brother. Cicely his eldeſt daughter was Abbeſs of the Holy-Trinity at Caen. Conſtance was married to Alan Fergeant Duke of Bretagne. Adela was wife to Stephen Earl of Blois, and by him had a Son of the ſame name, whom we ſhall ſee King of England. Adeliza, promiſed to Harold, died young (5). Alphonſo King of Gallicia married the fifth, whoſe name was Agatha (6). She is ſaid to remain a Virgin after marriage, and, being entirely devoted to the ſervice of God, ſpent her days in the conſtant exerciſe of Prayer (7).

Note (o). The ſame is alſo confirmed by the late learned Mr. Madox. At this Court, and more eſpecially at ſome ſolemn times in the year, the King held his Great Councils, and ordinarily tranſacted ſuch Affairs as were of great Importance, or required Pomp and Solemnity, according to the Cuſtom of the Times. See p. 178. Note (6). The Baronage attending on his royal Perſon made a conſiderable Part of his Court. They were his Homagers; they held their Baronies of him; he was their Sovereign or chief Lord, and they were his Men, as to Life, Limb, and earthly Honour. With them the King conſulted in weighty Affairs, and did many ſolemn Acts in their Preſence, and with their Concurrence. Madox, Hiſt. of the Exchequer, p. 2.—6. III. As the Tranſlator intends to give a ſhort account of the Coin in every Reign, he begins with obſerving, That, probably, the Britons never coined any Money, but in Cæſar's time uſed only Iron Rings and ſhapeleſs Pieces of Braſs, and that even their Tribute-Money afterwards was the ordinary current Coin brought in or minted here by the Romans, as long as this Iſland continued a Province. For among the many thouſand Roman Coins, there was never one undoubted Britiſh Coin yet produced; thoſe of Cunobelin be liable to unanſwerable Objections. After the Saxons were ſettled in England, their Silver Coins were generally all of a ſize and ill-minted, which they called Penniet, worth about Three-pence of our Money. They had alſo Half-Pennies and Farthings, (as appears from the Saxon Goſpels) and Half-Farthings, called Stica's. Of which kind Biſhop Nicolſon takes thoſe Braſs Pieces to be that were found ſome Years ſince at Rippon in Yorkſhire, and communicated by Sir Edward Blacket the Owner to ſeveral curious Antiquaries. After the Norman Conqueſt, a Pound of Gold being divided into twenty-four Carats, (or half Ounces) and every Carat into four Grains, the old Sterling, (as it was afterwards called) or Right Standard of Gold, conſiſted of twenty-three Carats, and three Grains and half of fine Gold, and half a Grain of Allay of Copper or Silver. Again; a Pound of Silver being divided into twelve Ounces, and every Ounce into twenty Penny-weights, and every Penny-weight into twenty-four Grains, a Pound weight of Old Sterling conſiſted then (as it does now) of eleven Ounces two Penny-weights of fine Silver, and eighteen Penny-weights of Allay. The firſt eight Kings after the Conqueſt continued to coin Money much like their Saxon Predeceſſors, only a little lighter; for of the Saxon Pennies there are ſome at this Day that weigh more than a Penny-weight, whereas few of thoſe of the Norman Kings reach twenty-two Grains 'till Edward I, when the Engliſh Pennies were to weigh a Penny-weight. The Normans alſo continued the like Method with the Saxons as to Inſcriptions, having round the King's Head his Name and Stile; which was very ſhort, only REX or REX ANGL. and on the Reverſe, the Name of the Mint-

2. WILLIAM II. Sirnamed RUFUS.

WILLIAM II. 1087.

WHILST the Conqueror was taken up in Normandy with the thoughts of dying, William his Son was concerting in England all neceſſary meaſures to ſecure the crown, purſuant to his Father's intention. Diſpatch was ſo much the more neceſſary on this occaſion, as he had reaſon to fear, in caſe his Brother Robert could come in time, he would gain the people to his ſide. His buſineſs therefore was to ſecure, beforehand, the Normans to his intereſt, who being poſſeſſed of all the Fiefs and Places in the kingdom, were properly to diſpoſe of the future election. However, the Engliſh were by no means to be neglected, leſt joined to Robert's friends, they might turn the Scale to his ſide. Mean while, young William was beloved by neither. The Engliſh thought him too like the King his father, and the Normans, who knew him ſtill better, dreaded his rough temper. On the other hand, Robert had birthright to plead in his favour; whereas William could ſupport his pretenſions only by his Father's bare deſire of having him for ſucceſſor. But this bare indication of his Will, without an expreſs nomination, was very inſufficient. Nay, in all likelihood it would never have produced the effect, the dying King promiſed himſelf, if, before the news of his death reached England, care had not been taken to diſpoſe Men to a compliance. It was with this view, he ſent over his Son with all ſpeed (1), to endeavour, with Lanfranc, and ſome other Lords, to accompliſh his project. Eudo High-Treaſurer (2), and Lanfranc Archbiſhop of Canterbury were very ſerviceable to young William on this occaſion. The firſt had ſecured Dover, Wincheſter, Pevenſey, Haſtings, and other places on the South-coaſt. Moreover, he delivered to him the late King's treaſures, which amounted to ſixty thouſand pounds in money, beſides plate and jewels of a much greater value. Lanfranc, who was eſteemed and beloved as well by the Engliſh as Normans, uſed all his credit in his favour. His pains were crowned with ſo good ſucceſs, that in a little time he drew to his party the leading Lords of both Nations. To theſe were added other means, which helped to incline people to William's ſide. It was rumour'd among the Engliſh, that this Prince had made a firm reſolution to govern in a very different manner from the King his father; that he would hearken to their juſt complaints, and aboliſh the too rigorous laws enacted ſince the revolution, particularly the laws relating to the Game. In ſhort, it was promiſed in his name, that they ſhould be reſtored to a part of their eſtates, and to their ancient privileges. On the other hand, the Normans were told, the beſt way to preſerve their poſſeſſions, was to confirm the Conqueror's choice; that the young Prince, being placed on the throne, would be led by his own intereſt to ſupport them, ſince his and their rights would ſtand on the ſame foundation, namely, the Will of the late King. Robert, being abſent, had but few friends to ſpeak for him. As it was uncertain how he would behave after his return, thoſe that would have been inclined to favour him, did not dare to declare for him openly. They foreſaw the ill conſequences of ſuch a proceeding, in caſe he ſhould not think fit to ſupport them. Beſides, this party had no head. William had taken care to keep Ulnoth and Morcar in priſon (3), notwithſtanding his Father's orders to the contrary, for fear they ſhould head the Engliſh, whom he did not take for his friends. All theſe Circumſtances well managed by Lanfranc and other adherents to Prince William, concurring to pave his way to the throne, he was crown'd the 27th of September, eighteen days after his father's death (4). 1087.

This Prince, ſirnamed Rufus from being red-haired (5), was thirty years of age when he aſcended the throne. Probably, he was indebted for his good fortune to Robert's diſobliging the King his father, who never forgave his revolt. And indeed, the younger had nothing to give him the preference to the elder. The only good quality remarkable in him, was his great courage, which however was hardly to be diſtinguiſhed from a brutiſh fierceneſs. He was of a very ill diſpoſition, which being never corrected by education, frequently led him to actions unworthy of a Prince. Bred up to arms from his youth, and at a court, where he continually beheld inſtances of ſeverity and abſolute power, he became a perfect Brute in his behaviour and manners. To theſe ill qualities he joined a great indifferency for religion, and his whole conduct ſhewed him to be regardleſs of honour or honeſty. He was as greedy of money as his father, but with this difference, the Father heaped up money purely for the ſake of hoarding, and very unwillingly parted with it; whereas the Son loved it only to ſquander it away in vain expences, wherein he was guided more by caprice than reaſon. However, in the beginning of his reign, as it was his intereſt to hide his inclinations for fear of alarming his ſubjects, he put on a maſk for ſome time. It was even obſerved with pleaſure, that he affected to be guided by the counſels of Lanfranc, who was univerſally eſteemed and beloved. It was chiefly the reſpect he at firſt paid this wiſe Councellor, that filled the Engliſh with hopes of a happy change in their fortune, and prevented them from giving ear to the ſollicitations of thoſe that would have engaged them in Robert's cauſe. His Character. S. Dunelm. Hoved.

But whilſt the confidence he placed in this Prelate was ſerviceable to him, with regard to the Engliſh, it occaſioned ſuch troubles from another quarter, as ſhook him in his throne. Odo his Uncle, Biſhop of Bayeux, who was lately releaſed out of priſon, could not bear to ſee Lanfranc in ſo great favour (6). He had harboured a ſecret animoſity againſt the Archbiſhop, ever ſince his adviſing the King to ſeize him, as he was embarking for Rome. This private enmity, joined to a deſire of ruling again as he had done formerly, threw him upon the project of dethroning the King, and ſetting the crown on the head of Robert, who was lately returned to Normandy. He did not want a pretence to countenance his enterprize. Robert's birthright furniſhed him with a very plauſible one. As ſoon as he had taken this reſolution, he drew into his Plot ſome of the principal Norman Lords. It was neceſſary to begin with them, ſince, without their aid, the Engliſh were able to do nothing. Theſe Normans being gained with many others, by their means, it was not very difficult to perſuade the Engliſh to join with them. As the greateſt part were diſpoſſeſſed of their eſtates, they expected ſome relief from the troubles that were going to be raiſed in the Kingdom, by the diſſention between the two Brothers. In order to confirm both Engliſh and Normans in their late reſolution, Odo repreſented to them, there was no living happily under the government of a capricious and brutiſh Prince, without religion or honeſty: That they had reaſon to dread the worſt, if they gave him time to eſtabliſh himſelf in the throne, and therefore, ſhould they delay to take proper meaſures to ſcreen themſelves from the impending Evils, it would perhaps be too late, when they had a mind to undertake it. 1088. 1089. He added, Juſtice itſelf required the crown to be given to the firſt-born, to which he had a lawful right, and of which he had not deſerved to be deprived. Theſe conſiderations were ſtrengthened with aſſurances of the uprightneſs and generoſity of Robert. He ſet forth his mild and gracious diſpoſition, which put them in hopes of enjoying, under his government, the tranquillity they ſo earneſtly longed for.

Whether birth-right had any weight with theſe Lords, or William's ill temper made them wiſh for a new maſter, they readily came into the Prelate's meaſures. Each promiſed to do his utmoſt to promote the deſign, provided Robert would exert himſelf likewiſe, and bring over ſupplies from Normandy. The Norman Lords, who were in the conſpiracy, beſtirred themſelves ſo effectually, that they quickly gained almoſt all the leading-men of their nation. As ſoon as the Biſhop was ſecure of the aſſiſtance of his countrymen, whom he judged much more capable of ſerving Robert than the Engliſh, he ſent that Prince word, that nothing was wanting but his preſence, with a body of Norman troops, to recover the crown unjuſtly uſurped by his Brother. As this news could not but be very agreeable to the Duke, he came immediately to a reſolution upon ſo advantagious a propoſal. But as he had not Money ſufficient to defray the expences of ſo great an undertaking, he borrowed [three thouſand pounds] of his Brother Henry, for which he mortgaged to him the country of Cotentin (1). Then he ſent his Uncle word, he would not fail of coming to England, as ſoon as poſſible, deſiring him to prepare every thing for the execution of their deſigns.

Robert borrows Money of his Brother Henry. Brompt.

As ſoon as the Norman Lords were certified of Robert's reſolution they began to ſtir (2). The Biſhop of Conſtance, with his Nephew Mowbray (3), made themſelves maſters of Bath and Barklay Caſtle, and ſtored Briſtol with ammunition, intending that place for their chief magazine. Roger Bygod in Norfolk, Hugh Grantmenil in Leiceſterſhire, ſeized ſeveral places. Roger de Montgomery (4), William Biſhop of Durham (5), Bernard of Newark (6), Roger Lacy, Ralph Mortimer ſecured Worceſterſhire. In a word, there was not a Lord among the conſpirators but what fortified himſelf in ſome city. Had Robert arrived at that time, probably he would have dethroned his Brother. But his natural ſlothfulneſs, and unneceſſary expences made him loſe ſo fair an opportunity. On the contrary, the King, who was of a quite different temper, omitted nothing to ſtifle the conſpiracy, whilſt his Brother's indolence afforded him time. The moſt effectual means he made uſe of, was the gaining the Engliſh to his ſide, in which Lanfranc's intereſt was very ſerviceable to him. This prelate, who in a late reign had ſhewn great regard for the Engliſh, made uſe of their confidence in him, to induce them to aſſiſt the King in ſo urgent a neceſſity. By his ſollicitations and pains, he reclaimed the conſpirators, and perſuaded the reſt to continue firm to the King (7). So that in a very ſhort ſpace William was enabled to ſend out a fleet, whilſt with an army of Engliſhmen (8), he marched againſt Odo his Uncle, whom he juſtly conſidered as the Ring-leader of the rebels. The Prelate had fortified himſelf in Kent, where he had made himſelf maſter of Rocheſter, and Pevenſey. As ſoon as he heard of the King's approach, he ſhut himſelf up in Pevenſey (9), where he was in hopes to hold out a ſiege, 'till the Duke of Normandy ſhould come to his relief. But as he was more hot than couragious, and for want of fore-ſight, had even neglected to provide things neceſſary for his defence, the town was taken in a few days (10) by the furious aſſaults of the King. Odo could obtain his pardon upon no other terms but the procuring the ſurrender of Rocheſter, where the chief of the Norman Lords were ſhut up, under the command of Euſtace Earl of Boulogne. To this purpoſe he was conducted to the gates of Rocheſter, where he feigned to perſuade the governour to deliver up the city. But Euſtace obſerving by his looks, that he did not ſpeak from his heart, detained him priſoner, and ſo furniſhed him with a plauſible excuſe for the breach of his promiſe.

William deſpairing of becoming maſter of Rocheſter this way, was obliged to beſiege it. He was ſix weeks before the town without making any progreſs (11), the Beſieged defending themſelves with ſuch bravery, that he began to loſe all hopes of ſucceſs. But at length a contagious diſtemper, which daily weakened them, compelled them to deſire a capitulation. It was no eaſy matter to agree upon the terms. At length, after many debates, the King granted them the liberty to march off with their horſes, without hopes of being ever reſtored to their eſtates and employments. The Biſhop of Bayeux, being reduced to a very low condition, retired to the Duke of Normandy, who committed to him the adminiſtration of his affairs. The ſiege of Rocheſter had furniſhed the Duke with a fair opportunity to make a diverſion in ſome other part of the kingdom. But by an inexcuſable negligence, he loſt the advantage of ſo favourable a juncture. Inſtead of going himſelf into England with forces proportionable to the greatneſs of his enterpriſe, he contented himſelf with ſending a ſingle Ship with ſome ſoldiers, who were all taken and drowned (12).

William being maſter of Rocheſter, marched his army towards Durham, to chaſtiſe the Biſhop, who was one of the rebels. As the Garriſon was very weak, the city was quickly obliged to ſurrender, and the Biſhop with all that had taken arms againſt the King, were baniſhed. Thus, this conſpiracy, which ſeemed ſo dangerous, was cruſhed by the vigour and good conduct of the King, who equally made uſe of prudence and force to bring the Rebels to reaſon. He not only gained by his addreſs Montgomery (13), but alſo ſeveral other Norman Lords, whoſe defection was very prejudicial to Robert's party. By his ſecret emiſſaries, he made them ſenſible, they were extremely in the wrong to act againſt him: That, ſeeing they held their Eſtates by virtue of the ſame right that procured him the crown, it was manifeſtly their intereſt to ſupport him. On the other hand, he gave an inſtance of the greateſt prudence in beginning with his Uncle's deſtruction, who was the author of the Conſpiracy. But his ſucceſs on this occaſion was chiefly owing to his diligence.

As the Engliſh had ſhewed themſelves ready to aſſiſt him in his neceſſity, they expected a ſuitable reward. But it was not long before they perceived they flattered themſelves with vain hopes. Whilſt he wanted their aſſiſtance, he gave them fair words; but as ſoon as he ſaw himſelf well ſettled in the throne, he forgot his promiſes. He even began to oppreſs them with ſeveral impoſitions; in which he ſhewed ſtill leſs moderation than the late King. He was gently admoniſhed of theſe proceedings by Lanfranc, who could not forbear putting him in mind of what he had promiſed. How careful ſoever this Prelate might be to make uſe of the moſt reſpectful terms, William was extremely offended, and asked him in an angry tone and with an oath, Whether he thought it poſſible for a King to keep all his Promiſes? From that time the Archbiſhop was quite out of favour, neither did the King ever afford him one kind look. But his diſgrace was of no long continuance. He died quickly after, lamented by both Nations, as one of the moſt worthy Prelates, promoted to the See of Canterbury ever ſince the converſion of the Saxons.

More eſpecially he gave a looſe to his natural deſire of heaping up money in order to ſquander it away in a vain and extravagant manner. Avaricious without frugality, covetous and prodigal at the ſame time, continually ſcraping up money without ever filling his coffers, he was always in want, and under a neceſſity of inventing perpetually new ways and means of raiſing money. One of his methods, never before practiſed in England, was to ſeize the vacant benefices. As ſoon as the Archbiſhoprick of Canterbury was vacant by Lanfranc's death, he ſeized the temporalities, and kept them in his hands four years. He did the ſame with the Biſhoprick of Lincoln, and all others that became void in his Reign. This Prince's Hiſtorians, moſt part Monks or Eccleſiaſticks, bitterly inveigh againſt him upon this account. They ſo frequently inſiſt on this point, that there is no room to doubt, it was one of the principal motives which induced them to blacken his reputation to the utmoſt of their power. However this be, theſe proceedings occaſioned loud clamours among the Clergy; but they were diſregarded by the King. It was in vain they carried their complaints to the Pope. The Court of Rome, as matters then ſtood, durſt not intermeddle in this affair. The Church was rent by a Schiſm, wherein England was yet unengaged. Beſides, Urban II, to whom the Engliſh Clergy made application, was then projecting the recovery of the Holy-Land, in which enterpriſe he intended to engage all the Princes of Chriſtendom. It was not poſſible therefore for the Pope, nor conſiſtent with his intereſt, to fall upon William at ſuch a juncture.

A Schiſm in the Church hinders the Pope from intermedling.

1090. This Monarch had reaſon to be ſatisfied with the poſſeſſion of a Crown, which he had no right to expect. This ſingle conſideration, doubtleſs, ought to have bred in him ſo much regard for his Brother Robert, as might have helped to make him eaſy under the injury he had done him. But neither duty nor brotherly affection could balance in his mind the deſire of becoming maſter of all his Father's dominions. He no ſooner ſaw himſelf ſettled in the throne of England, but he formed a deſign to conquer Normandy. Perhaps, to his avidity was added the deſire of being revenged for the Duke his Brother's attempt to dethrone him. Be this as it will, after making extraordinary preparations, the intent of which Robert never ſuſpected, he made a deſcent in Normandy. He immediately became Maſter of St. Valeri, Albemarle, and ſome other Places, whilſt Robert was unprovided of forces to oppoſe this invaſion (1).

He takes Valeri and Albemarle.

The preſſing neceſſity the Duke was in of applying to a foreign power, obliged him to implore the protection of the King of France, who came in perſon to his aſſiſtance. But he reaped no great advantage from thence. William, who underſtood how to uſe cunning as well as force, found means to make Philip his friend (2), who retired without doing any thing, leaving Robert expoſed, as before, to the inſults of his Brother. By the King of France's retreat, the Duke's affairs were in a worſe condition than ever, for relying on that aid, he had taken no other meaſures. William took from him ſeveral other Places, and bribed certain Burghers of Roan, who promiſed to deliver the Metropolis of Normandy into his hands (3).

Mean time, Robert was in great Straits (4). He had no other refuge than the aſſiſtance of Henry his youngeſt Brother; but he had little reaſon to expect any favour from him. Henry was exaſperated at the Duke's taking poſſeſſion of Cotentin without paying what he owed him, and was preparing to do himſelf juſtice by force. Nevertheleſs, Robert's promiſe to make him ſatisfaction, as ſoon as the war was ended, diſarmed him, and even engaged him in his quarrel. This aid came very ſeaſonably, to free the Duke from his preſent danger. Henry hearing of the plot that was contrived at Roan, ſuddenly entered the city, and ſeizing Conon Chief of the Conſpirators, threw him headlong from a Tower. By this bold action, he quaſhed the conſpiracy, which, had it taken effect, would have robbed the Duke of his Capital, and probably, of all his other dominions.

1091. The union of the two Brothers, and the ill ſucceſs of the Roan conſpiracy, put a ſtop to William's progreſs, who, quickly after, was obliged to conclude a peace with the Duke. The articles of the treaty were, that Robert ſhould deliver up to the King the Country of Eu and Towns of Feſcamp and Cherburgh, with all the Places he had taken on the Coaſt of Normandy. William on his part, obliged himſelf to aſſiſt him in reducing the Province of Maine which had revolted, to reſtore to the Normans all their confiſcated Eſtates in England, and to grant certain Fiefs to his Brother in the ſame kingdom. Laſtly, it was agreed, if either of the two Brothers died without heirs, the ſurvivor ſhould ſucceed to all his dominions. This treaty was ſolemnly ſwore to by twelve Barons on each ſide, and the Brothers ſeemed perfectly reconciled. 1091.

But if theſe two Princes were pleaſed, their younger Brother was not ſo. He was not only omitted in this treaty, but found Robert by no means diſpoſed to keep his word with him. Incenſed at this treatment, he thought he might lawfully right himſelf ſome other way, and, on a ſudden, ſurprized Mount St. Michael. This unexpected blow ſtartled Robert, who not caring to leave a place of that importance in the hands of his Brother, deſired William's aſſiſtance to retake it. Though William had no concern in this affair, he readily accompanied Robert (5) to the Siege, or rather Blockade of this place, ſituated on a rock, which the Sea, by flowing round it twice a day, renders inacceſſible.

He is beſieged there.

Whilſt the two Brothers lay before Mount St. Michael, William, as he was riding alone at ſome diſtance from the camp, chanced to ſee two Horſemem (6) coming from the town. As he was of an impetuous temper, he rid up to them to try to take one of them Priſoner, that he might be informed of the ſtate of the place. The Soldiers, finding themſelves attacked by a ſingle perſon only, ſtood upon their defence, and in the firſt encounter his Horſe was killed under him, and himſelf thrown on the ground with his foot intangled in the ſtirrup. This accident would have coſt him his life, if, the moment one of the Soldiers was going to kill him, he had not cried out, Hold, Raſeal, I am the King of England, upon which, they were ſtruck with fear and reſpect, and helping him up, gave him one of their Horſes. He nimbly leaped into the Saddle, and then addreſſing himſelf to the perſon that diſmounted him, Come, ſaid he to him, thou ſhalt be my Soldier for the future, and enjoy the reward of thy valour.

An Adventure of William's. Knighton. Malmſb.

Though the ſiege went on but ſlowly, Henry was driven to great ſtraits for want of water. However, as he knew Robert's good nature, he did not deſpair of ſome relief, by repreſenting to him, it would be more glorious to ſubdue him by arms than by thirſt. Robert, who was naturally generous, ſent him immediately a tun of wine (7), with leave to ſupply him with as much water as was neceſſary. William upbraided him as guilty of folly in this complaiſance. What, replied he, is the quarrel between us and our Brother of that importance, that we ſhould deſire he ſhould die with thirſt? We may have occaſion for a Brother hereafter, but where ſhall we find another when we have deſtroyed this? But William not at all pleaſed with this, as he thought, unſeaſonable generoſity, quitted the ſiege and returned to England. However, Robert perſiſted, notwithſtanding all difficulties, to carry on the ſiege, till the place was ſurrender'd upon terms. Henry having liberty to go where he pleaſed, wandered up and down for ſome time without any fixed abode, attended only by a chaplain and three or four domeſticks.

Whilſt William was employed in Normandy, Malcolm King of Scotland took advantage of his abſence, to make an incurſion into Northumberland (8), from whence he had carried away a great booty. The northern people loudly complained of the King's amuſing himſelf beyond Sea, whilſt his frontiers were plundered by foreigners. Theſe complaints apparently haſtening his return, he was no ſooner arrived (9), but he made great preparations to be revenged of the King of Scotland. But fearing his Brother Robert, who was become maſter of Mount St. Michael, would take advantage of his abſence and ſeize his Caſtles in Normandy, he deſired him to come and join him. He pretended, his valour and experience were abſolutely neceſſary to put an honourable end to the war. But to engage him by a more powerful Motive, he promiſed as ſoon as the affair was over, he would punctually perform his part of their late treaty. Robert being prevailed upon by this promiſe, and the good opinion the King his Brother ſeemed to have of him, ſpeedily repaired into England and attended him to Scotland.

Storm.

1091. Storm (1), his Army ſuffered no leſs in marching over the Moraſſes and Mountains. The want of Proviſions in thoſe almoſt deſolate Places he was engaged in, and the Roads, grown impaſſable by reaſon of the bad Weather, viſibly deſtroyed ſo many of his Men, that he often repented of this Expedition. He would have been very hard put to it, by theſe Accidents, had not Malcolm been apprehenſive of the ill Conſequences of a War, that had drawn the Enemy into his Country. And therefore, chuſing rather to oblige William to leave Scotland by fair Means, than venture to drive them thence by Force, he ſent him Propoſals (2), which being gladly accepted, were ſoon followed by a Treaty of Peace. The Conditions were, that Malcolm ſhould pay William the ſame Homage his Father had done: That twelve Manors, held by him in England before the Rupture, ſhould be reſtored to him, and that William ſhould pay him yearly twelve Marks (3) in lieu of all other Claims. Prince Edgar, who was employed in this Negotiation, behaving to the Satisfaction of both Parties, William and Robert received him into Favour, and he had Leave to return into England. The Duke of Normandy was in hopes the War being over, the King his Brother would ſeriouſly think of ſatisfying him. But perceiving at length he fought only to amuſe him, he returned home (4) in great Anger, taking Prince Edgar along with him.

William rebuilds Carliſle. Sax. Ann. Fl. Wig. S. Dunelm. The frequent Irruptions of the Scots into the northern Parts of England, convincing the King of the Neceſſity of ſtopping their Progreſs by a ſtrong Barrier, he ordered the City of Carliſle upon the Tine to be rebuilt. This City which had been deſtroyed by the Danes, and lain two hundred Years in ruins, was peopled again, and endowed with great Privileges which it enjoys to this Day (6). The Epiſcopal See of Dorcheſter was removed to Lincoln, and that of Wells to Bath about this Time, with the King's Conſent, which was purchaſed with a large Sum of Money.

1093. He falls ill. S. Dunelm. Eadmer. Sax. Ann. This Monarch was become ſo abſolute, that he met with no Oppoſition to his Will. Taxes and Impoſitions were renewed every Day on diverſe Pretences. Nothing happened but what the King made an Occaſion to levy Money upon the Cities, Boroughs, private Perſons, without favouring the Normans any more than the Engliſh. None daring to oppoſe theſe Oppreſſions, the People expected no other Remedy for their Evils, but the Death of the King, which they heartily prayed for in private. A Diſtemper, which ſeized him at Glouceſter (7), gave them hopes their Prayers were going to be heard. He himſelf thought he had not long to live. The approach of Death, which to him ſeemed certain, and the Exhortations of the Biſhops about him, threw him into Reflections, which were followed by ſome Signs of Repentance. He appeared firmly reſolved to correct the Miſmanagements in the Government, if it pleaſed God to reſtore him to his Health. The Biſhops improving theſe good Motions, admoniſhed him to fill the vacant Benefices. They repreſented to him what an Obſtacle it was to his Salvation, to apply the Church's Revenues to Uſes contrary to the Intent of the Donors. The Condition he was in, made him readily comply with whatever was deſired. He nominated Robert Bloet, one of his Counſellors, to the Biſhoprick of Lincoln, and for Archbiſhop of Canterbury, made choice of Anſelm, Abbot of Bec in Normandy, who was then at the Engliſh Court. It was with great difficulty that Anſelm was prevailed upon to accept of this Dignity. He was a zealous Aſſertor of the Rights of the Church, and as he knew William was not very ſcrupulous in theſe Matters, he dreaded the taking upon him a Burden, which to him ſeemed too weighty in ſuch a Reign. However, the Perſwaſions of the Biſhops, and ſeeming Repentance of the King, brought him at length to a Compliance. Before he was conſecrated, he requeſted the King, to reſtore to the Church of Canterbury all that belonged to it in Lanfranc's Time; which was poſitively promiſed. Mean time, William, finding he was out of Danger, and perceiving he daily gathered Strength, uſed delays, to avoid reſtoring the Church-Lands. At length, as the Archbiſhop preſſed him continually upon that Subject, he frankly declared his Intent was, that the Perſons to whom he had granted the Lands ſhould enjoy them, they and their Poſterity. He even told the Archbiſhop, he expected his Conſent. But Anſelm would never be brought to this Compliance, which he looked upon as a downright Prevarication. Hence the great Conteſt between the King and him, which occaſioned a world of Trouble to both. 1093.

In the mean time, William, whoſe Repentance proceeded entirely from the fear of Death, finding himſelf perfectly recovered, forgot all his Promiſes, and fell to his former Courſes. The Priſoners, commanded to be freed, were, by his Order, more cloſely confined, and thoſe that were ſet at Liberty, were again thrown into Priſon. Extortion, Injuſtice, and Rapine, were as prevalent as ever. The Adminiſtration of Juſtice was in the Hands of ſuch as took more Care to enrich themſelves, than diſcharge the Duties of their reſpective Offices: All were Poor, but thoſe who had the fingering of the Publick-money. To be in Favour with the King, it was neceſſary to be without Honour or Conſcience. None but Informers met with Encouragement. Theſe Diſorders forced many honeſt Men to reſolve to quit the Kingdom, and ſeek elſewhere that Tranquillity they could not find in their native Country. But even this Liberty, which they imagined they could not be abridged of, was denied them by an Edict, forbidding all Perſons to go out of the Kingdom without the King's Leave.

Whilſt England was in this wretched Condition, Malcolm King of Scotland came to Glouceſter, according to an Agreement made with William, to ſettle ſome Affairs that were left undetermined in the late Treaty. As ſoon as the King had notice of his arrival, he ſent him Word, that he expected before all Things, to receive his Homage. Malcolm replied, he was ready to do it on the Frontiers of the two Kingdoms, according to Cuſtom. William, not ſatisfied with this Anſwer, let him know further, he would have it done in Glouceſter, the Vaſſal not being to appoint where he was to do his Homage. Malcolm, looking upon this as a Pretence to affront him, returned home without ſeeing the King, provoked at the Haughtineſs ſhown him. He was no ſooner in Scotland, but he began his Revenge with invading Northumberland. This was the fifth Time he had ravaged that Country, revenging on the innocent Subjects the Wrongs pretended to be received from the Sovereign. Robert de Mowbray was then Governour of the northern Parts. He was a Perſon of Courage and Conduct, and finding the King's Forces were too remote, took upon him ſpeedily to remedy the Evil his Government was afflicted with. He drew together a Body of Troops with ſuch diligence, that he fell on the Scots when they thought themſelves moſt ſecure. This unexpected attack throwing the Scots into Diſorder and Confuſion, they ran away without making ſcarce any Reſiſtance. Malcolm and Edward his eldeſt Son, vexed to ſee their flying Troops, and endeavouring to rally them, were both ſlain on the Spot. The Scotch Hiſtorians pretend the Engliſh ow'd their Victory to a notorious treachery (8). Perhaps it was becauſe the Scots ſuffered themſelves to be ſurprized. However this be, this fatal Battle was the Occaſion of numberleſs Evils to Scotland ſhortly after. Malcolm had with him a General called Walter, to whom, in reward of his Services, he had given the Office of Steward

Robert aſſiſted by the French. brib'd. But afterwards, Robert receiving Aſſiſtance from France, retook Argentan, and made the Garriſon, conſiſting of eight hundred Men, Priſoners. After that, he beſieged the Caſtle of Holms, which ſurrendered at Diſcretion. Theſe Succeſſes made William ſenſible, he ſhould find it difficult to be clear of this War without Loſs, if the French Troops continued in his Brother's Service. Having learnt by Experience that Philip was not Proof againſt Preſents, he reſolved to try the ſame Way that had formerly ſucceeded ſo well. But after the exceſſive Taxes laid on the Kingdom, it ſeemed impracticable to raiſe the Sum he then wanted. However, as he had a fertile Invention on theſe Occaſions, he bethought himſelf of a new Expedient

S. Dunelm. which ſucceeded to his Wiſh. Under Pretence that there was an urgent Occaſion for Supplies, he ſent Orders into England to levy with all poſſible Speed twenty thouſand Men. In raiſing this Army, ſuch were purpoſely taken for Soldiers as were well to paſs, or to whom it was very inconvenient to leave their Families. When theſe Levies

Who are brib'd by William. were going to embark, the King's Treaſurer told them, by his Order, that they might every Man repair to his own Home upon the Payment of Ten Shillings each (6). This News was ſo acceptable to theſe Soldiers liſted againſt their Wills, that there was not one but what was glad to be diſmiſſed at ſo eaſy a Rate. By this means William raiſed the Sum of ten thouſand Pounds Sterling, with which he brib'd the French to retire, who were an Obſtacle in his way. 1094.

The Departure of the Auxiliaries put Robert's Affairs in a very bad State. Probably, it would have occaſioned the Loſs of all his Dominions, if the King had not been obliged to return into England to quell the Welſh who were ravaging Shropſhire and Cheſter. Never could a Diverſion come more unſeaſonably, ſince it made him loſe the Conqueſt of Normandy, which he now thought infallible. He left Normandy therefore with extreme Indignation, after a Reconciliation with his Brother Henry, who croſs'd the Seas with him. 1095. War with the Welſh. Chron. Cambr.

The King's two Expeditions into Wales. At his arrival in England, he march'd into Wales, where he rebuilt the Caſtle of Montgomery that had been demoliſhed. At his approach, the Welch, according to Cuſtom, retired to the Mountains, where it was impoſſible to reach them. As that difficult Country was unknown to him, he loſt ſo many of his Men in obſtinately purſuing the Enemy in their lurking Holes, that he was at laſt compelled to retire without doing them much Damage.

In ſpite of the Difficulties he had ſtruggled with in this Expedition, he reſolved upon a Second, the ſame Year, after ſtrenthening his Army with new Levies. But he was ſcarce entered Wales, when he was called off from his Enterprize by Affairs of greater Importance, which more nearly concerned him.

Mowbray's Revolt. Malmſh. Hoved. S. Dunelm. Brompton. Sax. Ann. Robert de Mowbray had done the King ſignal Service by his Victory over the Scots. Blown up with this happy Succeſs, he imagined William could not ſufficiently reward ſo important a Service, that had freed him from a very troubleſome Neighbour. But the King, who had no Generoſity in him, expreſſed ſo little Gratitude, that the Earl's haughty Spirit led him to deviſe Means to make him repent of this Contempt. Nothing leſs would ſatisfy his Revenge than the dethroning of William and ſetting the Crown on the Head of Stephen, Earl of Albemarle, Nephew to William the Conqueror. He drew into this Conſpiracy a great Number of Lords, who, as well as he, were diſſatisfied with the harſh and ſcornful Behaviour of the King. William received the firſt News of this Conſpiracy as he was marching into Wales. But this War ſeeming to him of little Importance in Compariſon of the gathering Storm, he altered his Courſe (7), and

The King had like to fall into an Ambuſh. Ord. Vital. marched with all ſpeed to the North. His Deſign was to cruſh the Head of the Male-contents, before the reſt could join him. The Conſpirators foreſeeing he would march that Way, laid an Ambuſh for him, which he would have certainly fallen into, if Gilbert de Tunbridge (8), one of the Rebels, had not given him Notice of it. This

He beſieges Bamborough Stratagem failing, William continued his March, and beſieged the Caſtle of Bamborough, where Mowbray was (9). This Place, which was ſtrong and well ſtored with Neceſſaries, holding out longer than was expected, he reſolved to change the Siege into a Blockade, that he might go in queſt of the other Conſpirators, who were now

To this Purpoſe he built near Bamborough a Fortreſs which he called Mal-Voiſin, [or Bad-Neighbour,] becauſe it took away all poſſibility of throwing any Succours into the Caſtle. Some time after, Mowbray going out upon a falſe Information (10), had the Misfortune to fall into the Hands of the Beſiegers. As ſoon as

This Order produced the expected Effect, the Caſtle was ſurrendered upon Terms, and Mowbray confined in Windſor-Caſtle, where he remained a Priſoner thirty Years. His Companions in the Revolt

His Accomplices are all puniſhed. Malmſb. Sax. Ann. met with no better Treatment. Roger Lacy was diſpoſſeſſed of all his Lands (11). Hugh Earl of Cheſter redeemed his Life with the Sum of three thouſand Pounds Sterling.

Quarrel between the King and Anſelm. Dunelm. Hunt. Hoved. Eadmer. Malmſb.

The King was no ſooner out of this Trouble, but he fell into another, occaſioned by the renewal of his Differences with the Archbiſhop of Canterbury. He had no great regard to the Church's Immunities, which Anſelm too haughtily ſupported. This Prelate had even preſumed to acknowledge Urban II. for lawful Pope, though he very well knew the King was rather inclined to Clement his Antagoniſt. In vain was it repreſented to him, that by a Law made in the late Reign, no Perſon was to acknowledge a Pope without the King's Conſent. This Argument was of no force with him, who pretended the King had no Right to meddle with Eccleſiaſtical Affairs. But upon what ground did he himſelf pretend to determine for the whole Church of England? The King, for his part, was not willing to give way to his Subject, and as he began to treat him a little roughly, Anſelm deſired leave to go to Rome. William at firſt denied him, but at length conſented, being glad to be clear of him. However, not to let him depart without further Marks of his Diſpleaſure, he ſent an Officer after him, who overtaking him juſt as he was going to ſail, ranſacked his Baggage, and took away all the Money he could find, pretending it was againſt the Law to carry the Coin out of the Kingdom. After Anſelm's departure, the King ſeized the Temporalities of the Archbiſhoprick, and enjoyed them as long as he lived. This Prelate continued ſome time at Rome, where he did all that lay in his Power to ſtir up the Pope againſt the King. But at length, finding Urban did not care to engage in his Quarrel, he retired to a Monaſtery at Lyons, where he remained 'till William's Death.

Urban II. was then going to diſcover the grand Deſign which he had been long revolving in his Mind. I mean the famous Cruſade, undertaken for the Recovery of the Holy-Land out of the Hands of the Saracens (1). This great Affair is ſo well known, that there is no Occaſion to deſcend to Particulars. It will be ſufficient to remind the Reader, that Peter the Hermite firſt ſet this Project on foot; that Pope Urban II. preached it himſelf at the Council of Clermont; and that numberleſs Perſons of all Nations and Ranks in Europe zealouſly imbarked in it. The Badge of thoſe that engagaed in this Undertaking, was a Red Croſs wrought in their Habit, and worn on the right Shoulder, from whence they were called the Croiſées [or the Croſſed,] and the Expedition, the Cruſade. Their Motto was, It is God's Will. The Heads of the Croiſées were, Hugh of France (2), Godfrey of Bouillon, Raimund of Tholouſe Count of St. Giles, Robert Earl of Flanders, Baldwin Earl of Haynault, Bohemond Prince of Tarentum, Tancred his Nephew, and Robert Duke of Normandy (3). This laſt burned with a Deſire of diſtinguiſhing himſelf in this War, which made ſo much Noiſe in the World: But Money was wanting to defray the neceſſary Charge. The only Means he had to ſupply this Want, was to borrow a Sum of the King his Brother (4), and give him Normandy for his Security (5). William gladly received the Propoſal. But as his Kingdom was exhauſted by the great Levies of Money already raiſed, he was forced to recur to new Methods. The readieſt way, as he thought, was to deſire the richeſt of his Subjects, particularly the Nobility and Clergy, to furniſh him with the Sum required. His Requeſt being equivalent to a Command, ſuch as were unwilling to comply were forced to it, without reſpect of Perſons. This Compulſion gave the Lords a Pretence to treat their Vaſſals in the ſame Manner, and oblige them to contribute to the King's Wants. Several Eccleſiaſticks not having by them what was demanded, were, or pretended to be, under a Neceſſity of melting down the Church-Plate, and even the Shrines of the Saints (6).

Malmſb. S. Dunelm. Eadm.

The different Tempers of the two Brothers.

Let us here reflect a Moment, on the different Temper of theſe two Sons of William the Conqueror. The firſt makes a Conſcience of oppreſſing his Subjects to ſupply the Charges of an Expedition approved by all the World, chuſing rather to Mortgage his Dukedom than raiſe the Money upon them. The other makes no ſcruple to extort Money from his People, to acquire a Good, of no Advantage to them, but purely to gratify his Ambition. Hence we may judge how great an Injury the Conqueror did the Engliſh in preferring the younger to the elder Brother. 1096.

As ſoon as Robert was gone, William taking Poſſeſſion of Normandy (7), demanded of the King of France the French Vexin (8), which he pretended belonged to the Dukedom. This pretenſion occaſioned a War, which, having nothing remarkable in it, ended the next Year in a Treaty of Peace.

William wars with France. Ord. Vital.

The great eaſe wherewith William had lately acquired Normandy, ſerved only to inflame his Deſire and ſet him upon the Conqueſt of Wales. To that End, he made, on ſome other Pretence, extraordinary Preparations, imagining he could not fail of Succeſs, as he hoped to ſurprize the Welſh. He reſolved to extirpate all the Males of that Nation, whoſe Neighbourhood had all along been very troubleſome to the Engliſh. But the Honour of this Conqueſt was not reſerved for him. Though by the Aſſiſtance of ſome Deſerters, he penetrated a good way into that difficult Country (9), he loſt more of his own Men than he deſtroyed of the Enemies. So that he was forced once more to deſiſt from this Undertaking, without doing any thing conſiderable. 1097.

His War with the Welſh. Brompt. Hoved. Huntingd. Sax. Ann.

Shortly after, a new Revolution in Scotland made him reſolve to ſend an Army thither under the Command of Edgar Atheling. Donald, who was driven out of Scotland, finding means to re-enter, compelled Duncan to leave the Kingdom, and eſtabliſhed himſelf in the Throne. The greateſt Part of the Engliſh Hiſtorians pretend, that William, as Sovereign Lord of Scotland, made himſelf Judge of this Difference. They add, that doing Edgar, eldeſt Son to Malcolm Canmore, the Juſtice due to him, he ordered his Troops to march into Scotland, and put that Prince in poſſeſſion of the Crown. However this be, without ſtaying to examine the Matter, I ſhall only ſay, Edgar Atheling by help of the Engliſh Army, placed young Edgar his Nephew on the Throne of his Anceſtors. William could not undertake this Expedition in Perſon, the Revolt of the Province of Maine obliged him to go thither (10) and lay Siege to the Capital. 1098.

S. Dunelm.

During the King's Abſence, Wales was again expoſed to the Inſults of the Engliſh, or rather Normans, who began to be confounded with the Engliſh. Owen, a Welſh Lord, Father-in-law of Griffith and Cadagan (11), Kings of Wales, having been diſobliged by his Sons-in-law, privately invited the Earls of Cheſter and Shrewſbury into his Country, promiſing them a great Booty. The two Earls levying ſome Troops, were received by Owen into Wales, where they committed unſpeakable Cruelties. The two Kings ſurprized by this unexpected attack, were forced to fly into Ireland, and leave their Country to the Mercy of the Engliſh. Their flight giving their Enemies an Opportunity to continue their March, they penetrated as far as the Iſle of Angleſey, where they deſtroyed all with Fire and Sword. Whilſt they were exercifing their Cruelties, Magnus King of Norway, who had lately made himſelf Maſter of the Iſle of Man, advanced as far as Angleſey. As he offered to land, the Engliſh endeavoured to hinder him, and the Earl of Shrewsbury (12) was ſlain in the Skirmiſh. His Death was looked upon as a juſt Judgment for the horrid Barbarities committed by him in the Iſle. This Accident cauſing ſome diſorder among the Engliſh Troops, they were conſtrained to abandon the Shore. Magnus landing in the Iſland, and finding the Engliſh had left nothing to plunder, re-imbarked, and the Engliſh retired laden with Spoil.
